THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XV.

Containing the Reign of HENRY VIII, Twentieth King of ENGLAND since the Conqueſt.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1509.

HENRY VIII, ſon and ſucceſſor of Henry VII, acceded to the crown when he wanted a few months of eighteen years (1). Lord Herbert, his hiſtorian, ſays the King his father deſigned him at firſt for the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, becauſe, having a ſon elder than this, there was no likelihood that this would aſcend the throne: and therefore (continues he) care was taken to inſtruct him in all the parts of learning neceſſary for a Prince who was one day to be a churchman. He would have expreſſed himſelf in juſter terms had he only ſaid, that Henry VII had ſuch a deſign when he firſt put him on his ſtudies: but as the young Prince was become his heir-apparent at the age of eleven years, it could not be with the ſame view that he cauſed him to purſue the ſtudy of ſuch parts of literature as were proper for a clergyman. It is therefore more likely, that the King his father kept him to his ſtudies, for fear his active and fiery ſpirit ſhould carry him to more dangerous exerciſes. He was only ſon of Queen Elizabeth, heireſs of the houſe of York. Conſequently he might have given the King his father ſome trouble, had he thought of aſſerting his right as heir to his mother. However this be, Henry, having taken a reliſh for learning in his younger years, preſerved it ever after. He always delighted in peruſing good books, and converſing with the learned, even when a multiplicity of his affairs ſeemed to divert him from ſuch kind of imployments. By this means he made advances in the ſciences very uncommon to great Princes. Francis I, his cotemporary, whom the French hiſtorians ſtile, The Father of the Muſes, was in erudition much his inferior. He ſpoke French and Latin well and readily. He was perfectly ſkilled in muſic, as two intire maſſes compoſed by himſelf, and often ſung in his chapel, do ſufficiently teſtify. He was well verſed in the moſt abſtruſe points of the Ariſtotelian philoſophy, which alone was in vogue in thoſe days: but he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of divinity, as it was then taught in the univerſities, wretchedly contaminated with uſeleſs queries. The Summary of Thomas Aquinas was a book abundantly in his favor.

His education.

Herbert.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1509. Hollingſh.

This knowledge, which was conſidered as a great accompliſhment, even in ordinary perſons, had on the young Prince an effect not uncommon: it gave him of himſelf a good opinion, which had but too much influence on all the actions of his life. The exceſſive commendations almoſt generally beſtowed on him, confirmed him in this conceit. While he was yet unexperienced in the affairs of ſtate, he imagined himſelf very able; and this preſumption was the cauſe of his being the dupe of thoſe princes with whom he was concerned, as will more amply appear in the ſequel of his reign.

Henry has good conceit of himſelf.

He is often impoſed on.

But, in remarking this Prince's large portion of ſelf-conceit, I pretend not to rob him of, or any way leſſen the noble qualities he had from nature or education. In his youth he was extremely perſonable, and expert in all bodily exerciſes, rather excelling than falling ſhort of any Prince of his time: and accordingly, he was paſſionately fond of all thoſe diverſions which gave him opportunities to ſhew his activity. He was couragious without oſtentation; of a free and open temper; a profeſſed enemy to fraud and inſincerity, ſcorning to uſe indirect means to compaſs his ends. In his liberality perhaps there was as much of the extreme, as in the King his father's avarice. Henry VII ſeemed to have been ſollicitous to accumulate wealth, only to afford his ſon the pleaſure of ſquandering it away without diſcretion.

His firſt counſellors. Stow. Hollingſh. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

As Henry VIII, when he mounted the throne, was little experienced in affairs of government, he at firſt, made uſe of the King his father's miniſters and counſellors. The principal were, William Warham archbiſhop of Canterbury (1), of whom honorable mention is made by Eraſmus (2) ſomewhere in his writings; Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter, (3) who in the late reign had been imployed in the niceſt affairs; Thomas Howard earl of Surrey, (4) ſon to the duke of Norfolk ſlain in Boſworth field fighting for Richard III; George Talbot earl of Shrewſbury, lord ſteward of the King's houſhold; Thomas Ruthel, doctor of laws; ſir Edward Poynings (5), knight of the garter, whoſe name is ſtill famous for a ſtatute inacted in Ireland in the former reign, while he had the government of that iſland; and ſir Charles Somerſet, baron Herbet, and lord Chamberlain (6).

Henry VII's funeral. Hall. Hollingſh. Stow. Herbert.

Henry VII's funeral was celebrated with great magnificence a few days after his deceaſe. His body was interred at Weſtminſter, in the chapel erected by himſelf, and for the adorning whereof he ſpared no coſt. This chapel paſſed then for one of the ſtatelieſt in Chriſtendom: Henry VII, covetous as he was, expended thereon fourteen thouſand, ſome ſay twenty thouſand pounds ſterling; a very conſiderable ſum in thoſe days, when money was much ſcarcer in Europe than at preſent (7).

Herbert.

While thoſe obſequies were preparing, the new King privately retired, from his palace of Richmond, to the tower of London, under color of withdrawing on account of the King his father's death: but it was rather to ſettle with his miniſters ſome affairs which would not admit delay.

Lord Stafford ſent to the tower. Hall.

While he was thought in his retirement to be imployed in devotion, he ordered Henry lord Stafford, the duke of Buckingham's brother, to be apprehended, probably on ſome groundleſs ſuſpicion which ſoon vaniſhed, ſince not long after, he was created earl of Wiltſhire.

The See of Durham, vacant by the tranſlation of Chriſtopher Bambridge to the archbiſhoprick of York, was confered on Thomas Ruthal, doctor of law, and one of the privy-council (8).

General pardon. Proclamation to incourage people to complain. Stow. Hollingſh. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

A few days after, the King confirmed his father's general amneſty, granted not long before his deceaſe (9): but all offenders had not the benefit thereof. A proclamation quickly appeared, wherein the King ſaid that, being informed his good ſubjects had been oppreſſed under the ſpecious pretenſe of preſerving the prerogatives of the crown, he gave them leave to bring their complaints, and promiſed them ſatisfaction. The deſign of this proclamation was not to reſtore to his people the ſums unjuſtly extorted by the late King, but only to incourage them to exhibit their complaints againſt Empſon and Dudley, the inſtruments made uſe of by Henry VII, and to give them ſome ſort of ſatisfaction by puniſhing theſe two miniſters.

Hen. VIII An' 1509.

When this proclamation was publiſhed, numberleſs petitions were preſented againſt them. This was what the court wanted, not only becauſe theſe men were odious to the whole nation, but moreover to ſhew the people, the new King intended to rule in a very different manner from the King his father. On all theſe petitions, Empſon and Dudley were called before the council, where they were ſuccinctly told the principal articles alledged againſt them (10). Empſon anſwered for both, "That the accuſation was of a very new and "ſtrange nature: that uſually men were proſecuted for acting againſt the laws, or diſobeying "their Sovereign; but for their part, they were "accuſed by the people of executing the laws "whereof themſelves were the authors: that, "on the other hand, the King called them to "account for obeying his father's expreſs orders, "unheard of crime! the puniſhment whereof would "be apt to throw all his ſubjects into rebellion: "that if they muſt be puniſhed for ſuch offenſes, "he deſired it might not be divulged to foreign "nations, leſt they ſhould infer, that the final diſſolution of the Engliſh government was approaching." To this it was briefly replied, "That he had ſpoken with much freedom; but "his eloquence was fruitleſs and unſeaſonable: "that they were not accuſed of executing the laws, "or of obeying the King; but of ſtretching the "laws beyond their due bounds, and exceeding "their Sovereign's commiſſion, which accuſation "they had reaſon to fear were too well proved."

Then they were both commited to the tower (11). The King had determined on making them examples, in order to content the people, who were extremely inſenſed againſt them. Thus their condemnation was reſolved before their appearance, tho' it was not yet known on what to ground their proceſs. In any other country, an act of ſovereignty to ſend theſe two men to the gallows, would have been a joyful ſight: but it is not the ſame in England, where the greateſt criminals have privileges which cannot be refuſed them, without giving the people occaſion to imagine the court is forming deſigns againſt liberty. It was neceſſary therefore to ſearch for ſome expreſs law to condemn them: but, on examining the accuſation already brought againſt them, great difficulties occurred. It appeared that, tho' they were accuſed of numberleſs offenſes, nothing could be proved but their mercileſs execution of the laws: but, notwithſtanding they had ſtretched theſe laws as far as the words would bear, it could not be charged to them as a crime, ſince they had a warrant from the King, in whom the execution of the laws is lodged. Certain it is that Henry VII, contrary to the cuſtom of his predeceſſors, had acted according to the utmost rigor of the ſtatutes: but he might do it, and if the former Kings had done otherwiſe, it was more out of condeſcenſion than juſtice. Theſe two miniſters therefore could not be proſecuted for obeying him: beſide, to condemn them for executing their Sovereign's orders was openly to diſhonor that Prince's memory, and renew the remembrance of his ſeverities towards his ſubjects. It was reſolved therefore to deſtroy them on a falſe accuſation, of intending to withdraw their allegiance from the King ſince his acceſſion to the throne. It is evident this accuſation was quite groundleſs: for how could two perſons ſo odious to the whole nation, and deprived of all credit by the death of Henry VII, think of ſuch a deſign, and ſtill leſs put it in execution (1)? Mean while, no ſcruple was made to take away their lives for a forged crime, becauſe they were believed worthy of death, tho' not condemned by the letter of the law. On this frivolous imputation, they were brought before their proper judges, and found guilty, whether falſe witneſſes were ſuborned againſt them, or by a mental reſervation hitherto unknown in England in judgments of this nature. Dudley was tried and caſt at London the ſixteenth of July, but Empſon was not ſentenced 'till the fourteenth of October, (2) at Northampton. Henry, either thro' ſcruple, or ſome other motive, ſuſpended their execution 'till the next year (3).

While means were contriving to diſpatch theſe two miniſters, the King and his council had a much more important affair to take into conſideration. We have ſeen, in the former reign, Prince Arthur's marriage with Catherine of Aragon; that Prince's death without iſſue; the reaſons inducing King Henry VII to deſire that Prince Henry, become his heir apparent, ſhould eſpouſe his brother's relict; the conſent of Ferdinand and Iſabella, the young widow's parents; and Pope Julius's diſpenſation for the marriage. The true reaſon why Henry VII propoſed this match, was his unwillingneſs to reſtore the hundred thouſand crowns received in part of Catherine's dower: he was alſo afraid of loſing the other half, which remained to be paid. Finally, he foreſaw that, after the receipt of the whole, the Princeſs his daughter-in-law would indiſpenſibly injoy her ſettlement of the third part of the revenues of the principality of Wales, and the county of Cornwal. However, as it was not decent to urge to the Pontif ſuch a motive to obtain a diſpenſation for ſo ſtrange a marriage, which could not but be deemed ſcandalous, it was pretended to be neceſſary to preſerve the peace between Henry VII and the King and Queen of Spain. That was the motive alledged to the Pope, which he readily conſidered as ſufficient, tho' there was but too much reaſon to queſtion its being the real inducement.

Debate about the King's marriage with Catherine of Aragon. Herbert.

Hall. Herbert.

In conſequence of the Pope's diſpenſation, Henry and Catherine were ſolemnly affianced: nevertheleſs, whether Henry VII intended only to deceive Ferdinand, and get the remaining hundred thouſand crowns, or was moved by the remonſtrances of Warham archbiſhop of Canterbury concerning this marriage, he ſo ordered it, that the Prince his ſon, on the very day he was fourteen years of age, in the preſenſe of certain witneſſes, made a proteſtation in form againſt the conſent he had given. But this proteſtation was kept ſo ſecret, that it came not to the public's knowledge 'till there was a neceſſity of divulging it, many years after. On the news of Henry VII's demiſe, Ferdinand ſent to count de Fuenſalida, his embaſſador in England, a very ample power to renew the treaty of alliance made with the deceaſed King, ordering him withal, to demand the confirmation and execution of that which was concluded for Catherine's ſecond marriage with Prince Henry, now become King of England.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 249. May 11.

The Spaniſh embaſſador having preſented a memorial on this occaſion, it was deliberated in council, whether the King ſhould accompliſh his marriage with Catherine. This affair was debated with great attention. Againſt the marriage it was alledged; "That for a man to marry his brother's "widow was a thing unheard of among Chriſtians: "that ſuch a marriage was contrary to the law of "God, and therefore it was a queſtion, whether "the Pope had power to diſpenſe with it." Of this ſentiment was the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who could not conſider the ſaid marriage otherwiſe than as mere inceſt. But Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter was of a quite different opinion. He ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the Pope's diſpenſation, and the unlimited power of Chriſt's vicar. He affirmed; "That the Pope's granting a diſpenſation, "was a certain proof that he had the power, and "was ſufficient to ſatisfy the King's conſcience: "that no perſon on earth could limit, or ſo much "as inquire into the Papal authority; and tho' ſuch "a power ſhould be aſcribed to a general council, "at leaſt the council of England could not pre-"tend to it." To theſe arguments concerning conſcience, the biſhop added others drawn from reaſons of ſtate, and the King's particular intereſt. He ſaid, "That the King would, during the courſe "of his reign, very probably have diverſe con-"teſts with France, England's ancient enemy, and "whether he would attack, or only defend, the "alliance with Spain was abſolutely neceſſary: "that in ſending back Princeſs Catherine after "having affianced her, he would affront King "Ferdinand, which he would certainly revenge "by leaguing with France, and ſuch a league could "not but indanger England, or at leaſt run it to "exceſſive expenſes: that moreover, if the King "refuſed to conſummate his marriage with Cathe-"rine, he muſt reſolve either to reſtore her dower, "or ſuffer her to injoy her ſettlement; but, by "eſpouſing her, he would ſave the hundred thou-"ſand crowns received by the King his father, "be a gainer of the like ſum, which the King of "Aragon was to pay, and avoid the great charge "he muſt indiſpenſibly be at in affiancing and "bringing over to England another Princeſs." Next he expatiated on the virtue and ſweet diſpoſition of the Princeſs of Wales, ſufficient to render a huſband compleatly happy: adding; "That "there was no room to doubt of her being ſtill a "virgin, ſince ſhe herſelf affirmed it, offering "even to undergo a viſitation by matrons, to de-"monſtrate that ſhe alledged no other than the "naked truth."

All theſe arguments, except the firſt concerning the diſpenſation, were very ſtrong. As to that, it was ſo dangerous for a churchman to diſpute the Pope's authority, eſpecially that of ſuch a Pope as Julius II, who was ſtill in his vigor, that the archbishop of Canterbury durst not persist openly in his opinion. Wherefore Henry, closing with the bishop of Winchester's and almost the whole council's sentiments, it was resolved he should consummate his marriage: but previously he required of the Princess, that by a solemn act she should renounce her dower of two hundred thousand crowns, and consent that the said sum should appertain to the King her consort, and that, neither by herself nor heirs, nor by King Ferdinand her father, nor her sister Queen Juana, nor by any other person, on any pretense whatsoever, the same should ever again be claimed. Two days after, count de Fuensalida made the like renunciation in the name of King Ferdinand and Queen Juana. By Catherine's letters patent, wherein she stiles herself only Princess of Wales, bearing date June the seventh, it is evident, the King married her not on the third of that month, as historians affirm, nor sooner than the day these letters were signed. Their coronation was solemnised on the twenty-fourth of the same mouth, and five days after died Margaret countess of Richmond and Derby, the King's grandmother.

Hall, &c. Death of the countess of Richmond. Hall. Stow. Herbert.

In the begining of his reign, Henry gladly left to his council and ministers the care and management of his affairs. As he was in peace with all his neighbors, the transactions of his own realms could not furnish him with much imployment. He thought only of such pleasures and diversions as better suited his years than application to business: but, as he was naturally liberal, his entertainments at court were very expensive. The aged bishop of Winchester, Henry VII's old minister, could not help murmuring to see lavished away without any necessity the treasures which his deceased master had amassed with so much care, pains and injustice, and wherein he had himself been imployed. He threw all the blame on the earl of Surrey, lord treasurer, who was his rival in favor under the late King, and continued to be so still under the present, by gaining the affection of his new master, by a blind compliance to his will. During Henry VII's life, he was more close-fisted and less willing to part with money than even the King himself. How expres soever the orders were for payments, he always found difficulties, and by that made his court admirably to his master. Being continued in his post in the new reign, he became quite another man: he not only paid, without examination, whatever was ordered, but also excited the King to extravagant expenses: this gained him the favor of the young Monarch, who was naturally addicted to profuseness. The bishop of Winchester loudly censured this procedure, as extremely detrimental to the King's interest: but he was little regarded in a court where every one was striving to make advantage of the Sovereign's liberal temper. Mean while, his discourses exasperated more and more against him the earl of Surrey and the young courtiers, who never ceased doing him ill offices with the King: thus the bishop, who was in so great credit in the late reign, gradually lost it in this.

His disgrace, which sat very heavy on his mind, threw him on devising means to supplant his rival, by introducing at court Thomas Wolsey, to whose qualifications he was no stranger. Wolsey was a clergyman, already eminent for his merit, tho' no better a man than the son of a mean Ipswich butcher. The bishop of Winchester readily foresaw, that the King would soon be in want of persons about him fit and able to ease him; and, as he knew Wolsey's genius and capacity, questioned not that when he was at court he would render himself necessary to the King. To that end, he procured him the place of almoner. We shall soon be convinced that the prelate was not wrong in his judgment, or rather that his foresight was far short of Wolsey's fortune (1).

About the middle of the year, the treaties concluded between Henry VII and the King of Scotland, were confirmed or renewed by the bishop of Murray, who was sent into England to congratulate Henry on his accession to the crown.

Christopher Bambridge, archbishop of York, being at Rome, where he was gone to have his election confirmed, received a commission from the new King to act as his embassador. We shall presently know the reason why the Pope wanted to have an English embassador reside at his court, and why King Henry was desirous to be particularly informed of what passed at Rome, and throughout Italy.

These were the most remarkable transactions in England, during the first eight months of the reign of Henry VIII. They were for the most part domestic occurrences of small moment, except the King's marriage, which was attended with very great consequences. But there passed abroad matters of great moment, which became as it were the fourse of those commotions wherewith in a manner all Christendom was agitated for more than fifty years, and wherein England was but too deeply ingaged. For some time, the affairs of Europe had begun to have a new face, and what intervened this year in Italy set them on such a foot, as obliged almost every Sovereign to be concerned therein. Henry VIII unhappily intangled himself in the troubles of that country, which seem to have had no relation to him. This makes the knowledge of the affairs of Italy so absolutely necessary, that without it neither the events of this reign can be intelligible, nor the King's character fully known. It will therefore be proper to inlarge on this subject, which concerns not only the history of England, but also those of France, Spain, Germany and Swifferland; the principal events whereof, for a long space of time, flowed properly from the affairs of Italy. It is true, most of the authors, who wrote the histories of these states, supposed their readers to be acquainted with what passed in Italy at the same time; whereby they have indeed compriſed their works within a much shorter com-

Necessity of knowing the affairs of Italy, to understand this King's history.

(1) Thomas Wolsey was born at Ipswich, March 1471. He was sent so early to Oxford, that he was batchelor of arts at fourteen years of age, and from thence called the Boy Batchelor. Soon after, he was elected fellow of Magdalen college, and, when master of arts, had the care of the school adjoining to that college commited to him. Being charged with the education of the marquis of Dorset's three sons, his lordship presented him to the rectory of Lymington in Somersetshire, October 10. 1500. He had not long resided at his living, before sir Amias Powlet, a justice of peace, put him in the stocks for being drunk (as is said) and raising disturbances at a fair in the neighborhood. By the recommendation of sir John Nasant he was made one of the King's chaplains. In 1506, he was instituted to the rectory of Bedgrave in the diocese of Norwich; having then, beside the rectory of Lymington, the vicarage of Lyde in Kent. Rymer's Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 217. While he was the King's chaplain, he insinuated himself into the favor of Fox bishop of Winchester, and of sir Thomas Lovel, who recommended him to the King as a fit person to be imployed in negociating the marriage between Henry VII and Margaret duchess of Savoy. He was dispatched to the Emperor her father, and returned with such speed, that the King seeing him, supposed he had not been gone. Having reported his embassy, he was made dean of Lincoln, February 8. 1508, and on the twentieth of the same month prebendary of Walton Brinhold in that church. In these circumstances he was when introduced at court by bishop Fox after Henry VII's decease, where he soon found means to insinuate himself into the favor of his son and successor. Burnet's Hist. paſs, but withal rendered them very obſcure to thoſe who were not ſo fully inſtructed as they have ſuppoſed. For my part, I purpoſe to take a different courſe. Since the affairs of Italy are the foundation of moſt of the occurrences in Europe, and particularly in England, during almoſt one half of the ſixteenth century, I am of opinion that they ought to be treated of ſomewhat largely, which alone can clear the particular hiſtories thence proceeding: but, to avoid tedious digreſſions, which would be indiſpenſible in the ſequel, it is neceſſary to give firſt a diſtinct idea of the ſtate of Italy, as well as of the characters and intereſts of the ſeveral Princes.

State of Italy.

I have already related in the foregoing reign how Lewis XII, aſſiſted by the Venetians, conquered the duchy of Milan upon Ludovico Sforza, pretending thereto a right, as grandſon to Valentina Viſconti, daughter of Gio. Galeazzo I, duke of Milan. I have likewiſe had occaſion to ſpeak of the conqueſt of Naples by the united arms of Lewis XII and Ferdinand, and of the means uſed by the latter to remain ſole maſter of that kingdom. It will ſuffice therefore to add here, that tho' Lewis XII loſt his portion of that conqueſt, he deſiſted not from his pretenſions, but was waiting for a favorable opportunity to aſſert them. I muſt now make ſome ſuccinct mention of the other Italian ſtates, and firſt of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Milan, and Naples.

Eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Before the Kings of France and Spain had ſet foot in Italy, the Popes were as ſovereign arbiters of that country: but it was not ſo much by their temporal arms as their ſpiritual, whereof they made frequent uſe. For ſome centuries, they had loſt great part of the demeſns formerly appertaining to the church. About the end of the reign of Otho I, the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate conſiſted of the city of Rome and its territory, with Tuſcany, the marquiſate of Ancona, the duchy of Spoleto, Ravenna, all La Romagna, and the whole country in general compriſed formerly under the Exarchate (1). But afterwards, during the wars of the Guelfs and Ghibelins, the Emperors wreſted from the Popes all Tuſcany, with ſeveral towns in other quarters. Some of theſe towns had thought fit to withdraw their obedience from the church, and the Popes themſelves had been obliged to grant others in fee to nobles who ſerved them, or from whom they expected aſſiſtance. At length, the Emperor Rodolf I, having ſold liberty to as many cities of Italy as would purchaſe it, diverſe which heretofore belonged to the church imbraced the opportunity of throwing off at once the yokes of both Pope and Emperor (2). Hence there were quickly in Italy almoſt as many Sovereigns as cities. The ſtrongeſt ſubdued the weakeſt, and fell at laſt themſelves under the dominion, or rather the tyranny of ſome of their own citizens, who found means to ſeize the whole power. In this manner were formed in Italy ſeveral inconſiderable ſtates, out of the ruins of what the ancient Kings of Italy, the Emperors, and the Popes had formerly poſſeſſed.

In the pontificate of Alexander VI, the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate was reduced within narrower bounds than before, tho' the Popes had preſerved the ſovereignty of ſeveral cities whereof they were no longer proprietors. Of this number were Ravenna, Bologna, Ferrara, Urbino, Faenza, Rimini, Pezzaro, Imola, Ceſena, Peruſa, &c. Notwithſtanding all theſe loſſes, they were ſtill very powerful, becauſe their ſpiritual arms gave them great advantages over their neighbors: moreover, beſide the revenues of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate, they had very conſiderable revenues from every ſtate in Chriſtendom.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1509.

But when Lewis XII took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Milan, and Ferdinand of the kingdom of Naples, the affairs of Italy bore quite another countenance. Then the temporal power of the Popes was nothing in compariſon of that of theſe two Monarchs, who, beſide their dominion in Italy, had alſo at their command the forces of two large kingdoms. On the other hand, the Roman Pontifs met with abundantly greater oppoſition, when they were pleaſed to brandiſh their ſpiritual weapons, whoſe force was in proportion to the weakneſs of thoſe at whoſe heads they were leveled. For this reaſon, they ſought all ſorts of means to drive the foreigners out of Italy: but as they could not, by their own ſtrength, execute ſuch a deſign, they were forced to make uſe of one of theſe Kings to worry the other, in which their policy was often deceived; for they could not humble one, without giving the other a ſuperiority more deſtructive of their intereſts than the equality which was between them before. This for many years was the occaſion of every one of the Popes intrigues, and withal a perplexity whence they could never extricate themſelves. Sometimes they joined with one to pull down the other; ſometimes, ſeting them at variance, they remained mere ſpectators of the conflict; and ſometimes they called in foreigners to make the ballance incline to the ſide they were diſpoſed to favor: but whatever was the ſucceſs of theſe wars, the conqueror ever became very formidable to the Pope and all Italy. It is certain therefore that the conqueſts of Naples and Milan gave a mortal wound to the temporal power of the Popes, and were alſo not a little prejudicial to their ſpiritual authority. As the Popes from thenceforward had frequent cauſes of quarrel with the Kings of France, now become their neighbors, they ſometimes made uſe of their ſpiritual arms, but not with the ſame ſucceſs as formerly againſt the Sovereigns of Italy. As they had to deal with Princes who did not eaſily bend, they only gave them occaſion to examine the grounds of the Papal authority; and this inquiry was not at all to the Popes advantage.

Beſide the intereſt of their See, the Roman Pontifs had alſo that of their family, whereof they were no leſs mindful. Every one of them ſeeking to raiſe his nephews or other relations, all the cities formerly belonging to the church were ſo many objects which inflamed their ambition. Alexander VI, who of all the Popes his predeceſſors was the leaſt ſcrupulous, had formed the deſign of making his ſpurious ſon, Cæſar Borgia, a great Prince, by erecting him a ſtate out of ſeveral cities or ſtates of La Romagna, which ſtill acknowledged the Pope's ſovereignty, and were under his protection. To execute this deſign it was that Cæſar Borgia, either by fraud or force, became maſter of Peruſa, Urbino, Imola, Faenza, Rimini, Pezzaro and Ceſena, under pretext that the poſſeſſors had not been punctual in paying the tribute or annual relief to the holy See: but Alexander VI dying before his ſon was well ſettled in his conqueſts, it happened, during the ſhort pontificate of Pius III, and the interval between his death and the election of Julius II, that the priſtine owners of theſe cities found means to recover them. This was chiefly

The firſt Exarch was under Juſtin the Younger, in 567, after Beliſarius and Narſes had expelled the barbarians from Italy: the laſt was Eutychius, defeated by Aſtolfo King of the Lombards in 751. Pepin, King of France turned him out of the Exarchate, and made thereof a preſent to the Pope.

Character and deſigns of Julius II. Guicciard.

Julius II, who ſucceeded Pius III, formed for the houſe of La Rovere, whence he iſſued, the ſame projects as Alexander VI had formed for that of Borgia. He was no ſooner in the Papal chair, but he commenced the execution of his ſchemes with the Venetians, magiſterially giving out, that his intention was to re-annex to the church whatever had been alienated, and therefore they muſt reſtore Faenza and Rimini. On their refuſal, he demanded aid of the Emperor Maximilian. This was properly the firſt riſe of the league of Cambray, touched on under the preceding reign, and whereof I ſhall be obliged to treat more amply in the ſequel.

The republic of Venice. Paruta. Doglioni. Sabellico. Bembo, &c.

The ſenate of Venice had long paſſed for the wiſeſt and moſt politic aſſembly in the univerſe. By their prudence and abilities they had gradually formed in Terra Firma (1), a ſtate which, being ſupported by a very ſtrong naval power, was inferior to none in Italy. This ſtate conſiſted of Friuli, Treviſo, Verona, Vicenza, Padoua, Bergamo, Breſcia, Crema, Cremona, Rovigo, and the whole Poleſin, Ravenna, Faenza, Rimini, &c. Moſt of theſe cities, with their territories, were formerly part of the kingdom of Italy. Next they fell under the dominion of the German Emperors, who governed them by their vicars. At length, either theſe vicars were become Sovereigns, or, being expeled, the citizens had recovered their liberty to fall again afterwards under the tyranny of ſome private perſons, who had uſurped a deſpotic power. From theſe the Venetians had acquired them, either by purchaſe or force of arms: but however it was, when they had made theſe acquiſitions, it is certain the authority of the Emperors was ſeldom acknowledged. Mean while, the Emperors ſtill preſerved their pretenſions to all theſe cities, as having been formerly parcels of the empire, or rather of the kingdom of Italy, injoyed by ſome of their predeceſſors. Friuli was conquered upon the church of Aquileia, to which it was preſented by Otho I; Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini, in former days appertained to the See of Rome. Rovigo and the Poleſin were conquered upon the duke of Ferrara. Cremona and Gierradadda belonged to the duchy of Milan, having been reſigned by Lewis XII. Breſcia was taken from the dukes of Milan, and Crema freely given up by duke Franceſco Sforza. They had ſtill in the kingdom of Naples five maritime places, mortgaged to them by one of the Kings.

Bologna. Ghirard. Alberti.

Bologna (2) was a rich and powerful city; but nothing near ſo conſiderable as heretofore: inteſtine diſſenſions had at length compeled her, on certain terms, to ſubmit to the church: after that, the city was governed by the Pope's legates, ſent thither from time to time: but their dominion ſuffered frequent interruptions. The legates oppreſſing the people, forced them often to ſhake off their yoke and expel them the city: but it was only to fall again under the tyranny of the heads of factions, who, by their oppreſſions, conſtrained them to have recourſe to the Pope and receive his legates again; this is what happened ſeveral times. In the year 1440, Hannibal Bentivoglio became ſo powerful, that he was little leſs than a Sovereign. From that time to 1506 ſome one of Bentivoglio family held the government, tho' the Pope's legates were ſtill admited and honored, but without having any real power. Finally, Julius II, not content with this ſhadow of authority, did, in 1506, demand aid of Lewis XII, to poſſeſs himſelf of Bologna. Tho' France had hitherto protected the Bentivoglii, Lewis however ordered the governor of Milan to ſend the Pope troops. Whereupon Gio. Bentivoglio, head of that houſe, ſeeing himſelf forſaken by the King of France, quited Bologna with his whole family, and retired to Milan, leaving the city to his ſaid Sanctity.

Henry VIII. An' 1509.

Ferrara. Sardi.

The duchy of Ferrara (3) was a fief of he church, long poſſeſſed by the family of Eſte, who were inveſted by the Pope, and paid a yearly relief in money. This ſmall ſtate, bordering on the Papal and Venetian territories, and being very convenient for both, preſerved itſelf by their mutual jealouſy; but however, the Venetians had taken from them Rovigo, and the Poleſin: but Julius II had greater views, and thought ſeriouſly of annexing the whole duchy to the church.

Modena and Reggio. G. Batt. Pigna.

Modena and Reggio were likewiſe under the dominion of the family of Eſte, not as belonging to the duchy of Ferrara, but as a diſtinct ſtate acquired by that family after being poſſeſſed of Ferrara. Julius II, had alſo pretenſions to theſe two cities, as having been formerly beſtowed on the church by Charlemain, and perhaps on the ſole pretext of their appertaining to the duke of Ferrara, his vaſſal.

Urbino. Cimarelli.

Urbino (4) had formerly been a demeſn of the church: but the Popes had not for many years challenged more than the right of ſovereignty. Cæſar Borgia had ſeized this city, and expeled duke Guidobaldi Ubaldini, who recovered it after Alexander VI's deceaſe. As Guidobaldi was iſſueleſs, Julius II perſuaded him to adopt Franceſco Maria de la Rovere, nephew to both, ſon of the Pope's brother and the duke's ſiſter. Soon after, De la Rovere became duke of Urbino by the death of Guidobaldi, his adoptive father.

Parma and Plaſenza. Alberti.

Parma and Plaſenza had been under the dominion of ſeveral lords or tyrants, 'till they finally became ſubject to the dukes of Milan. Lewis XII took poſſeſſion of them after his conqueſt of the Milaneſe.

Florence. Machiavel.

Furenza, or Florence, a very potent city, and capital of Tuſcany, was fallen at length under the dominion of the family of Medicis: but a contrary faction (5) afterwards prevailing, they were driven thence, and were now in exile, attempting however from time to time to be reſtored to their country.

Piſa. Alberti.

Piſa had been formerly a very conſiderable city by reaſon of her naval ſtrength; but at length becoming ſubject to the dukes of Milan, a baſtard of that family, to whom it had been given, ſold it to the Florentines. The Piſans oppoſed the ſale, and would have recovered their liberty, but being over-powered they ſuccumbed. After that, Charles VIII, in his way to Naples, reſtored Piſa to her liberty; but as ſoon as the Florentines had nothing more to fear from him, they beſieged Piſa, tho' aſſiſted by the Venetians, and the ſiege was ſtill carrying on at the time of the league of Cambray.

Genoua. Pizamo.

The City of Genoua, after ſundry revolutions cauſed by the factions of the Fregoſi, and the Adorni, was at length fallen into the hands of the French, in the reign of Charles VII. After that, Lewis XI resigned it to the duke of Milan, and Lewis XII seized it after his conquest of the Milanese.

Motives of the league of Cambray against the Venetians.

This survey of the states of Italy shews its being then divided between six powers, namely, Pope Julius II, Lewis XII King of France and duke of Milan, Ferdinand King of Aragon and Naples, the republics of Venice and Florence, and the duke of Ferrara. To these six may be added, the Emperor Maximilian, who, without possessing a foot of land in Italy, had however pretensions to whatever was formerly injoyed by the Emperors, and particularly to the Firm-land state of the Venetians, whose ruin the other six were equally concerned to procure. The Emperor pretended, that all the Venetian dominions appertained to the Empire, and passionately desired to wrest from them some place which would give him entrance into Italy, and opportunity to re-establish the Imperial power in that country. Julius II, as I observed, had formed a project to annex to the church whatever had been alienated, and particularly the duchy of Ferrara, and the towns of La Romagna. This design could be effected only by the destruction of the Venetians, ever attentive to oppose the growth of their neighbors: beside, the Pope was disposed to begin with them, and wrest from them Ravenna, Faenza and Rimini. Lewis XII repented his yielding to them Cremona and Gierradadda: he wanted to dispossess them thereof, and under that pretense, to get possession also of Crema, Bergamo and Brescia, and in general of whatever had belonged to the dukes of Milan. Ferdinand was desirous, without money, to recover the five maritime towns of the kingdom of Naples, which had been mortgaged to them: moreover, his interest required, that there should be always troubles in Italy, to hinder Lewis XII from thinking on the conquest of Naples. The duke of Ferrara wished to recover Rovigo, and the Polesin. Lastly, the Florentines, obstinately bent on the siege of Pisa, protected and defended by the Venetians, could desire nothing more advantageous than to see that republic unable to assist the Pisans.

Hist. della Legha di Cambray.

League of Cambray.

Such were the motives of the league formed against Venice, of which the Pope, Emperor and King of France were the chief promoters. For the greater secresy, they spread a report, that the Emperor, as guardian to Charles of Austria his grandson, had agreed, that his differences with the duke of Gueldres should be amicably adjusted. To that purpose, the city of Cambray was appointed for the place of congress, thereby to intimate, that the affairs only of Flanders would be considered. Here the famous league against the republic of Venice was concluded; and, the better to deceive spies, was signed at first a treaty of perpetual peace between the Pope, the Emperor, Lewis XII, and Ferdinand, which was indeed made public: but a second treaty, which they took care not to divulge, contained a league offensive and defensive against the Venetians, the principal articles whereof were as follows:

Hist. della Legha di Cambray.

Treaty of the allies against Venice. Bembo.

First; it was set forth in the preamble, that the Turks having begun to make great progress in Europe, it was absolutely necessary for the Christian Princes to join their forces against them; but that the Venetians, by their continual incroachments, greatly obstructed this union: from thence it was concluded, that they were to be dispossessed of what they had usurped. This was the pious motive of the league; and therefore it was agreed that, of their spoils, the Pope should have Ravenna, Faenza and Rimini; the Emperor, as such, Verona, Vicenza, and Padua, and as duke of Austria, Treviso, and Friuli: Lewis XII, as duke of Milan; Cremona, Gierradadda, Brescia; Crema; and Bergamo: The King of Aragon, Manfredonia; Trani, Monopoli, Brindisi, and Otranto in the kingdom of Naples; that the dukes of Ferrara and Savoy, and the marquis of Mantoua, should be admited into the league if they desired it; the first to recover Rovigo, and the Polesin; the second, to get the kingdom of Cyprus out of the hands of the Venetians; and the third, to obtain satisfaction concerning certain pretensions he had upon Venice. Lastly, that all who had any claim on the Venetians, should be received into the league as principals, if they declared themselves within three months. Thus, in order to make war against the Turks, no other means were found, than to strip the Venetians of their whole Firm-land state, and leave them only the single city of Venice.

Project of the allies. Guicciard. Mezerai.

To accomplish this design, it was agreed, that the King of France in person should enter the territories of the Venetians, the first of April 1509, with an army forty thousand strong: that the Pope should send an army into La Romagna; and Ferdinand have one in Lombardy, with a fleet in the gulf; and the Emperor attack the Venetians from the side of Germany: but as that Prince had lately made a three years truce with them, a most admirable expedient was devised to furnish him with a pretext to break it, which was; that the Pope should summon him, as the church's advocate, to come and defend the patrimony. Finally, Julius II ingaged to let fly against Venice all the ecclesiastical thunder. This league was signed at Cambray, December 10, 1508.

Campain of the year 1509. Mezerai. Bembo.

The time of executing the leaguers projects being at hand, Lewis XII departed Milan, the begining of April 1509, at the head of forty thousand men, while the Pope's army entered La Romagna under conduct of Francesco Maria de la Rovere duke of Urbino, and Raymond of Cardona threw himself into Lombardy with the King of Aragon's troops: at the same time, the duke of Ferrara took the field in the Polesin; but the Emperor contented himself with keeping at Trent, and seeing the rest of the allies act, in order to reap the fruits of their labors. Mean while, the Venetians, having first provided their towns with ammunition, raised an army, under command of their general Count Pitigliano, whose Lieutenant was Bartholomeo d'Alviano.

Battle of Agnadel. Bembo.

The van of the French army, commanded by Chaumont, passed the Adda the 15th of April, and at the same time the Pope excommunicated the Venetians, and put the city of Venice under interdiction. On the 14th of May was fought the memorable battle of Gierradadda or Agnadel (1) between the French and the Venetians, contrary to the opinion of count Pitigliano, tho' general in chief for the Venetians, and to all reason; for the Venetians having no refuge but their army, it was by no means proper to hazard a battle: but the heat of Bartholomeo d'Alviano prevailed over his general's prudence. The Venetian army was intirely routed, and Alviano taken prisoner: whereupon the Venetians, no longer able to resist their invaders, lost to Lewis, in less than a fortnight, Cremona, Peschiera, Crema, Brescia, Bergamo, and in general all the places formerly belonging to the Milanese: moreover, Vicenza, Verona, and Padoua sent him their keys; but as, by the treaty of Cambray, these places were in the Emperor's division, Lewis sent their deputies to him. Maximilian was then at Trent, expecting the success of the confederate arms. On the deputies arrival, he ordered his troops to advance towards the state of Venice, and, as those cities opened their gates, had only to garison them. Treviso alone refused him admitance, and remained firm to the Venetians, tho' reduced to the last extremity. Friuli and the towns of Istria followed the current, and submited to the Emperor. On the other hand, the duke of Urbino, with the Pope's army, took Ravenna, Cervia, Faenza, and Rimini; while the duke of Ferrara possessed himself of Rovigo, and the marquis of Mantoua of certain castles suiting his conveniency. Thus, as we may say, in a moment, the Venetians beheld their whole dominion reduced to the single city of Venice, with five places in the kingdom of Naples, which could not be of great service to them. Mean while, they were not absolutely disheartened amidst such a torrent of calamities, tho' the senate and people were under a strange consternation. Their chief care was to draw together their scattered troops, and use their indeavors to break so destructive a league.

Pisa surrenders to the Florentines. Guicciard.

The misfortune befallen the Venetians occasioned the loss of Pisa. This city, despairing of being relieved by Venice, or the King of France, who had finally deserted her, surrendered to the Florentines, after having undergone a tedious siege.

Lewis XII returns to France. Mezerai. Guicciard.

Lewis XII having compassed his ends, returned to France, after he had detached a body of troops, under command of La Palisse, to join the Emperor, who probably had not men enough to supply his garisons, and to keep an army in the field against the Venetians, who were drawing together again. On the King of France's departure, affairs began to have a new face. The Venetians took Padoua by surprise, and kept it ever after: moreover they found means to send into Friuli an army which imployed the greatest part of the Empeor's troops. In short, they appeased the Pope by their humble submission, and obtained his positive promise to give them absolution, and take off the interdict on certain conditions, which they could not refuse him. On the contrary, Ferdinand, who had not yet reaped any benefit by the league, was easily gained by the offer of the five cities held by the Venetians in the kingdom of Naples.

The Venetians retake Padoua, Bembo.

The Emperor besieges Padoua in vain.

While the senate was laboring to draw off the Pope and King of Aragon from the league, Maximilian with his own and La Palisse's forces, laid siege to Padoua; but after an unsuccessful assault raised it and retired to Germany: at the same time the French general also returned to Milan; by which means the Venetians had time to breathe a little, and continue with the Pope negociations which made them hope the issue of the war would not be so fatal as they had hitherto apprehended.

The Pope's uneasiness. Mezerai. Guicciard.

The King of France's union with Maximilian gave Julius II excessive uneasiness. He beheld the French King so firmly settled in the dutchy of Milan that it seemed impracticable to dislodge him. On the other hand, the Emperor could not but be formidable to him, since he had a free passage into Italy, by means of Verona and Vicenza. He was at a loss what to conjecture of the powerful aid lent that Prince by Lewis XII, to compleat the ruin of the Venetians, and he was not free from apprehension, that these two Monarchs had made a private treaty to share all Italy: mean while, he scarcely comprehended how these two formidable Potentates could well be withstood. Venice was reduced to a shadow. The Florentines were drained by the long Pisan war. As for the King of Aragon, it was almost impossible to treat with him, without being liable to be deceived: he knew how to improve all the treaties, and scrupled not abandoning his allies, when it was for his interest. Notwithstanding all these difficulties, Pope Leo formed the project of seting the affairs of Italy on a different footing, in order to execute his first designs. He resolved therefore to agree and league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand from the league of Cambray, by investing him with Naples; to use his indeavors to set the Emperor and King of France at variance; to bring a Swiss army into the Milanese; and finally, to persuade the new King of England to make a diversion in France. These were the Pope's projects, the success whereof we shall see hereafter. He began with making peace with the Venetians, on three conditions. First; that they should desist from all their pretensions to the cities of La Romagna, lately taken from them. Secondly; that they should renounce the right of placing in Ferrara a certain magistrate stiled Bisdomino. Thirdly; that they should leave the navigation of the Gulf free to all the subjects of the church. In the present circumstances of Venice, no other conditions could be imposed on her.

He forms new projects.

He makes peace with the Venetians. Bembo.

After so long a digression concerning what passed in Italy, which however is not useless as will appear in the sequel, we must return to the affairs of England.

An' 1510.

The parliament being assembled the twenty-first of January 1510, the commons represented to the King; That certain statutes, made in preceding parliaments, had given occasion to the King his father's ministers to oppress the people, by puting forced interpretations upon them, contrary to the natural meaning of the words: that therefore it was necessary to soften, or so explain them, as to prevent such abuses for the future. Henry readily agreed to what was proposed by the commons, not only because the thing was just in itself, but chiefly because it naturally led to his design of having Empson and Dudley attainted by the parliament. Tho' these had been already condemned by their proper judges, the King had defered execution of the sentence: he could not but have some scruple, for causing them to be accused of a crime whereof he was conscious they were not guilty; nevertheless he wanted to sacrifice them to the peoples hatred without incurring the imputation of having them wrongfully accused, and withal to justify the memory of his father, by giving out, that they had exceeded his orders. To reconcile these two things, he so managed it, that the parliament passed an act of attainder against them; that is, they were condemned to die by the the authority of King and parliament, without any particular mention of the crimes they had commited, or of the proofs whereon their sentence was founded. This method, which 'till then had been seldom practised, was but too frequently used in the sequel of this reign; so dangerous it is to establish such precedents. Mean while, Henry having still some difficulty to overcome his scruples, delayed their execution 'till the following August (1).

While the parliament was thus imployed, Lewis XII sent embassadors to England to renew with Henry VIII the treaties made with Henry VII. neſs to inform Lewis XII of his intention: however, he had not taken one ſtep towards it; but, as he was a vigorous ſprightly young Prince, and abounding in wealth, Lewis doubtleſs thought it would be proper to prevent him, leſt he might ingage in projects deſtructive of the welfare of France. His embaſſadors therefore concluded with Henry a new treaty of alliance, wherein the former treaties were not mentioned. By this it was ſtipulated; "That the peace between the two Kings ſhould "continue 'till the demiſe of one of them: "that it ſhould be confirmed by the general ſtates "of France, and the parliament of England: "that each of the two Kings ſhould take care to "obtain the Pontif's conſent, with a previous "ſentence of excommunication againſt the firſt "violator."

In this new treaty, not the leaſt mention was made of the 745000 crowns which Charles VIII had promiſed to pay to Henry VII, or his ſucceſſors, and for which Lewis XII himſelf was ingaged by a ſubſequent treaty, becauſe the buſineſs was only to renew the peace between the two Kings then reigning: however, Henry forgot not to ſecure the debt, by requiring of Lewis letters patent, wherein he promiſed to pay the arrears by means of twenty-five thouſand livres every ſix months, 'till the whole was diſcharged; after which the peace was ratified and ſworn to by both Kings.

The Pope ſends Henry a conſecrated roſe.

Julius II was meditating great deſigns againſt Lewis XII. The ſucceſs of the league of Cambray, tho' he had turned it to his advantage, made made him very uneaſy. He ſaw the French more firmly ſettled in Italy than ever, and Lewis XII better able to protect the duke of Ferrara. To accompliſh his projects againſt France, he doubtleſs wanted aſſiſtance; and to that end, tried to excite all the ſtates of Europe againſt that kingdom, as will be ſeen preſently: and therefore, to inſinuate himſelf into the King of England's favor, he ſent him this year the golden roſe, which the Popes, after ſolemnly conſecrating it, were wont to preſent to ſome Prince (1). Probably alſo, the King of Aragon, in concert with his Holineſs, began now to take meaſures to ingage Henry his ſon-in-law in a league againſt France.

Ib. p. 275. April 9. Burnet.

Ferdinand falls off from the league.

The ſucceſs of the laſt campain gave the King of Aragon no leſs uneaſineſs than it did the Pontif. He was ſenſible, Lewis never loved him, nor had any reaſon to love him, and ſaw this enemy, ſince the ruin of the Venetians, in a condition to diſturb him in the poſſeſſion of Naples. On the other hand, the league of Cambray could not procure him any farther advantages, whereas the offers made him to leave it were very conſiderable. The Venetians agreed to reſtore him the cities they poſſeſſed in the kingdom of Naples, and the Pope was willing to depart from his claim of forty thouſand crowns, and give him the inveſtiture of that kingdom for a Spaniſh genet only. This was ſufficient to induce him to break his ingagements at Cambray. In all appearance, ever ſince the end of laſt year, he had taken meaſures with the Pope to form a new league againſt France: but, as he never acted openly, he deſired theſe meaſures to be kept private, in order to attack Lewis the more irreſiſtibly. To that purpoſe, on the ſixth of January this year 1510, he commiſſioned Don Luis Caroz de Villaragud, his embaſſador at London, to treat with Henry VIII about a ſtricter alliance than had yet been concluded between the crowns of England and Spain.

New treaty of alliance between Henry and Ferdinand. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 284.

Whether Henry could not ſo ſoon reſolve to conclude this new alliance with Ferdinand, or was willing firſt to finiſh his affairs with Lewis XII, it was not 'till the twenty-fourth of May that the new treaty was ſigned. It was only a defenſive alliance between the two Kings, with a promiſe of mutual aid when requiſite: but Ferdinand, who had his views, cauſed theſe words to be inſerted; viz. "That in caſe one of the two Kings was attacked "by any Prince whoſoever, the other ſhould be "obliged to proclaim and wage war againſt the "aggreſſor, tho' he ſhould be his ally: that if "one was attacked by the King of France, the "other ſhould be obliged to go againſt him in "perſon with a powerful army." This treaty ſecured to Ferdinand the kingdom of Naples; becauſe, if Lewis XII had intended to undertake that conqueſt, the diverſion wherewith he would have been menaced from England would have infallibly kept him from his purpoſe. But it is not eaſy to conceive what advantage Henry could reap from ſuch a treaty, ſince it was not likely Lewis deſigned to attack him; ſo that all the advantage was on Ferdinand's ſide. It muſt be either that Henry's miniſters were not very clear-ſighted, or he, from a motive of generoſity for a father-in-law whom he did not yet ſufficiently know, was incoſiderately drawn to take ſuch ſteps, by ſo much the more extraordinary, as he had ſo very lately renewed the peace with France.

Remark on that treaty.

Henry minds only his diverſions. Herbert. Hall.

But it muſt not be thought that Henry was then a conſummate politician: he was yet a mere novice, and minded his diverſions more than the public affairs. There was nothing every day but turnaments, balls, entertainments, and conſorts of muſic, which viſibly melted away the eighteen hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, found in the King his father's coffers (2). He uſed likewiſe to play at tennis and dice with certain foreigners who chouſed him of his money not very honorably, which he at length diſcovered; and, tho' ſomewhat too late, diſgracefully chaſed them from court. He was ſo paſſionately fond of muſic, that it devoured great part of his time; which, added to the hours he imployed in his ſtudies and other diverſions, left him but little leiſure to apply himſelf to government affairs, the management whereof he willingly left to his miniſters: and therefore it may be affirmed that, in matter of policy, never Prince commited groſſer faults, or was more impoſed on than himſelf, eſpecially in the firſt years of his reign.

Wolſey riſes at court.

While Henry wholly addicted himſelf to his pleaſures, there was gradually riſing at court a perſon who was one day to have abſolute power over him, and to manage all his affairs, as well foreign as domeſtic: I mean Thomas Wolſey, who was made the King's almoner laſt year, and, in the begining of this, dean of Lincoln (3). It appears in the collection of public acts, that, on the thirtieth of January,

He had alſo the art of attaching ſo effectually to his intereſts thoſe in whoſe company the King did moſt delight, that they were always ready to forward his views. Being of a gay, facetious, and open temper, he would divert himſelf with them in ſuch exerciſes (ſays Polydore Virgil) as were moſt agreeable to the levity and paſſions of youth, and which did not perfectly ſuit with the character of a dean in the church. He would deſcend to ſing, laugh, rally, and even dance with them, as if, for the time, he had quite laid aſide that ſeverity of behavior which became his ſtation. Hiſt. Ref. Vol. I. p. 8.

The Pope's deſigns.

Julius II had in his head two grand deſigns. The firſt was to ſeize the duchy of Ferrara; the ſecond to drive out of Italy all the French and Germans. His forces alone not being able to execute theſe ſchemes, it was neceſſary to uſe the aſſiſtance of ſome other Princes, and try to ingage them in his projects. The plan he had formed was; to league with the Venetians; to take off Ferdinand and Maximilian from the intereſts of France; to break the league of Cambray; to perſuade the King of England to make a diverſion in France; to excite the Swiſſers to invade the duchy of Milan. He executed all theſe projects, but not without incountering ſuch difficulties as would have diſcouraged any man leſs determined than himſelf. Firſt, he made a private league with the Venetians, after which, he ſolemnly gave them abſolution the twenty-fourth of January. Then, he ſecretly agreed with Ferdinand, by promiſing him the inveſtiture of Naples. That done, he quarreled with Lewis XII, by filling a biſhoprick in Provence, without aſking his conſent, contrary to his own promiſe. Lewis complained of it; the Pope denied he had promiſed any ſuch thing; and in ſhort, they came at laſt to give each other the lie in form. This was preciſely what the Pope wanted, in order to have occaſion to break with him.

He abſolves and leagues with the Venetians; Ib. p. 294. and quarrels with Lewis XII; Bembo.

His league with the Venetians being publicly known, he imperiouſly commanded the duke of Ferrara to renounce the league of Cambray, and join his arms with thoſe of the church. The duke, not believing his being vaſſal to the holy See obliged him to be thus blindly devoted to the Pope's humors, refuſed to break his alliance with France, and ſo gave his Holineſs the pretenſe he had long been ſeeking. When the duke offered to pay him the tribute due to the church for the fief of Ferrara, the Pope refuſed it, plainly intimating, by that refuſal, that he intended to confiſcate the duchy.

and with the duke of Ferrara. Sardi. Mezerai.

Mean while, Ferdinand was privately acting with Henry VIII his ſon-in-law, to draw him into the Pope's intereſt, which was become his own in conſequence of the projects they had concerted; but his practiſes were ſo ſecret, that Lewis XII had not of him the leaſt diſtruſt: on the contrary he intirely confided in the aſſurances given him by his embaſſador, that his deſign was to continue firmly attached to the league of Cambray.

Ferdinand acts under hand to gain Henry. Herbert.

On the other hand, Julius II gained the biſhop of Sion (2), who, having great credit among the Swiſſers, found means to ſet them at variance with France, by perſuading them to demand ſome conſiderable addition to their penſions. Their alliance with that crown being about to expire, they required to renew it, that their penſions might be augmented. Lewis refuſing it, the biſhop of Sion effectually uſed that refuſal to ſtir them up againſt France, to which the King himſelf alſo contributed, by making an alliance with the Griſons: he thereby ſo provoked the Swiſſers, that, in a diet at Lucern, they declared for the Pope, and reſolved to ſend an army into the duchy of Milan.

The Pope ſets the Swiſſers at variance with France. Guicciard. Mezerai.

In fine, the Pope forgot nothing he thought capable of perſuading the Venetians to agree with the Emperor at any rate, even to the adviſing them to deliver him Treviſo and Padoua. He intimated to them, that the moſt effectual means to drive the French out of the Milaneſe, was to diſingage the Emperor from their intereſts; and when once they were out of Italy, it would be eaſy to wreſt from the Emperor not only Treviſo and Padoua, but likewiſe all his other conqueſts. But the Venetians durſt not run ſuch a hazard.

He tries to reconcile the Venetians to the Emperor. Guicciard. Mezerai.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1510.

Such were the vaſt projects of this Pontif. He was ſo private in his negociations, that Lewis XII, imagining he had no other deſign than to ſeize Ferrara, contented himſelf with ordering Chaumont, governor of Milan, to aid the duke in caſe he was attacked: but ſhortly after, a Venetian fleet, and Papal army commanded by Fabricio Colonna, attempting, tho' unſucceſsfully, to ſurpriſe Genoua, Lewis had but too much reaſon to ſuſpect ſome grand deſign was formed againſt him; and therefore, he ſent Chaumont orders to have an eye to the Pope's motions.

Lewis XII begins to ſuſpect the Pope. Mezerai. Guicciard.

Theſe orders came to Milan very ſeaſonably. Julius II really intended to beſiege Ferrara, and for that purpoſe was come to Bologna, 'till an army, prepared on ſome pretext by Ramon de Cardona at Naples, was ready to join his and the Venetian troops: but Chaumont allowed him not time to execute his projects. Hearing the Pope was arrived at Bologna, he departed Milan at the head of a body of forces, and uſed ſuch expedition, that he would there have ſupriſed his Sanctity, had he not ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed with parleys. While he was treating with the Pope's envoys, ſome Venetian troops in the neighborhood entering the city, ſecured it from the danger of being inſulted: whereupon Chaumont, being wholly unprepared for ſo important a ſiege, was obliged to retire.

Julius II like to be ſurpriſed at Bologna.

Julius II made great noiſe at this inſult of the French, and filled with his clamors all Europe, and particularly the court of England. He excommunicated all the generals of the French army, and preſently after his and the Venetian gallies made a ſecond attempt upon Genoua, but with no better ſucceſs than before.

He excommunicates the French generals, and tries to ſurpriſe Genoua. Mezerai.

At the ſame time, twelve thouſand Swiſſers began their march in order to enter the Milaneſe, under conduct of the biſhop of Sion: but they found the paſſages ſo well guarded, that they deſpaired of ſucceeding in their deſign; wherefore, not receiving beſide from Leo the money promiſed, they returned into their own country.

The Swiſſers cannot enter the Milaneſe.

War being thus proclaimed between Lewis XII and the Pope, Lewis thought himſelf under no farther reſtraint. He had done his utmoſt to be reconciled with him, even to the offering to abandon the duke of Ferrara. But the Pontif, relying on Ferdinand, and expecting great aſſiſtance from England, had eluded all his propoſals. Wherefore, to ſtop the fury of this impetuous old man, Lewis made a new league with the Emperor, promiſing to put him in poſſeſſion of all Italy, Genoua and Florence only excepted. Maximilian had the good fortune, that in all his leagues he had ever great advantages, tho' he contributed the leaſt. On this occaſion, Lewis XII could not eaſily proceed without him, becauſe it was abſolutely neceſſary to continue the war in the ſtate of Venice, otherwiſe the Venetians would have been able to give the Pope a too powerful aſſiſtance. The league being concluded, at Blois, in Auguſt, Lewis called a ſynod at Tours, to conſult how he ought to behave to the Pontif. The ſynod were of opinion, that the King ſhould once more offer his Holineſs a reaſonable accommodation; commodation; and, in caſe of refuſal, might with a ſafe conſcience enter on a war with him, even offenſively. Lewis wanted no more to juſtify his intended proceedings. Preſently after, he concluded with Maximilian a new treaty, whereby they agreed to cauſe a general council to be ſummoned to Piſa, to depoſe Julius II. To that end, they gained nine cardinals, who readily undertook to call the council in their own name. Some of theſe cardinals were then with the Pope, but found means to leave him under diverſe pretexts and, when he would have recalled them, refuſed to obey.

Treaty with Maximilian to ſummon a council at Piſa. Guicciard. Mezerai.

Such was the ſituation of the affairs of Italy during the year 1510. I have ſaid nothing of the events of the war which continued all this while between the Emperor (aſſiſted by French forces) and the Venetians, becauſe theſe particulars are of no great uſe to this hiſtory. It will ſuffice to obſerve, that Chaumont, perceiving Genoua and Milan in danger, had withdrawn the French troops from the Emperor's army to keep them at Milan. The departure of theſe troops gave a little reſpite to the Venetians, who thereby were inabled to repair ſome loſſes ſuſtained in the begining of the campain, and to aſſiſt the Pope, who was ſtill bent on the ſiege of Ferrara.

Chaumont retires to Milan.

The Papal and Spaniſh forces join.

Chaumont's attempt to ſurpriſe the Pontif, in Bologna, afforded Raymond of Cardona, viceroy of Naples, a pretenſe to march to the relief of his Holineſs. The Pope's troops and the Venetians were, in December, joined by the Spaniſh army near Modena, which city had, by Fabricio Colonna, been taken in his return from his Genoua expedition. Tho' the ſeaſon was not very proper to enter upon action, the Pope was abſolutely determined to beſiege Mirandola. This town belonged to the heirs of Gio. Pico di la Miranda, with whom he had no quarrel: but, as it lay convenient to favor the ſiege of Ferrara, he would not leave it in his rear, but ordered it to be vigorouſly attacked. In ſpite of his age, and the rigor of the ſeaſon, he came himſelf to the ſiege, to animate the troops by his preſenſe; and, the place having at length, on the twentieth of January, ſurrendered, he would needs make his entry into it thro' the breach.

Siege of Mirandola. Guicciard.

Lewis XII complained to Ferdinand of his aſſiſting the Pope: but Ferdinand, terming that a trifle, replied; "That, as vaſſal of the holy See, "he could not avoid defending the perſon and ſtate "of his Sanctity: not that he any way interfered "in ſuch diſputes as might be between the Pope "and King of France, but his intention was to "adhere ſtrictly to the articles of the league of "Cambray."

Hitherto Henry ſeems not to be concerned with the affairs of Italy, tho' the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians had formed a deſign to ingage him therein. He peaceably led a life of pleaſure, without much regarding what paſſed abroad. On the firſt of January, 1511, he had the ſatisfaction to ſee his Queen delivered of a Prince, whoſe birth occaſioned great rejoicings throughout the realm: but the joy was of no long continuance, ſince the royal infant died before the end of February (1).

Mean while, Ferdinand was ſeeking means to ingage Henry in the league he intended to make with the Pope againſt France. Henry was rich and powerful, and conſequently his junction to the league would be of great weight, and extremely incommode France. On the other hand, his youth and ſmall experience made his father-in-law hope that, by degrees, it would not be impracticable to ingage him, as it were, inſenſibly into projects wherewith a King of England ought not at all to concern himſelf. Certain it is that Ferdinand was already agreed with the Pontif: his whole procedure, and the ſeveral circumſtances of hiſtory, render it ſo evident that it may not in the leaſt be doubted; however, on this occaſion, he uſed a moſt profound diſſimulation. He feigned to have in view only the general tranquillity of Europe, that all the Princes of Chriſtendom might combine in a perfect union to war upon the Infidels. But as he wanted an army and fleet to execute his deſigns, he pretended to have very much at heart the continuance of the war he had undertaken againſt the Moors. In the preceding year, he had ſent upon the coaſts of Africa a conſiderable armada, commanded by count Pedro Navarro (2). Shortly after, he reinforced it with ſome troops under conduct of a ſon of the duke of Alva, who, attempting to land at Gelves, was ſlain, and all his men cut in pieces. Ferdinand made uſe of this ill ſucceſs to cover his preparations againſt France. Under color of being revenged on the Moors, he aſſembled a body of forces and equiped a navy, which he pretended to ſend into Africa, but was however deſigned for Italy. As it was not yet time to divulge his deſigns, he carried his diſſimulation ſo far as to demand of King Henry his ſon-in-law a thouſand Engliſh archers to ſerve in this pretended expedition: a feeble ſuccor, to be ſent for ſo far, and at ſo great charge, if he had really intended to uſe them. Henry, not ſeeing into his projects, readily complied with his requeſt, and appointed ſir Thomas Darcy, on whom at the ſame time he confered the title of baron (3), to command that ſmall body (4). We find, in Rymer's collection, Ferdinand's letter of thanks to Henry (5) for his aid, and for his advice not to hazard his perſon in the undertaking: "Advice "(continued he) which he could not follow, be-"cauſe religion was concerned." And yet, it ſoon appeared he never had any ſuch intention, ſince he imployed againſt France the very forces which to appearance were deſigned againſt the Moors (6).

Nothing more was wanting to compleat the projected league againſt Lewis XII, but to gain the King of England; to effect which, during the whole begining of the year 1511, ſtrenuous indeavors were put in practiſe. The Venetians ſent him an embaſſador, under color of thanking him for his care to reconcile them to the Pope, deſiring him withal, in their credentials dated the ſecond of March, to give credit to what their embaſſador ſhould impart to him, which could relate only to the intended league. On the other hand, it was much about this ſame time that the Pontif confered the dignity of cardinal on Chriſtopher Bambridge, archbiſhop of York and embaſſador at Rome, in a promotion the eleventh of March at Ravenna. All the hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, Bambridge was made cardinal purely for laboring to ſet Henry at variance with France. Matthew Skinner, biſhop of Sion, was advanced to the ſame degree of honor for ſervices of the like nature already done and to be done in futuro. In thoſe days, it was neither learning nor virtue which raiſed eccleſiaſtics to the cardinalate, but ſolely their abilities in temporal affairs, joined to ſubmiſſion to the Pope implicit and intire.

Attempts to get Henry into the league againſt France.

Bambridge made cardinal. Herbert.

The efforts uſed to ingage Henry in the Italian league, had at length the expected ſucceſs. In all appearance, it was repreſented to him, that he was highly concerned to oppoſe the progreſs of the King of France, who was already become too powerful by the conqueſt of the duchy of Milan, and the ruin of the Venetians. However this be, it appears that, about the middle of the year, Henry was determined to follow the ſuggeſtions of the Pope and Ferdinand: for, in June, he appointed commiſſioners, to take care that the militia of the kingdom were provided with good arms, and ready to enter on ſervice at the firſt order, which it was cuſtomary to exact only when a war was foreſeen. The reaſon alledged by Henry for theſe orders, evidently demonſtrate what were his views. He ſaid: "Tho' the kingdom was in perfect tran-"quillity, nevertheleſs, as weapons were com-"monly ſuffered to ruſt in time of peace, he "wiſhed that his ſubjects would be in a readineſs "to ſerve him, as well againſt invaſions, if any "were intended, as in defenſe of his allies." Theſe laſt words could reſpect only the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians; from whence it may be infered, that the King had already ingaged: but the ſequel will ſhew it in a ſtill clearer light.

Henry ingages with his allies.

He guards againſt Scotland.

The ancient and ſtrict union between France and Scotland gave Henry juſt cauſe to apprehend that, ſo ſoon as he ſhould have commenced war againſt France, the Scotiſh King, as ally of Lewis XII, would interpoſe in the quarrel: and therefore, to remove all pretext of rupture, he took care to appoint commiſſioners (1), with power to repair all the outrages commited ſince the late pacification: but his precautions proved ineffectual: a certain accident which occurred this year, afforded the King of Scotland afterwards that pretenſe of breach which Henry would have prevented.

Cauſe of quarrel between England and Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert. Hall. Stow.

Andrew Breton, a Scotiſh trader, complaining to the King of Scotland, that the Portugueſe had killed his father, and ſeized his ſhip, the King gave him letters of mart, after having in vain ſought redreſs from the court of Portugal. Breton hereupon equiped two ſtout ſhips, and found means to make himſelf ample amends for his loſſes, by falling on all the Portugal ſhips trading to Flanders and England. The Portugueſe embaſſador reſiding at London complained to the council, and repreſented, that, ſince the King of England pretended to the ſovereignty of the narrow ſeas, it was but reaſonable he ſhould protect the foreign ſhips which came into the channel. On this complaint, Henry fited out two large ſhips of war, and appointed the two ſons of the earl of Surrey (2) to command them, with orders to take the Scotiſh pirate. Theſe two nobles watched him ſo narrowly that they, at length, met with him as he was returning from Flanders to Scotland. Breton fought deſperately, but was killed in the ingagement, and his two ſhips taken and brought to England (3). The King of Scotland, having thereof information, ſent and demanded the two ſhips, with ſpeedy reparation of the outrage commited againſt the pacific treaty. The embaſſadors were told, that pirates were not included in the peace, and that puniſhing ſuch people anſwerable to their demerits was no violation of treaty. Probably, Breton had made himſelf more than amends for the damage he had ſuſtained, as it too frequently happens on ſuch occaſions. However, King James, not obtaining any ſatisfaction from the Engliſh court, proteſted againſt the injuſtice done him, and determined to reſent it whenever occaſion ſhould offer.

The Pope rejects the French King's offers. Guicciard. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

I left Julius II, after taking Mirandola, reſolved on the ſiege of Ferrara, and only waiting the return of mild weather. Tho' Lewis XII was partly ignorant of what paſſed in Spain and England, he knew however enough not to doubt that the Pope was indeavoring to raiſe him enemies from all quarters. He was even ſatisfied that, tho' he ſeemed to have no other deſign than to poſſeſs himſelf of Ferrara, yet that was only the firſt ſtep to ſome greater project: mean while, he was very much imbaraſſed. He had properly nothing to gain upon the Pope, except he would ſeize the church's patrimony: but he had abundance to loſe, beſide the perplexities which might be created him thro' the Pope's obſtinate and haughty temper. He was therefore willing to uſe all poſſible efforts to be reconciled with him. To that end, while the Pope was imployed in the ſiege of Mirandola, he made him ſome overtures by Chaumont; but all proved wholly ineffectual. Julius would not liſten to any of his propoſals, and continued the ſiege 'till he forced the town to capitulate. Finally Lewis, convinced there was no hope of reconciliation, ordered Chaumont to regard him no longer, and at any rate ſupport the duke of Ferrara. Chaumont, receiving theſe orders, took the field in the midſt of winter. His army, even when joined by the duke of Ferrara, was leſs numerous than the forces of the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians; but it was compoſed of ſo good troops that thoſe confederates durſt never hazard a battle, tho' it was more than once offered them. Mean while, the Pope was greatly imbaraſſed. Inſtead of being ſuffered quietly to prepare for the ſiege of Ferrara, he was forced to keep the field during winter, without knowing even how to ſave Modena, which was in danger of being inveſted. Ferdinand, who foreſaw what trouble that place would give his Holineſs, had adviſed him to reſign it to the Emperor: nay, that affair had been negociated, but unſucceſsfully, by reaſon Maximilian would receive it only as a place held of the Empire, to which the Pontif refuſed his conſent. At length, on Chaumont's approach to beſiege it, the Pope was willing to deliver it as the Emperor deſired, becauſe it was not to be ſaved without venturing a battle. The terms of this agreement are not preciſely known: but from thenceforward all the Emperor's proceedings gave occaſion to ſuſpect that Modena had been acquired on conditions very detrimental to his ally the King of France.

Ferdinand's diſſimulation.

The King of Aragon pretended to be in alliance with France: nor would he declare againſt her 'till he had ſecured the King of England, with whom he was privately negociating a treaty which required no brief diſcuſſion. Indeed, his troops which were to ſerve the holy Father only three months, according to the terms of the inveſtiture of Naples, ſtill acted in conjunction with thoſe of the allies: but he pretended, the viceroy of Naples proceeded contrary to his orders, in remaining in the Pontif's army longer than he was ordered. Mean while, the army was preſſed by Chaumont and the duke of Ferrara, who followed them cloſe, and did their utmoſt to provoke them to a battle. In order to gain time, Ferdinand, who would ſtill paſs for a neutral Prince, and well affected to the tranquillity of Italy, propoſed a congreſs at Mantoua for a pacification. The Pope immediately accepted the overture; the Emperor likewiſe agreed to it, and Lewis XII durſt not reject it, leſt he ſhould be charged with being the ſole author of the troubles of Italy. Certain it is that if, at this juncture, inſtead of ſuffering himſelf to be amuſed by a negociation, the ſole aim whereof was to rob him of the opportunity of repulſing his enemies, he had ordered his troops to advance, he would have overrun the whole Eccleſiaſtical ſtate; ſo great was the terror wherewith his arms had inſpired the allies: but he had to manage his ſubjects as as well as his Queen, who conſidered a war with the head of the church as a crime, tho' there was but too much provocation: he had himſelf likewiſe, on that very particular, certain ſcruples which he could not eaſily ſurmount. Nevertheleſs, he was willing once more to try whether the propoſed congreſs of Mantoua would produce ſome good effect: he hoped at leaſt, that the breaking off the negociation, in caſe it was not ſucceſsful, would fully juſtify him. The congreſs produced the effect expected by the allies, that is, it cauſed the French to loſe much time to no purpoſe.

The Emperor ſides privately with the Pope. Guicciard.

A few days before the congreſs of Mantoua, the biſhop of Gurck, who was to be there from the Emperor, had a conference at Bologna with the Pope, after which they pretended to part in great diſcontent: but what followed plainly ſhewed the contrary, ſince the Emperor never after did any thing agreeable to his alliance with Lewis XII. He conſented however, that the council of Piſa ſhould be called in his name, and the ſummons ſet up at Modena, and ſeveral other places appertaining to him, becauſe it was not yet time to declare himſelf. The ſummons ran; "That Julius II having re-
"fuſed to call a council, purſuant to the decree
"of Conſtance, the cardinals were impowered by "the ſame decree to ſummon a council in their "own name: and therefore, with the conſent of "the Emperor and King of France, they ordered

"the city of Piſa, to labor for a reformation of "the church, in the head and members."

A council ſummoned to Piſa in the Emperor's and French King's name.

Lewis ſuſpects the Emperor and King of Aragon.

The biſhop of Gurck's conference with the Pope, and the breaking up the congreſs of Mantoua, induced King Lewis greatly to ſuſpect the Emperor. On the other hand, he could not help fearing the King of Aragon, knowing by experience what was to be from him expected. He ſaw him making great preparations under color of the African war, and knew withal that, notwithſtanding his daily aſſurances that he would not concern himſelf with the troubles of Italy, he was uſing his utmoſt indeavors to procure a pacification between the Emperor and the Venetians: that is, properly ſpeaking, he was laboring to diſingage Maximilian from the intereſt of France. In ſhort, Ferdinand ſent him brotherly admonitions to make his peace with the Pontif, and not draw on himſelf the juſt reproach of proſecuting a moſt unnatural war with the common father of Chriſtians. Lewis could not but conſider theſe remonſtrances as a ſort of proteſtation to aſſiſt the Pope in caſe of neceſſity: nor could he, at the ſame time, believe that Prince would ingage in ſuch an undertaking without being ſecure of the Emperor. All this gave him uneaſineſs, as being apprehenſive that he ſhould at laſt be the dupe of the Pope, the Emperor, and Ferdinand: and therefore, leſt he ſhould be prevented, he gave expreſs orders to Triulzi, who commanded his army in the room of Chaumont lately deceaſed, not to let ſlip any advantages he could poſſibly take againſt the allies.

Triulzi, on this order, aſſaulted and carried Concordia in the begining of May, at the time the calling of the council of Piſa was every where poſted up. Then, by ſeveral marches, he indeavored to oblige the allies to a battle, without being able to ſucceed. At laſt, he reſolved to approach Bologna; not that he believed himſelf in condition to beſiege that city, but to draw the confederates from their advantageous poſts, and give opportunity to the Bologneſe to riſe in favor of the Bentivoglii, whom he had brought with him. His Holineſs had already imployed his utmoſt efforts to induce the confederates generals to hazard a battle, without being able to prevail, ſuch was their dread of coming to blows with the French: wherefore, ſenſible of the army's diſpoſition, and diſtruſting the Bologneſe, who loved him not, he retired to Ravenna, leaving in Bologna the cardinal of Pavia his prime miniſter. No ſooner was he departed, but a tumult aroſe in the city, during which the inhabitants called in their old maſters the Bentivoglii, and put them in poſſeſſion of the government: as for his ſaid eminence, he had betaken himſelf to a precipitate flight the moment he perceived their reſolution. On the other hand, the confederate army, advancing to one of the gates of Bologna, and hearing the Bentivoglii were admited, and the legate withdrawn, ran away in confuſion, leaving in the camp their artillery, baggage, and ammunition; whereupon the inbabitants ſallying out and joining with the peaſants of that neighborhood, completely ſtriped the ſcattered army, and rendered it utterly unſerviceable for ſeveral months. The duke of Ferrara, improving this opportunity, very eaſily recovered the places lately taken from him by the allies.

The army of the allies takes to flight of their own accord.

Amidſt all theſe mortifications, the Pontif met with ſtill another which touched him ſenſibly. The cardinal of Pavia was ſtabbed by the duke of Urbino, who taxed him with being the cauſe of loſing Bologna. The Pope's vexation thereat was the greater as he durſt not puniſh, in the perſon of his nephew, a crime he would have deemed worthy the moſt rigorous death had it been by any other hand perpetrated. His army being diſperſed, and his deſigns on Ferrara vaniſhed, he left Ravenna and withdrew to Rome. In his way, he had the frequent mortification to ſee the papers poſted up for calling the council of Piſa, wherein he was himſelf ſummoned to make his perſonal appearance.

The Pope withdraws to Rome.

It was univerſally expected that Lewis XII would purſue his ſucceſſes, and certainly, in the then ſituation of Italy, it was his own fault that he was not maſter of Rome. The Pope had no remedy ſpeedy enough to free himſelf from his melancholy condition. The King of Aragon was too remote; the Venetians were unable to lend him a ſufficient aſſiſtance, and the Emperor was not powerful enough to to ſave him, even had he been inclined to attempt it. Genoua, Bologna, Florence, Milan, were in the hands of his adverſaries: but Lewis, either thro' ſcruple, or ſome other motive, inſtead of puſhing his point, ordered Triulzi to retire to Milan with the army, and even diſband part of the troops. Seemingly, he was willing to take from his Holineſs all pretext of exciting againſt him the whole Chriſtian world, and publiſhing that he intended to poſſeſs himſelf of Rome and all Italy. He was very juſtly apprehenſive of this from the Pope, ſince it was in effect the foundation, or rather the pretenſe of the league formed ſome months after againſt France. Triulzi was no ſooner at Milan, but Ferdinand's fleet arrived at Naples, with about three thouſand men, who were ſoon to be followed by a more conſiderable body.

Julius II offers to agree with Lewis XII.

It was not difficult to perceive, that the King of Aragon had ſent his fleet to Naples to ſupport the Pope's intereſts, and give jealouſy to the King of France. Julius II, who was better informed than any man, revived at the news, and the rather as he well judged that Ferdinand would not have been quite aſſured of the King of England. Since the loſs of Bologna, and the rout of his army, he had ſeemed inclinable to accommodate matters with France, and tho' he had made overtures more becoming a conqueror than one conquered, Lewis had accepted them, on condition they were approved by the Emperor: but when the Pope underſtood that the Spaniſh fleet was at Naples, and Ferdinand began to declare himſelf, he added new terms to thoſe he had already propoſed, and plainly ſhewed he was no longer for peace. This conduct put Lewis XII beyond all patience: ſo, deſpairing to agree with ſo obſtinate an enemy, he ordered Triulzi to ſend ſupplies to Bentivoglio to guard Bologna, and ſome time after took Bologna and the Bentivoglii under his protection. On the other hand, tho' he was not obliged to aſſiſt the Emperor, except that Prince came perſonally into Italy, he however added to the German troops in the ſtate of Venice a ſtrong re-inforcement commanded by La Paliſſe. Mean while, the Pontif, having certain intelligence of the good diſpoſition of the Kings of Aragon and England in his favor, determined on ſummoning a general council in oppoſition to that of Piſa. To that end he publiſhed a bull, wherein, having firſt excuſed the neglect wherewith he was charged by the ſchiſmatic cardinals, and loudly inveighed againſt their inſolence, he called a council to be held at Rome, in the Lateran church, on the nineteenth of April 1512.

Julius calls a council at the Lateran church. Guicciard.

Doubtful behavior of the Emperor.

Since the biſhop of Gurck's conference with Julius II, Maximilian's conduct was ſo equivocal, that it was extremely difficult to judge of it with the leaſt certainty. He had agreed the council of Piſa ſhould be convoked; nay it was done with his expreſs approbation and conſent: but he had not hitherto nominated embaſſadors, neither was it known that any German prelate was preparing to go thither. Moreover, he had promiſed to command perſonally in Italy, whither he ingaged to conduct a powerful re-inforcement: nevertheleſs he lay very quiet at Inſpruck, without ſhewing that he had the leaſt thought either of the council of Piſa, or the Italian war: mean while, the conqueſts expected to be made upon the Venetians were to be all his. Thus, in the preſent poſture of the affairs of Italy, Lewis XII ſaw the burden of the war laid on him alone, without his daring almoſt to complain of it to the Emperor, leſt he ſhould join the enemy: and indeed, Maximilian was ſtrongly ſollicited by the Pope, the King of Aragon, and even the Venetians, who offered him a good ſum to induce him to deſiſt from his pretenſions upon their territory. Very probably, he was yet unreſolved, and, not ignorant of the league which was forming againſt France, was willing, as uſually, to let the two parties proceed, in order afterwards to declare for that ſide which beſt ſuited his intereſt. This doubtleſs was the reaſon of his preſerving a good underſtanding with Lewis XII, in conſenting the council of Piſa ſhould be convened, and withal, of reſerving a means to be reconciled to the Pope, in ſending neither biſhops nor embaſſadors to the council. Thus remaining in a manner alike ſuſpected by both parties, he waited 'till the ſucceſs of the war, or the offers from both ſides, ſhould ingage him to declare for one or the other.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1511.

Uncertainty of the affairs of Italy.

Mean while, affairs continued ſtill in the ſame ſituation. The Pope and the Venetians were alone in open war with France. The Emperor ſeemed to float between both. The King of Aragon had hitherto done nothing more than given hopes that he would join the league when concluded: but it was not ſo yet, each fearing to ingage in it unſeaſonably. Julius II and Ferdinand were too well acquainted to entertain any mutual confidence: each ſtrove to make the other ſubſervient to his deſigns, and was at the ſame time afraid of being deceived. Ferdinand had ſtill in France an embaſſador, who indeavored to perſuade King Lewis that the preparations in Spain concerned only the Moors. On the other hand, Pope Julius was not ſo irreconcileably at variance with the French King, but that he had ſtill left him ſome hopes of accommodation, and continued a ſort of negociation with him by means of the biſhop of Murray the Scotiſh embaſſador, who did the office of mediator. Ferdinand apprehended, in caſe the Pontif ſtruck up a ſeparate peace with France, the kingdom of Naples would be in danger. Julius had no leſs reaſon to fear that, to ſecure the quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Naples, Ferdinand would forſake the church's intereſts, and leave him expoſed to the diſcretion of Lewis XII. In that caſe, the Pope would have nothing to expect from England. Thus affairs were come to that paſs, that it was neceſſary, either that each ſhould ſpeedily make a ſeparate treaty, or both jointly declare themſelves, to avoid remaining in this ſtate of uncertainty: and therefore Ferdinand at laſt began to unmaſk ſomewhat more, by ſending to Naples the troops he pretended to deſign for Africa, in order to hinder the Pope from thinking of a ſeparate agreement with France.

Opening of the council of Piſa. Guicciard.

While the Pontif and King of Aragon were thus ſounding each other, the cardinals, who had ſummoned the council to Piſa, and were come to Milan, thought fit to open it by commiſſioners: but this was only mere formality, in order not to miſs the day appointed. Never was general council ſo thin. The French prelates were not yet arrived, and there was no likelihood of any from Germany. The Pope was perfectly inraged when he had notice of the council being opened at Piſa. In the heat of his paſſion againſt the Florentines, for ſuffering the council to meet in a city under their obedience, he excommunicated them as well as the Piſans, and put both cities under interdict: but the Florentines forced the prieſts to celebrate divine ſervice, leaving to private perſons the liberty to obſerve or reject the interdict.

Henry promiſes to enter into the league. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

It was difficult for Julius II and Ferdinand, to continue long in their preſent ſituation, without cauſing mutual ſuſpicions capable of changing the face of affairs. The reaſon which had hitherto with-held Ferdinand, namely, his uncertainty with reſpect to the King of England, was now vaniſhed. Henry, after long ſuſpenſe, had at laſt poſitively promiſed to enter into the league againſt France; whereupon the negociation of the treaty advanced more in one month than in a whole year before. It was a conſtant rule with with Ferdinand, to cover all his deſigns with the cloak of religion, little anxious if, after execution, his artifices were diſcovered. The fleet and army he had prepared in Spain, had for pretext a war with Infidels. When he was going to declare openly againſt France, he failed not to uſe the pretenſe of protecting the church againſt the outrages of Lewis.

Henry's and Ferdinand's embaſſy to Lewis XII.

As ſoon as he had gained the King of England, they jointly ſent embaſſadors to Lewis, to require him to leave the Pope unmoleſted, intimating, that as Chriſtian princes, they could not avoid protecting the church, diſturbed by his ambition. Lewis ſaw plainly that, their meaſures being now taken, it would be too late to juſtify his conduct; and therefore choſe to return a haughty anſwer, which was exactly what his enemies wanted.

League againſt France concluded at Rome. Guicciard.

Soon after, on the 4th of October, the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians concluded a league at Rome, leaving a place for the King of England, who had expreſſed a deſire to be included: indeed, cardinal Bambridge was concerned in the negociation as embaſſador of England; but he was ordered not to ſign the treaty, becauſe Henry expected to make a private one, more agreeable to the intereſts of England than that which concerned Italy only. By this treaty, his Holineſs promiſed to find for the ſervice of the league ſix hundred men at arms, five hundred light horſe, ſix thouſand foot (1), and twenty thouſand ducats per month. The Venetians were to furniſh eight hundred men at arms, one thouſand light horſe, eight thouſand foot, and to pay monthly twenty thouſand ducats. Ferdinand was to provide twelve hundred men at arms, one thouſand light horſe, ten thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand ducats monthly. It is true, neither the King of France, nor the duke of Ferrara, were named in the treaty as enemies of the allies: but that might readily be comprehended, ſince the driſt of this league was reſtoring to his Sanctity the city of Bologna, and whatever appertained to the holy See, and making war on all perſons whatever who ſhould offer to obſtruct it. Room was left for the Emperor in caſe he would pleaſe to accede; and don Ramon de Cardona, Viceroy of Naples, was declared general of the league.

A more ſolemn opening of the council of Piſa. Guicciard.

While the world was in expectation of the effect of this alliance, the council of Piſa was ſolemnly opened in that city, by the cardinals who had convened it, and ſome biſhops of France and Milan. The firſt ſeſſion was held the 4th of November, tho' the Pontif had excommunicated the cardinals, and deprived them of their dignity. The ſecond was held the eleventh of the ſame month: but by reaſon of a commotion in the city that day, the cardinals and prelates were ſo terrified, that on the morrow they removed the council to Milan, where they expected to be more out of danger. Indeed, the Piſans could not look with a good eye on a council which expoſed them to excommunication and interdict, tho' it was not in their power to oppoſe the orders of the Florentines their Sovereigns.

The council removes to Milan.

The Swiſſers march into the Milaneſe. Guicciard.

I obſerved that the Swiſſers were at variance with Lewis XII, thro' the intrigues of the cardinal of Sion, or rather of the Pope himſelf, who ſet him to work. Their firſt attempt to enter the Milaneſe proving unſucceſsful, they reſolved this year to levy ſixteen thouſand men, the cardinal of Sion having poſitively promiſed them money at their entrance into Italy, and that the army of the allies would imploy the French in La Romagna. As this levy could not be ready 'till the begining of winter, they began their march in November, and penetrated as far as Vareſe. Gaſton de Foix, nephew of Lewis XII, governor of Milan, was ſo deſtitute of troops, that he knew not how to oppoſe their paſſage: however, with the few men he had, he took the field, to annoy them and obſtruct their march; but it was not poſſible for him to prevent their advancing even to the gates of Milan. The French had already begun to furniſh the caſtle with ammunition in order to quit the city, when ſuddenly the Swiſſers, hearing no news of the Pope, nor the army of the allies which they thought to be aſſembled in La Romagna, retired to their own country, after burning ſome villages. If the Pope had not diſappointed them of the money he had promiſed, and if the confederate army had acted in La Romagna, Milan, Bologna and Ferrara would have been in extreme danger, ſince the French were at that time very weak in thoſe parts. La Paliſſe was then in Maximilian's army with a large detachment of the King's beſt troops.

They retire ſuddenly.

Falſe policy of Henry VIII to meddle with the affairs of Italy.

Nothing could be more advantageous to England than to ſee the forces of France turned againſt Italy. The conqueſt of the duchy of Milan was leſs beneficial to Lewis XII than to England; for it procured England a ſettled tranquillity, whereas it expoſed France to perpetual troubles, and intolerable expenſes. It was therefore policy in Henry to ſuffer the French, Germans, Italians and Spaniards to conteſt it in Italy, without involving himſelf in a war which could never procure him any advantage. To the time I am ſpeaking of, the Kings of England had taken care not to interfere with the affairs of thoſe quarters, if we except Henry III, who, having unluckily taken it into his head to attempt making his ſecond ſon King of Sicily, ruined his own kingdom to execute that extravagant project: but he was not a Prince to be imitated by his ſucceſſors. The advantages of this policy were ſo manifeſt to all the Engliſh, that it required no leſs than a Ferdinand, the ſubtileſt and moſt intriguing Prince of his time, to induce them to deviate therefrom.

This Prince had ingaged himſelf with the Pope ever ſince the begining of 1510, or perhaps the end of the preceding year, and yet had been two years without declaring. This delay proceeded only from his deſire to ſecure England firſt, that Henry might make in France a diverſion, which would oblige Lewis XII to neglect the affairs of Italy: which diverſion muſt have been advantageous to the King of Aragon, ſince it would remove from Italy, or at leaſt weaken, a very formidable rival; but it is not eaſy to conceive wherein it could be ſerviceable to England. On the contrary, there ſeemed to be ſeveral very ſtrong reaſons to divert Henry from ſuch a deſign, without mentioning the peace he had lately renewed with France, and confirmed by a ſolemn oath: this probably was the cauſe of his ſo long defering the concluſion of that league I ſhall ſpeak of preſently. Indeed it was not poſſible but that ſome of the King's council were clear-ſighted enough to perceive that this league was no way advantageous to England, what color ſoever was given it.

The Pope excommunicates all the adherents of the council of Piſa.

While this negociation languiſhed in England, new occurrences put Ferdinand on taking freſh meaſures, and contriving variety of means to ſucceed with Henry. Lewis XII perſiſted in his deſign to hold the council of Piſa, as was ſaid, and that cauſed Julius II to convene another at the Lateran, and excommunicate by the ſame bull all Princes and others who adhered to the firſt. Among theſe Princes was John d'Albret, King of Navarre, who, being allied to Lewis XII, blindly followed the di-

(1) In the treaty, as it ſtands in Rymer, it is only ſaid, that the Pope was to furniſh ſix hundred men at arms, without any mention of light horſe and foot: neither is the number of troops to be ſent by the Venetians ſpecified; but it is ſaid, they were to find a fleet ſtrong enough to beat the enemy's: and, on the day of the league's publication, the Pope and Venetians were to pay eighty thouſand ducats of gold for two months wages for their forces. rections of the court of France. The King of Navarre had no ſooner declared for the council of Piſa, but Ferdinand, on that pretenſe, formed the deſign to ſeize his whole kingdom, and make Henry his ſon-in-law the inſtrument to execute it. To that end he gave Henry to underſtand, that a fair opportunity offered to recover Guienne, taken by France from one of his predeceſſors, ſince the league, which was on the point of being concluded in Italy, would find Lewis XII ſo much imployment, that probably he would not be able to defend his own country: but, as the diſtance of Guienne might deter Henry from attempting this conqueſt, Ferdinand, out of the affection he bore him, very readily promiſed to furniſh out troops, tranſport ſhips, artillery, proviſions and ammunition, without ſtipulating any thing for himſelf, but the ſole pleaſure of procuring his ſon-in-law ſuch a conſiderable advantage. This offer opened the eyes of Henry and his council (1). The acquiſition of Guienne ſeemed to them a thing ſo beneficial, and withal ſo glorious in the begining of this reign, that the King, without any farther difficulty, entered into the league propoſed by the Pope, Ferdinand, and the Venetians. Such was the real motive (2) which induced the court of England to break the peace lately renewed with France, without alledging other reaſon than the protection granted by Lewis to the Bentivoglii, and convening the unlawful aſſembly at Piſa: as if it was any way England's concern to procure Bologna for the Pope, and oppoſe with arms a council conſiſting of twenty French biſhops, without power and credit even in the very place where they were aſſembled. We ſhall ſee preſently, how Henry was the dupe of his affectionate father-in-law, and how Ferdinand politicly made uſe of him to ſerve his own ends, without giving himſelf the leaſt trouble about his ſon-in-laws affairs.

Henry determines on carrying war into Guienne. Herbert. Hall.

When Ferdinand had gained Henry, he, at Rome, concluded with the Pope and Venetians the above-cited league. In this treaty of Rome, it was expreſly ſaid, that all the articles were negociated and ſettled with the King of England's participation, the cardinal of York acting for him, and daily expecting orders to ſign it; but that, for certain reaſons, the concluſion thereof could not be any longer delayed.

About ſix weeks after, Henry and Ferdinand concluded, at London, a private league for the conqueſt of Guienne. This was a conſequence of the firſt, on ſuppoſition, that depriving the King of France of that province was a good means to ſerve and protect God's church, the great and principal aim of the allies. If ever the Almighty's ſacred name was openly and ſhameleſly taken in vain, it is in the preambles of theſe two treaties. In the firſt, the Pope proteſted, that his ſole view in deſiring Bologna and the other ſtates appertaining to the church, was to reſtore Italy to her priſtine tranquillity, that all Chriſtians might join their forces againſt the Infidels, as he had ever wiſhed, and ſtill did ſigh after moſt cordially. Thus, to make war upon the Infidels, it was neceſſary that Italy ſhould be free from troubles, which could not be hoped 'till the Pontif had executed his ambitious projects, without which Italy muſt not expect to injoy any repoſe.

League between Henry and Ferdinand for the conqueſt of Guienne. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 311. Nov. 17.

False motives of the league of Rome.

In the ſecond treaty, Henry and Ferdinand ſet forth; "That they had made alliances with all "Chriſtian Princes, ſolely to be inabled to war "upon the enemies of Chriſt; and, for that "purpoſe, were now imployed in preparing "powerful armies by land and ſea; but that ſuddenly, when they leaſt expected it, they were "told, the King of France's troops were beſieging "Bologna, where the Pope, aged and infirm, lay "ſeized with a grievous diſtemper, and attended "by all his cardinals: that being extremely afflicted "at this news, they had, by letters and embaſſadors, "beſought the King of France to deſiſt from this "his deſign: that his Sanctity had offered him a "pardon for all his ſins, provided only he would "abſtain from the patrimony of the church; ceaſe "to inflame the ſchiſm, and adhere to the council "of Lateran; but that all this had been quite in-"effectual. On the contrary, he had poſſeſſed "himſelf of Bologna, by the perfidy of ſome of "the inhabitants; twice routed the ſacred Roman "church's army, and, in contempt of the holy "See, called a council, having firſt corrupted "certain of the cardinals. That the Pontif had "ſince diſpatched to him a legate, only and ſolely "to requeſt of him that he would forbear attacking the church: that the legate not prevailing, "the two Kings of England and Spain had ſent "embaſſadors, amicably to admoniſh him to deſiſt "from his attempts, and be reconciled with the "Pope, or elſe they could do no leſs than undertake the church's protection; but that their "brotherly exhortations had been ſlighted and "contemned. That, on all theſe conſiderations, "the two Kings, perfectly knowing how detrimental ſuch ambition might prove to the holy Catholic faith, God's church and the whole Chriſtian common-weal, had thought proper to agree "on the following articles, to the praiſe and glory "of Almighty God, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and "the whole triumphant court of Heaven, for the "defenſe, exaltation and increaſe of the Catholic "faith, the Chriſtian religion and the holy Roman "church, which was unjuſtly oppreſſed, and thro' "the frequent inſtances, exhortations, and admo-"nitions of his Holineſs, the head thereof." The ſubſtance of this pious treaty was as follows:

Articles of the league of London between Henry and Ferdinand.

I. The two Kings took upon them the defenſe and protection of the holy Roman church, againſt all perſons who ſhould preſume to attack it.

II. Ferdinand, as Catholic King, and to diſcharge his duty to God and the church, promiſed to take arms in her defenſe in Italy.

In the IIId article it was ſaid, that the Pope and the ſacred college of cardinals had judged that, in order to deliver the church from the oppreſſion under which ſhe groaned, it was requiſite to make war upon the King of France, not only in Italy, but likewiſe in ſuch of his provinces as bordered on the two allies: and therefore it was agreed, that they ſhould carry their arms into Guienne, and conquer that province for the crown of England, and that King Henry, in aſſiſting the church, might at the ſame time recover what to him rightfully appertained: that in order thereto, as ſoon as Ferdinand ſhould have actually declared againſt the kingdom of France, and taken arms in the church's defenſe, Henry, at a proper ſeaſon, ſhould proclaim war againſt the ſame Prince in the ſame church's behalf.

Ferdinand, on his part, bound himſelf to find five hundred men at arms, fifteen hundred light horſe, and four thouſand foot, on the ſame terms: moreover, he ingaged to furniſh the Engliſh troops with proviſions and ammunition at moderate rates. It was farther agreed, that each of the two Kings ſhould put to ſea, for ſix months, a navy, with three thouſand well-appointed ſoldiers, excluſive of ſufficient mariners, and that neither ſhould recall his fleet without the other's concurrence.

IX. That by this, the former treaties ſhould not be deemed void, but, on the contrary, remain in full force.

X. That it ſhould be ratified within four months, by Henry and Ferdinand, by the latter in his own name, and in that of Queen Juana his daughter.

Imprudence of Henry and his council.

Henry and his council doubtleſs fancied they had made a very advantageous treaty, ſince it was to procure them the duchy of Guienne, while King Ferdinand demanded nothing for himſelf, as if he had acted purely from a motive of religion, and out of affection to his ſon-in-law, tho', in reality, he had conſulted only his own intereſt. As for the Pope's affairs, about which both Kings ſeemed to be ſo greatly concerned, it may be affirmed they did not even think of them, as it afterwards appeared: but they wanted that pretext to dazzle the public, tho' in all appearance, the world was not ſo blind as to imagine that two potent Monarchs ſhould arm themſelves purpoſely to diſſolve a council which ſtiled itſelf general, compoſed of a ſmall number of prelates of only one nation, and ſo little regarded that, even at Milan whither it was removed, the magiſtrates were forced to imploy their whole authority to procure its reception.

Lewis's ſuſpicions of the Emperor. Guicciard.

During theſe tranſactions, the Emperor gave the King of France ſo much cauſe to ſuſpect his ſincerity, that neceſſity alone obliged him to feign any farther confidence in him. Not one German biſhop approached the council; and when the Emperor was preſſed on that head, he replied, "It was requiſite firſt to have the Imperial diet's approbation "which he did not doubt of obtaining: that, "tho' he ſhould ſend biſhops from his hereditary dominions to Piſa, it would be more prejudicial than advantageous to the council, ſince it "would give occaſion to imagine, he deſpaired of "obtaining the diet's conſent." On the other hand, inſtead of perſonally commanding his army in the Venetian territory, as he had promiſed, he left all to thoſe troops which from France came to his aſſiſtance, In ſhort, while he liſtened to the offers of the Pope, Ferdinand and the Venetians, he told the French embaſſador, he was ready to march to Rome at the head of an army, provided his maſter would ſend him a ſtrong re-inforcement, and a ſum of money proportionable to ſo great an undertaking. Amidſt theſe uncertainties, Lewis knew not what he might truſt to. He could not regard Maximilian any otherwiſe than as an ally ready to abandon him, if he found that joining with his enemies would turn to better account: in which caſe, all the Emperor's conqueſts upon the Venetians would be ſo many loſſes to France. Mean while, the ſuccors he furniſhed were very expenſive, and yet he durſt not give him any handle to change ſides. Thus Lewis ſaw himſelf on the point of being attacked by the whole united forces of the Pope, the King of Spain, and the Venetians, without hope of any aid from the Emperor. As for England, tho' he was yet ignorant of the treaty of London, and Henry's embaſſador poſitively denied his maſter had the leaſt thought of interfering, Henry's intire procedure was a demonſtrable indication that he would ſoon declare againſt him.

Mean while, the Pope, who had conſtantly in view the recovery of Bologna and Ferrara, was very preſſing with the viceroy of Naples to advance with his troops, and take command of the confederate army: but, notwithſtanding all his ſollicitations, the junction could not be 'till the middle of December, and even then, the Naples artillery not being yet arrived, the army could be imployed only in a few trifling expeditions in La Romagna, with which ended the year 1511. It is time now to return to the affairs of England.

Hall. Herbert. Hollingſh.

Tho' Henry had not yet proclaimed war with France, Lewis XII was ſenſible what he was to expect. He had good intelligence by means of one Buonviſo, a Luccheſe merchant, who being bankrupt was retired into England, where he had obtained ſo much favor from the Pope as to be made a ſort of agent (2). This man, being corrupted by France, diſcovered to Lewis the ſecrets wherewith the Pope was ſometimes obliged to truſt him; and hence it was that the court of France became acquainted with many particulars which the Engliſh would gladly have concealed from them. It was probably by this means that the King of France had his firſt notice of the league concluded at London, tho' it was made a great ſecret: but ſhortly after he had no farther need of ſpies to know Henry's intentions.

Lewis has notice of the league of London.

AN' 1512. Henry acquaints the parliament with his deſigns, and obtains a ſubſidy. Herbert. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The parliament being met the fourth of February, King Henry communicated his deſign of making war upon France. He proteſted, his ſole aim was to free the Pope from the King of France's oppreſſion, and eſpecially to cauſe the ſchiſmatical council of Piſa, now removed to Milan, to be diſſolved. Tho' the war, undertaken, as Henry himſelf affirmed, ſolely to oblige the Pope, was little agreeable to the intereſt of England, the parliament however gave the King a large ſubſidy (3). In all appearance, the leading members of the houſe house of commons, being informed of the true reasons, so ordered it that the rest sided with them in their opinion; otherwise, it would have been difficult to make them comprehend the necessity of England's ingaging in a war with France merely to restore Bologna to the Pope, and dissolve a council so inconsiderable as that of Pisa. Before the parliament broke up, the King was pleased to restore John Dudley, son of Edmund Dudley, to the rank and honors his family had been deprived of by the father's attainder: from that time, he always bore him affection, and at length, towards the close of his reign, made him lord admiral of England.

Edmund Dudley's son restored. Herbert.

The war Henry intended to undertake against France, having for pretext dissolving the council of Pisa, he could not dispense with acknowledging that of Lateran, and sending thither embassadors. He made choice of Silvester bishop of Worcester, with sir Robert Wingfield, and commissioned them to agree, in his name, to whatever should be deemed necessary for the church's reformation, as well in the head as members. This clause was only to cast a mist before peoples eyes, since, most certainly, nothing was farther from the thoughts of his Holiness than to indeavor in this council either his own or the church's reformation.

The time being come to execute the projects agreed by Henry and Ferdinand in the treaty of London, Henry gave the command of his navy to sir Edward Howard, the earl of Surrey's eldest son (1); and of his land-army to Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorset (2). All the troops which were to serve in the Guienne expedition, being imbarked towards the close of May, in Spanish vessels, arrived the eighth of June at Passage, in the province of Guipuscoa, where the marquis of Dorset landed those he was to command. Lord Herbert says, these troops consisted of ten thousand men, but probably he included in that number the three thousand who were to serve at sea, according to the treaty (3).

The marquis of Dorset leads an army into Spain. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 329. Hall. Stow. Herbert. Hollingsh.

The admiral having convoyed the marquis of Dorset to Spain, put to sea again, and arriving on the coast of Bretagne, landed some troops, and plundered the country (4). Henry hearing, the King of France was preparing a great naval armament, sent a reinforcement (5) to his admiral, which inabled him to make head against the French. The two fleets meeting the tenth of August, came to a furious ingagement, which ended in great loss on both sides. The Regent, a first-rate ship, and the Cordeliere, commanded by Primauget (6), being grappled, were both blown up, with loss of their whole equipage: this accident happened thro' the desperate resolution of Primauget who, finding he could not save his ship, set fire to the powder (7).

Hall. Stow. Hollingsh. Pol. Virg.

The treaty of league, concluded at London, seemed to be made only to pave the way for Henry to the conquest of Guienne: but Ferdinand had never any such thought. His sole aim was to conquer Navarre for himself, and imploy to that end the English troops he had sent for into Spain: but as it was not by any means proper to inform Henry of such a project, he had been obliged to allure him with the hopes of recovering Guienne, in order to induce him to send his troops. This is the true reason why Ferdinand in the treaty shewed so much disinterestedness, that all the advantage seemed to be on the side of England: but the performance was very far from answering the ingagement.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1512.

Ferdinand's private designs to conquer Navarre.

The marquis of Dorset being arrived in Guipuscoa, found a commissioner of the King, who paid him great respect, and told him, the duke of Alva was taking the field in order to join him; and indeed, the duke immediately put himself at the head of the Spanish army: but instead of joining the English, who were incamped near Fontarabia with design with him to besiege the city of Bayona, as was resolved, he kept at Logrono on the borders of Navarre. He intimated to the English general; "That the King of Navarre being in alliance "with France, it would be very dangerous to at- "tack Bayona with Navarre behind them: that "while they should be imployed in the siege, the "King of Navarre might introduce the French "into his dominions, join with them, and, by in- "camping between the mountains of Navarre and "the sea, cut off the provisions which should be "brought to the camp before Bayona, without be- "ing obliged to give battle, except he pleased: "that therefore it was necessary, before they in- "gaged in the siege, to attempt gaining the King of "Navarre to the interests of their masters."

His many artifices to compass his ends. Hall. Stow. Hollingsh.

These reasons were so plausible, that the marquis of Dorset was easily persuaded to send an English officer to the King of Navarre, to require him to join with the allies. Ferdinand summoned him likewise, but more magisterially, to forsake the King of France, and come into the league (8). The King of Navarre replied, he was resolved to stand neutral: but the English and Spaniards, not satisfied with this answer, jointly pressed him to declare himself, or deliver four of his towns for their security, which that Prince would not grant. During these negociations, a French army, commanded by the duke of Longueville, approached the frontiers of Bearn; whereupon the marquis of Dorset complained to Ferdinand; "That the time lost in sol- "liciting the King of Navarre, had served only to "give the French opportunity to advance in de- "fense of their borders:" and withal pressed him to declare; "whether he would attack Guienne, pur-

Ferdinand anſwered; "Prudence would not ſuffer him to ſend "his army to Fontarabia to beſiege Bayona, and "leave his dominions expoſed to the invaſions of "the French and Navarrois: that it was much "more convenient to paſs thro' Navarre, and ſe-"cure three or four places, in order to prevent his "enemies from making uſe of that kingdom againſt "him: that therefore he wiſhed the Engliſh "would join the duke of Alva, and his army "ſhould compoſe the vanguard, to be expoſed to "the firſt dangers: that nevertheleſs the ſiege of "Bayona would not be retarded, becauſe un-"doubtedly the King of Navarre would not be "diſſatisfied at being ſomewhat preſſed, in order "to juſtify himſelf to the King of France, when "he ſhould accede to the league." The marquis of Dorſet, who ſaw not yet into his deſigns, having held a council of war, replied; "That, by "his inſtructions, he could not undertake any thing "againſt the King of Navarre: but if the duke of "Alva would paſs thro' that kingdom, he might "if he pleaſed; but, for his part, being already "near Bayona, he could not think of taking ſo "great a compaſs to join him."

The duke of Alva beſieges Pampluna. Guicciard. Hall. Herbert.

Ferdinand was not content with this anſwer. He ſtrongly inſiſted on what he had propoſed, that the Engliſh troops ſhould join his army, and, in the mean while, gave orders to the duke of Alva to beſiege Pampluna, capital of Navarre. During the ſiege, he continually amuſed the marquis of Dorſet with poſitive promiſes that, immediately after taking Pampluna, the duke of Alva ſhould join him to beſiege Bayona. Mean while, the King of Navarre, unable to defend himſelf, was retired into France, where he made a treaty with Lewis XII, for their common defenſe: but it coſt him the town of Salvatierra, and all Bearn, whereof he was obliged to put the French in poſſeſſion.

The King of Navarre retires to France.

Pampluna having ſurrendered by capitulation, the twenty-fifth of July, Ferdinand, anſwerably to his ingagement, ſhould have ordered the duke of Alva to join the Engliſh: but the reſt of the fortified towns in Navarre ſerved him for pretext to delay the junction; ſo the duke of Alva purſued his conqueſts, while the Engliſh troops, tho' without ſtiring from their camp, ſerved as a countenance to his deſigns: for, in effect, notwithſtanding the French, who daily received freſh ſupplies, found themſelves ſtrong enough to cope with the duke of Alva, they never durſt enter Navarre, for fear of coming between the Engliſh and Spaniards; wherefore, being contented to remain incamped between Bayona and Salvatierra, they gave the duke of Alva all the leiſure he wanted to reduce in a manner all Navarre.

The duke of Alva overruns Navarre.

Then it was that the marquis of Dorſet evidently perceived the King of Aragon acted not with ſincerity, and that his deſign, from the very firſt, was not to invade Guienne, but conquer Navarre. Ferdinand was very ſenſible his artifice would at laſt be diſcovered; ſo, to prevent the complaints the Engliſh general might make to the King his maſter, he diſpatched away to England a courier, to inform Henry, after his manner, of the affairs of that country, and withal requeſting him to injoin his general to act in concert with him. Henry, who had not received from the marquis any intelligence contradictory to what Ferdinand ſent him, readily gave the deſired orders, which were carried to the general by Windſor herald at arms.

The marquis of Dorſet penetrates into Ferdinand's artifices. Ferdinand procures orders for the marquis to obey him; Hall. Herbert. Hollingſh.

While the herald was on his journey, the duke of Alva poſſeſſed himſelf of St. Juan de Pie del Puerto. Preſently after taking that place, Ferdinand acquainted the marquis of Dorſet, that his army was ready to march into Guienne, and deſired him to join the duke of Alva without delay: but the marquis was no longer in a diſpoſition to be deceived. He knew, the French army was intrenched between Bayona and Salvatierra, with the River Bidaſſoa in front, which muſt be paſſed within view, and beſide, Bayona was ſo well provided, that there was no likelihood of ſucceeding in the attempt. Thus what Ferdinand propoſed was impracticable, and only a continuation of his artifices. From St. Juan de Pie del Puerto, the right-hand road leads to Bearn, and the left to Bayona; ſo the duke of Alva's intent was to ingage the Engliſh to enter Bearn with him, under color there was no other way to draw the enemies from their advantageous poſt, or at leaſt to inveſt Salvatierra: but the Engliſh general, having no orders to make war upon the King of Navarre, either in Bearn or elſewhere, refuſed to join the Spaniards. Ferdinand reaped this advantage from his refuſal, that he caſt on him the whole blame of their not invading Guienne according to the treaty. After that, the duke of Alva turning back, laid ſiege to Eſtella, the only place the King of Navarre had remaining.

The marquis refuſes ſerving him.

The marquis of Dorſet, full of indignation at theſe proceedings, and conſidering that his army was daily weakened by ſickneſs and want of proviſions, wherewith he had been but very ſparingly ſupplied ſince the war in Navarre, deſired Ferdinand to furniſh him with ſhips for his return. It was with great difficulty that he obtained his requeſt, Ferdinand ſtill proteſting againſt his departure, as directly contrary to the treaty: not that he was much concerned at it, ſince the Engliſh were become in a manner uſeleſs, after the conqueſt of Navarre. Mean while, the marquis of Dorſet falling ſick, lord Thomas Howard took command of the army. At the ſame time, as the troops were juſt on the point of imbarking, the herald arrived from England, with poſitive orders to the general, to obey the commands of King Ferdinand (1): but the army thereupon mutinying, it was impoſſible to detain the ſoldiers any longer in Spain, and, the imbarcation being made, they arrived in England in November. Henry was at firſt very angry with his general; but, being informed of all particulars during the campain, he ſaw evidently that Ferdinand had deceived him, and that his affected diſintereſtedneſs in the treaty of league was only to draw him more eaſily into the ſnare. He thought proper however to diſſemble, for fear of giving Ferdinand a pretext to join with France, and leave him imbaraſſed.

Henry perceives he had been impoſed on.

Before the year was expired, Ferdinand ſaw himſelf in full poſſeſſion of Navarre, tho' the King of France had uſed ſome indeavors to wreſt that conqueſt out of his hands. In December, the King of Navarre and Francis duke of Angoulême beſieged Pampluna; but, not being able to carry it, they were forced to abandon the reſt of the Kingdom to the Spaniards. After Ferdinand was in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he ſought pretenſes to keep it, but found no better than a bull of Pope Julius II, who excommunicated John d'Albret King of Navarre, and gave his kingdom in prey to the conqueror. Mezerai affirms, this bull never appeared; but lord Herbert ſays, it was dated March 1, 1512.

taking the field in December, Pope Julius cauſed the viceroy to be continually preſſed by cardinal Gio. di Medicis his legate, to beſiege Bologna. At length, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the viceroy and Venetian general, who foreſaw great difficulties in the execution of that deſign, the Pope's inſtances were to be complied with, and the ſiege of Bologna being reſolved, the confederate army (1) appeared before that city: but Gaſton de Foix, duke of Nemours and governor of Milan, coming to its relief, obliged the allies to withdraw. Some days after, he defeated a Venetian army at Breſcia, and ſlew eight thouſand men. Finally, on the eleventh of April, finding means to give the allies battle near Ravenna, he put them to rout, and took the legate priſoner; but was, after the ingagement, himſelf ſlain in too warmly purſuing a body of Spaniards who were retreating in good order. After that Prince's death, La Paliſſe took command of the army, and next day became maſter of Ravenna: whereupon all the towns of La Romagna, taken by the Pope after the battle of Agnadel, voluntarily ſurrendered to cardinal San Severino, who was in the French army as legate of the council of Piſa, transfered to Milan.

He routs the allies, but is himſelf killed.

La Paliſſe is maſter of all La Romagna. Guicciard.

The conſternation at Rome was ſo great, that the cardinals went in a body to petition his Holineſs to make peace with France: but Julius II had reſources unknown perhaps to the cardinals; ſo, all they could obtain was, to ingage him to make ſome feigned advances in order to gain time, and hinder the French from marching to Rome, as they might eaſily have done without fear of meeting any obſtacle.

The Pope tries to gain time.

While Lewis's affairs ſeemed to be in the moſt flouriſhing condition, they were in reality falling to decay. The Swiſſers, incouraged by the cardinal of Sion, preparing to exert their utmoſt to invade the duchy of Milan, La Paliſſe judged it more for his maſter's intereſt to relieve that country, which was deſtitute of troops, than make conqueſts in the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate. So, leaving cardinal San Severino in La Romagna, with five or ſix thouſand men, he haſtily marched into Milan. The retreat of the French, when they had it in their power to have marched even to Rome, inſpired Julius II with freſh courage. From thenceforward he would no more hear of peace, tho' Lewis XII offered him the ſame terms as before the victory. At this juncture it was that the Lateran council was opened, the third of May, which had been delayed by reaſon of the incounter at Ravenna.

Opening of the Lateran council.

All hope of peace vaniſhing, the Pope excommunicated Lewis XII, and put all France under interdict (2). He took for pretext the capture of his legate, who was detained at Milan, where, tho' a priſoner, he performed however the functions of Pope's legate, thoſe of Milan refuſing to own the authority of the council held in their city. It was a great mortification to Lewis, to ſee his council contemned by his own ſubjects; but this was only a ſmall part of the misfortunes to which he was expoſed this ſame year. After La Paliſſe had quited La Romagna, all the towns of that country ſubmited to Julius. At the ſame time, Ferdinand got poſſeſſion of Navarre, and Lewis was forced to ſend into Bearn an army to hinder the Engliſh and Spaniards from invading Guienne. On the other hand, the Emperor concluded a truce with Venice, and ſecretly promiſed to withdraw from the French army a body of German troops, lent Lewis for defenſe of the Milaneſe: and yet, on the aſſurance of this aid it was that Lewis recalled from Milan part of his forces, not doubting that, with thoſe he left there, and the Germans ſent him by the Emperor, he ſhould be able to reſiſt his enemies. Thus, the French finding themſelves weak in the duchy of Milan, La Paliſſe was obliged to recal cardinal San Severino with his troops, which occaſioned the loſs of La Romagna.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1512.

Mean while, the Swiſſers, to the number of ſixteen thouſand, began their march about the end of Auguſt, or begining of September: but, inſtead of taking the direct road to the Milaneſe, the paſſes whereof they queſtioned not were ſtrongly guarded, they marched to Trent, with Maximilian's permiſſion. Tho' this (if ever any was ſuch) was the procedure of a profeſſed enemy, this Prince ſtill indeavored to veil his intentions, by telling the French embaſſador, that his alliance with the Swiſſers admited not his refuſing them a paſſage thro' his territories; as if his treaty with Lewis XII was to be leſs obſerved. The Swiſſers having paſſed unmoleſted thro' Trent, proceeded to Verona, and, joining the Venetians, they marched together towards Milan; whereupon the French, abſolutely diſconcerted, and not being above ten thouſand ſtrong, reſolved to retire into the fortified towns, in order to waſte the enemy's army by ſieges, 'till the King ſhould ſend them ſupplies, or the approaching winter ſtop the confederates progreſs: but they were ſoon deprived of this refuge, by the Emperor's orders for his troops to retire immediately. Theſe orders being punctually obeyed, La Paliſſe found himſelf ſo weak that, deſpairing to ſave the Milaneſe, he determined on repaſſing the mountains, and returning to France. The prelates of the council, ſeeing Milan ready to be abandoned, made a ſudden decree to remove the council to Lyons, and followed the French army. They would have taken with them cardinal di Medicis, but went away in ſuch confuſion that his friends found means to ſecure him. After the French were retired, all the towns of the duchy readily ſurrendered to the Swiſſers and Venetians, except Parma, Plaſenza, and Reggio, which ſubmited to Pope Julius. On the other hand, Alexander Bentivoglio, not thinking himſelf ſafe in Bologna, departed thence with his whole family, leaving the city to the Pontif's mercy. Thus Julius II, who, about a month before, ſaw himſelf in a moſt unpromiſing ſituation, was arrived at the height of his wiſhes by this ſurpriſing revolution, which reſtored him Ravenna, Bologna, all La Romagna, and drove the French from Italy.

In order to complete this Pontif's felicity, four matters yet remained to be effected; viz. to diſpoſſeſs the duke of Ferrara; to reſtore the Sforza family to Milan; that of Medicis to Florence; and laſtly, to expel the Germans and Spaniards from Italy. As for the duke of Ferrara, he voluntarily delivered himſelf to the Pope, on the faith of a ſafe conduct: a piece of imprudence which would have coſt him dear, had he not been freed by Fabricio Colonna, his friend, who forced the guard ſet at the gates of Rome, to hinder his departure.

The French were no ſooner out of Italy, than the allies began to diſcover their different views in acting againſt France. On this occaſion, they judged proper to meet at Mantoua, where they could agree only upon two articles, namely, that Maximilian Sforza, eldeſt ſon of Lodovica il Moro, should be reſtored to Milan, and the Medicis family to Florence. In conſequence of this laſt reſolution, the confederates army approaching Florence, compeled the Florentines to conſent to a treaty, whereby the Medici were reſtored to their country as citizens only, and not as governors. But cardinal di Medicis entering the city by virtue of this treaty, while the army of the allies was at the gates, found means to introduce many officers and ſoldiers, and raiſe a ſedition which made him maſter of the city: whereupon the government was ſettled on the ſame foot it was before the Medici were exiled.

Florence ſubmits to the Medici. Guicciard.

It was a very conſiderable advantage for Pope Julius to have reſtored the Medici to Florence, and Sforza to Milan: but this ſufficed not to content his ſaid Holineſs. The duke of Ferrara was ſtill maſter of his duchy, and the council of Piſa yet ſubſiſting at Lyons: the allies muſt therefore be brought to turn their arms again Ferrara, and procure a peace between Maximilian and the Venetians, that his ſaid Imperial Majeſty might no longer ſcruple abandoning his council. With this view it was that Julius obtained a ſecond meeting at Rome, where he could not gain any thing with reſpect to Ferrara, that duke being protected by the King of Aragon: beſide, the Venetians could not be prevailed on to find men and money merely to put the Pontif in poſſeſſion of that duchy. With regard to a pacification between the Emperor and Venice, he found ſtill greater difficulties, tho' he paſſionately longed to accompliſh that project, for fear one or other of the two Powers ſhould recall the French into Italy: but the intolerable terms propoſed by the Emperor to the Venetians prevented his ſucceeding.

Julius at length finding his labor fruitleſs, and being willing, at any rate whatever, to diſſolve the council of Piſa, and hinder the French from returning to Italy, concluded with the Emperor a league offenſive and defenſive againſt Venice. By this treaty, the Emperor ingaged to become a principal party in the league of Rome, and agreed, that the Pope ſhould keep Parma, Plaſenza, and Reggio, ſaving however the rights of the Empire. He promiſed to renounce the council of Piſa, and forſake the duke of Ferrara, and the Bentivoglii. Julius, on his part, ingaged to aid the Emperor with his whole force, thunder his cenſures againſt the Venetians, declare them excluded from the league of Rome, and drop his proſecution againſt Colonna for having aſſiſted the duke of Ferrara in making his eſcape. The treaty being ſigned and ratified, the biſhop of Gurck, as Maximilian's lieutenant, did, at the next ſeſſion of the Lateran council, renounce the aſſembly of Piſa, and revoke whatever had been done by the Emperor towards calling and ſupporting it.

Remarks on the year 1512.

I have now run thro' the occurrence of the year 1512, a year very remarkable for the ſeveral changes in the affairs of Italy, and ſtill more for the conduct of the Princes concerned, which diſplays their different characters. Lewis XII was the dupe of his ſcruples, which made him loſe the opportunity of depriving his enemy the Pope of all power to annoy him, and in the end occaſioned his loſing the Milaneſe. Julius II made religion a tool to his immoderate ambition, by uſing God's glory and the church's advantage for a cloak to gratify his paſſions. Having formed a league to reſtore the Venetians to their dominions, to the glory of God and exaltation of the Chriſtian faith, he concluded another, on the ſame pretenſe, to diſpoſſeſs them of all they had recovered. Ferdinand drew Henry VIII into a war for the Pope's defenſe, and to procure Guienne for the crown of England; but artfully made it ſubſervient to the conqueſt of Navarre for himſelf. The Emperor Maximilian acted with no more ſincerity: his conduct was the more extraordinary, as he was ſolely indebted to Lews XII for all he had conquered in Italy, after the league of Cambray; nay, the very preſervation of his conqueſts was wholly owing to that Prince's continual ſupplies: nevertheleſs, no ſooner did he behold him on the brink of a dangerous precipice, but, with a conſummate ingratitude, he lent his hand to puſh him down. It is ſaid, he had a book, wherein he marked, in red letters, the injuries received from the King of France: but I know not in what color Lewis XII ſhould have writ in his book the wrong done him by Maximilian on this occaſion. As for Henry VIII, he certainly was the dupe of the King of Aragon and Pope Julius: but what is yet more aſtoniſhing, after Ferdinand and his Holineſs, by their artifices, had ingaged that Prince in a league againſt France, as ſoon as affairs had taken ſuch a turn that they no longer wanted his aſſiſtance, they thought no more of him than if no ſuch perſon had exiſted. In all negociations between the allies, whether at Mantoua or Rome, after the retreat of the French, cardinal Bambridge was never called to them, neither was there any mention of the King of England. The Pope and King of Aragon, ſatisfied with expeling the French, forſook Henry, without troubling themſelves about his concerns: nay it even ſeems as if not the leaſt notice had been given him of theſe negociations. We ſee, in Rymer's collection, that the tenth of November he ſtill gave full powers to his embaſſadors at ſeveral courts, to treat of a league in favor of Julius, at the juncture when that Pontif abſolutely neglected the intereſts of England. About the ſame time, Henry ſigned letters patent, declaring he acceded to the league concluded at Rome a year before, tho', ſince that, Julius II was in poſſeſſion of Ravenna, all La Romagna, Parma, Plaſenza, Reggio, and his deſires had been accompliſhed by Lewis's loſs of Genoua and Milan, and by the Emperor's renouncing the aſſembly of Piſa. Thus, he was evidently the dupe of all theſe intrigues. Without knowing it, he lent Ferdinand his troops to conquer Navarre. On the other hand, the terror of his arms was greatly ſubſervient to the Pope's deſigns, as it hindered Lewis XII from keeping in Italy a body of troops, as believing his forces neceſſary for the defenſe of France againſt the Engliſh. This was the real aim of Julius and Ferdinand, and Henry was ſo blind as, without any neceſſity, to ingage in a war with France for their intereſt, imagining he was acting for his own.

Who would not have thought that this experience ſhould have rendered Henry wiſer and more circumſpect? and yet he was farther amuſed by theſe very Princes, who told him that, having nothing more to fear in Italy, they were about uniting their whole forces to invade France, and if he alſo would act his part, he might eaſily recover Guienne and Normandy. Henry, perſuaded of their ſincerity, inſtantly diſpatched away embaſſadors to Bruſſels, to conclude a league againſt France with the Pope, the Emperor, the King of Aragon, Charles of Auſtria Sovereign of the Netherlands, and Margaret dowager ducheſs of Savoy his aunt, who governed his dominions during his minority. Henry imagined that the execution of that treaty would immediately follow its concluſion; but the ſequel will ſhew us, that, if they concluded the league, it was only to draw money from him, and leave him to make war alone. He was young and unexperienced, but withal ſo ſelf-conceited as to fancy himſelf wiſer than his council: beſide, he had plenty of ready money in his coffers. What could perſons ſo ſubtle as as Julius, Maximilian and Ferdinand desire better than to have to deal with such a Prince as Henry? We have already seen this year, 1512, how artfully they improved a disposition so favorable, and we shall see, in the insuing years, how very little he himself profited by what he might have learned experimentally, during the course of the present. However this be, being resolved to carry war into France, he assembled a parliament the fourth of November, to demand money. Shortly after, the commons, without examining too closely the reasons which induced him to take arms, granted him a subsidy and a poll-tax (1) upon all his subjects, for the expenses of the war (2).

The parliament gives Henry money. Herbert. Stow. Hollingsh.

While the parliament sat, Henry received a bull from the Pope, who, to incourage him to push the war vigorously against France, granted a plenary indulgence to all his subjects who should aid him with their persons or purses. This was all the assistance he had from the Pope for a war, the sole motive whereof, as was pretended, was the church's defense.

Nothing more remains to complete our detail of this year's occurrences, but briefly to mention the measures taken by Henry with regard to Scotland.

Henry tries in vain to prevent a rupture with Scotland. Herbert.

While this Prince was fixing himself in the resolution of carrying war into France, he indeavors to preserve a good understanding with the King of Scotland: but it was impossible England should be in war with France, and Scotland not interpose. However, Henry imagined that, by the assurances he gave the Scotish King of his intention to observe punctually the treaty of peace, he should prevent his interfering in the quarrel. James let him alone to think what he pleased, and in the mean time was preparing to assist France by a powerful diversion, in case that kingdom was attacked. On the first rumor of Henry's intention to break with Lewis XII, James took care to be furnished with pretexts for a rupture with England. Breton's business supplied him with one; and he also sought others: but the true reason of his acting was, that the Kings of England were, for some preceding ages, grown so powerful, and expressed so fixed a desire to unite all Great Britain under their dominion, that Scotland could not reasonably hope to withstand them otherwise than by the assistance of France, which had been the Scots constant protectrix: it was therefore no less necessary than just for Scotland to adhere firmly to the interests of France, and not suffer that crown to be disabled from assisting her allies; so not to swerve from this maxim, James IV, who had determined on taking a voyage to Jerusalem, laid aside his design when he was apprised of the likelihood of a rupture between England and France. He equiped a fleet, which he intended to send into France, under color of presenting it to Queen Ann, consort of Lewis XII: but these ships, one of which was the largest that had yet been seen on the sea, was lost or disabled, partly by a storm, and partly thro' the admiral's mis-conduct.

The King of Scotland prepares to aid France.

James concludes a league with Lewis XII.

Henry having at length proclaimed war with Lewis XII, James concluded with France a league against him, May the twenty-second this year: and soon after, he prepared an army, but without divulging for what it was designed. His intent was, so soon as Henry had transported his forces over to France, to have made an incursion into England. Henry, having intelligence of this armament, dispatched to Scotland two embassadors, under color of adjusting some trifling differences, but in reality to sound the King's intentions. The embassadors acquainting King James, that their master was somewhat jealous of this armament, as if it was made in favor of France; James replied, "That "being equally an ally of both crowns, his design "was to observe an exact neutrality." The embassadors prayed him to give that answer in writing; but he refused, on pretense it would breed a suspicion in the King of France. Shortly after, Henry did, by his spies, learn that a league was concluded between France and Scotland, and he even procured a copy of the treaty (3): wherefore, perceiving that a war with Scotland was unavoidable, he sent the earl of Surrey to the north, with power to levy forces, and, with them, act against Scotland if requisite (4).

The occurrences of the year 1512 made great alterations in the interests of the Princes concerned, and consequently in their measures and designs.

Views and interests of the Princes.

Julius II, pleased with having driven the French from Italy, and so greatly increased his power by the acquisition of many places, was thinking however of seizing Ferrara: after which he hoped, with the assistance of the Venetians and Florentines, to be able to expel Maximilian from the state of Venice, tho' he had lately leagued with him: as to the rest, he had no thought of making conquests in France; his sole aim was to find Lewis XII imployment at home, and intirely dissolve the remains of the council of Pisa, which however was not very formidable to him since the Emperor's disingagement.

Of Julius II.

The King of Aragon's sole view was to preserve his late conquest of Navarre. To injoy it in peace, his only way was keeping Lewis XII elsewhere imployed, or prevailing with that Prince not to give him any disturbance. To that purpose it was necessary to use the terror of the allies, and particularly of the King of England, that Lewis, being attacked from all quarters, might be induced of himself to desire a peace, and leave him in possession of Navarre. Ferdinand would not have scrupled abandoning his allies, provided he could obtain at that rate such a peace as he wanted.

Of Ferdinand.

The Emperor sought only to draw money both from his friends and enemies. He was very sensible that, with his own forces, it would be difficult to make any conquests upon the Venetians; and that the Pope, tho' his ally, did not wish it: but to them he was extremely reserved, to procure the larger sums in making a peace. On the other hand, he indeavored to imbroil affairs as much as possible, and make new leagues; because, in all the treaties of that kind, money was still given him to maintain imaginary troops, which he never raised, at least not so many as he promised.

Of the Emperor.

The Venetians were extremely desirous of terminating a destructive war, whereby they were miserably exhausted. Their sole aim was to induce the Emperor to be satisfied with a large sum of money for the restitution of their towns, and thereby put their state on the same footing it was before the league of Cambray: but as Maximilian could not think of depriving himself of an entrance into Italy by the restitution of these places, it was their business, in some measure, to compel him by new leagues, which might make him apprehensive of losing them without any advantage: but as this was the senate's sole view, they were ever disposed to break all their ingagements as soon as the Emperor would hearken to reason.

Of the Swissers.

The Swissers thought only of supporting Sforza at Milan, to have always in that duchy a Prince who should rely on their assistance: consequently, it was their interest to keep the King of France at a distance, and oppose all his attempts towards its recovery.

Of the King of France.

Lewis XII, extremely mortified at the prosperity of his enemies in Italy, ardently desired to recover Genoua and Milan. To succeed, the aid of the Venetians, the Emperor, or the Swissers was necessary: it was also requisite so to hasten the conclusion with one or other of the two latter powers, that the expedition of the Milanese might be made in the spring, for fear it should be prevented by the war which the King of England was preparing against him in Picardy.

Of Henry VIII.

Of all Lewis XII's enemies, Henry VIII of England was the only one who thought of making conquests in France; preposterously imagining that his allies would, in different quarters, make diversions to facilitate the execution of his designs: but he did not yet sufficiently know them. The Venetians had been excluded the late league. The Pope and King of Aragon had no desire to attack France, but only to create Lewis troubles, which might hinder him from thinking on Italy: and solely with this view it was that they feigned a willingness to second the King of England. As for Maximilian, Henry and his council must have been wilfully blind to expect from him any assistance.

Of the King of Scotland.

James IV, King of Scotland, observing France on the point of being attacked by the King of England, was preparing to assist her, deeming his own and that kingdom's interests to be inseparable. He easily perceived Henry courted him only to prevent his interposing in the quarrel, and was willing to feed him with hopes of succeeding in his design: but he was however determined to break the peace, rather than leave in danger a kingdom from which alone he could hope for a speedy and powerful protection in case of need. It is true, he had made a peace with Henry VII, and renewed it with Henry VIII; but it was when those Princes had no quarrel with France, his ancient and constant ally. In his opinion Henry, by wantonly attacking France on frivolous pretexts, violated indirectly the peace made with Scotland: at least, James pretended that, in signing a peace with England, he was not bound to forsake France, whenever the King of England should think of attacking her.

Such were the dispositions of all these Potentates in the begining of the year 1513: we must now examine by what means each strove to attain his ends. This new scene will discover to us no less variety, artful managements, devices and artifices than the former, since the actors and personages will still be the same.

The Emperor offers to league with Lewis XII purposely to deceive him. Guicciard.

While Henry was seriously preparing for the war he was to carry into France, his pretended allies were mindful of their own affairs, without regarding his interests. Since he had entered into the league of Rome, the allies, it seemed, should have acted nothing without his participation: nevertheless Julius II had leagued with Maximilian, and excluded the Venetians, without giving him thereof the least information.

Early in the year 1513, the Emperor had no farther regard for his new allies, since he proposed a fresh league to Lewis XII on new conditions. He offered to assist him in recovering the Milanese, provided Lewis, in return, would aid him against the Venetians. Moreover, he demanded Renée, Lewis's second daughter, for Charles of Austria his grandson, and that for her dower Lewis should assign him all his pretensions to Milan and the kingdom of Naples. But that the performance of the treaty might not intirely depend on the faith of the King of France, he required that the Princess should be immediately sent him, and Cremona, with all Gierradadda delivered to him as soon as the duchy of Milan was recovered. Certainly, one cannot but admire the Emperor's assurance in making these proposals. He had not hitherto been able to continue the war against Venice without the assistance of Lewis XII; nay, he thought he still wanted it, and yet made him an offer of his aid to recover the Milanese. But on what terms? Why, after Lewis should have been at a vast expense to recover that duchy, he was to resign it the Emperor's grandson, with his pretensions to Naples. This is called using people like real dupes: but since the late trick Maximilian had played Lewis XII, there is not abundance of probability that he believed his proposals would be accepted: possibly, he made them only to hinder Lewis from joining with the Venetians. At the same time he intended to inspire these last with jealousy, and a fear of his uniting with France, that this apprehension might induce them to offer him more advantageous conditions.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1513.

Lewis tries in vain to win the Swissers. Guicciard.

Lewis XII gave ear to these proposals, as if he had some design to accept them, because he thereby hoped to create suspicions in the Swissers and Venetians, and incline them to league with him more readily. As for the Venetians, they wished for nothing more than a strict union with France, and if any thing retarded the negociation, it was only the hope of some accomodation with the Emperor, in which case they would gladly have renounced all other leagues and alliances. As for the Swissers, King Lewis could not possibly gain them over to his party, tho' he offered them more than even they at first demanded. Beside the hatred they bore him, the face of their affairs was altered since Sforza's restoration to Milan. While that Prince was in exile, it was doubtful whether, in good policy, they ought to ingage in a war with France for his sake: but since he was, by their assistance, in possession of the duchy, their honor and interest required their utmost efforts to support him (1). However this be, Lewis's negociation with the Swissers not succeeding, he was under a necessity to join in a league either with the Emperor or with Venice, otherwise he could entertain but slender hopes of recovering Milan.

Proposals of the Venetians to Lewis XII.

While affairs were in this posture, the Venetians proposed to him a league on the same terms with that of the year 1498; viz. that they would assist him to recover the Milanese, provided he would resign Cremona and Gierradadda. Lewis readily listened to their offers; but the Venetians hastened not the conclusion, by reason of the circumstances wherein they presently after found themselves.

Guicciard.

The King of Aragon, having good intelligence of what passed between Lewis XII and the Venetians, informed the Emperor, and advised him to offer Verona to the Venetians for a sum of money: this was the subject of a long, tho' fruitless negociation.

uncertainty, Julius II, who was making ready to attack Ferrara early in the ſpring, died the twenty-firſt of February, having kindled a flame which his demiſe was not able to extinguiſh (1). As ſoon as the news reached the viceroy of Naples, who was ſtill with his army in Lombardy, he approached Plaſenza, and entering without oppoſition reſtored that place to the duke of Milan. Parma quickly followed the example of Plaſenza, and was likewiſe delivered to the ſame Prince: nor did any of the Potentates ſeem in much haſte to ſend aſſiſtance to the future Pope to preſerve for him theſe places; on the contrary, none of the Italian Princes could without uneaſineſs look on, while the Roman Pontifs eſtabliſhed a footing in Lombardy, under a pretext which, on occaſion, might be imployed againſt moſt of them.

Leo X Pope. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 349. Guicciard.

On the eleventh of March, cardinal Giovanni di Medicis, who eleven months before was taken priſoner at the battle of Ravenna, was elected Pope, and aſſumed the name of Leo X. He was no more than thirty-ſeven years of age, but had however great experience, having been imployed in diverſe important affairs during the late pontificate. He was neither ſo impetuous nor ſo magiſterial as Julius II his predeceſſor, but a more artful and much better politician. I ſhall in the ſequel have occaſion to add ſome ſtrokes to his portraiture, which will more fully diſplay his genius and character.

A year's truce between Lewis and Ferdinand. Guicciard.

Before Julius II died, Ferdinand was buſied in projecting a ſcheme perfectly well correſponding with the reputation he had acquired in the world. Very early in the year, he had ſent two monks into France to make ſome overtures to Lewis XII, by means of Queen Ann, to whom thoſe his agents had ſome ſort of acceſs: but, as Lewis perceived it was not poſſible to make a peace, or even a truce with Ferdinand without leaving him in poſſeſſion of Navarre, he had appeared at firſt very cold; but at length, conſidering that he could ſcarcely even hope to recover the duchy of Milan while the King of Aragon was his enemy, becauſe it was he who ſet to work the King of England his ſon-in-law, he determined, tho' unwillingly, to conclude with him a truce, for one year, on condition the King of England was included, and Italy excepted. He reckoned that, during this truce, he ſhould with eaſe be able to re-conquer the duchy of Milan, which effected, he ſhould be ſtrong enough to defend his own kingdom againſt the Engliſh. Nothing was farther from Henry's thoughts than ſuch a truce, which would have broke all his meaſures, and yet Ferdinand ſcrupled not acting in his name, as if he were ſure of his conſent. This affair was begun in January, and the eighth of February Lewis impowered Odet de Foix baron of Lautrec, to treat with Ferdinand's commiſſioners. In a word, the treaty was concluded, at Orthez in Bearn, the firſt of April. It imported; That there ſhould be a truce, for one year, out of Italy, between the King of France, the King of Scotland, the duke of Guelders on the one part; and on the other, the Emperor, the King of Aragon, the Queen of Caſtile, and the King of England. Lewis XII undertook to procure the King of Scotland's and the duke of Gueldres's conſent, and Ferdinand ingaged for the King of England: but as Ferdinand was conſcious he ſhould not eaſily obtain Henry's conſent, he cauſed it to be inſerted in the treaty, that it ſhould be ratified within a month by himſelf and Lewis XII, but that the other parties ſhould be allowed two months; with expreſs declaration that, with regard to the Emperor, the King of England, the King of Scotland, and the duke of Gueldres, the truce ſhould take place but from the day of the exchange of their ratifications. Never perhaps was ſeen any thing ſo bold as what Ferdinand did on this occaſion. He perfectly knew that Henry would never agree to the truce, and yet took upon him to procure his conſent, as if he had been fully impowered ſo to do. The laſt article, concerning the ratification, plainly diſcovers what he thought of it: but it is ſtill more evident, in that he not only took not the leaſt ſtep to get Henry to do what he ſeemed to deſire, but even concealed from him the truce itſelf, as far as poſſible,

Ferdinand includes Henry without his knowledge. Guicciard.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 350.

Soon as the treaty was ſigned, Ferdinand took care to publiſh complaints of his having been very ill-uſed by the allies of the league; that the Pope and Venetians had acquired many places, but, for his part, he had gained nothing at all, and yet the allies refuſed to continue the ſupply to which they were bound, tho' the King of France ſtill poſſeſſed ſeveral towns in Italy, and the Spaniſh army was ſtill in the league's ſervice. But this was only to prepare people to ſee with leſs ſurpriſe and indignation the private truce he had juſt made with France, without the participation of his allies.

Ferdinand complains of the allies. Guicciard.

The public's eyes were attentively fixed on the new Pope, to ſee what courſe he would take: but he did not long leave the politicians in ſuſpenſe. Tho', while a cardinal, he did not intirely approve of Julius II's conduct, he however purſued his plan as ſoon as he was in his place. He was doubly concerned to keep the French out of Italy: firſt, as Pope, ſince neighbors ſo powerful could not but be formidable to him: ſecondly, as head of the Medicis family, he had cauſe to fear that Lewis XII, if he recovered the Milaneſe, would undertake reſtoring the Florentines to their liberty: and finally, he was deſirous of terminating the council of Piſa, which could not be effected otherwiſe than by ingaging Lewis XII in wars, which ſhould compel him to make his peace with the church. Ferdinand had likewiſe the ſame views, to keep the King of France at a diſtance from Navarre, Rouſſillon and the kingdom of Naples. As for the Emperor, it was his intereſt to diſable France from aſſiſting the Venetians: but none of them had any deſire to carry war into France, but only ſo to manage, that this diverſion might be made at another's expenſe.

Views of the new Pope Leo X.

The allies try to ingage Henry in a war with France.

To that purpoſe, they unanimouſly caſt their eyes on Henry VIII, as a Prince extremely proper to execute their deſigns. He had ready money, warlike ſubjects, and could with eaſe tranſport troops into ſome part of France, remote from the borders of Spain and Italy: he was moreover exceſſively deſirous to ſignaliſe himſelf by ſhining exploits, and ſcrupled not ſhewing it openly; wherefore each of them labored with all his power to confirm him in his deſign of commencing a war with France, by puting him in hope of being vigorouſly ſupported, tho' nothing was more remote from their intentions. Leo X was no ſooner in the papal chair but, under color of notifying his promotion, he ſent him a letter, aſſuring him; that he was fully determined to adhere to the league formed by Julius II his predeceſſor, and even to conclude a new one with England. Nevertheleſs, at the ſame time, he preſſed Maximilian to a pacification with the Venetians, while with them he was negociating to prevent their joining the French,

(1) He took the name of Julius from his inclination to war, in memory of Julius Cæſar. He commanded his army in perſon againſt the French; and, as he marched over a bridge on the Tiber, he is ſaid to have thrown St. Peter's keys into the river, and to have called for St. Paul's ſword.

promiſing to imploy his whole credit with the Emperor to procure them an honorable and advantageous peace. All theſe practiſes could not be managed ſo privately but the King of France had thereof ſome intelligence, ſo that he ſoon grew very jealous of the new Pontif.

League concluded at Mechlin between the allies and Henry.

Henry wanted not much ſollicitation to carry his arms into France; his thoughts being already bent on a war: wherefore, finding the Pope, Emperor and King of Aragon promiſed him to act vigorouſly, he queſtioned not the favorableneſs of the opportunity to recover good part of what had been heretofore loſt by his predeceſſors; and therefore he readily agreed to form a new league with them, not for the affairs of Italy, with which he was probably diſguſted, but to attack France from ſeveral quarters. That this league might be the more ſecret, it was agreed; that it ſhould be negociated, at Mechlin, between Margaret of Auſtria governeſs of the Netherlands, authoriſed by the Emperor her father, and the embaſſadors of England (1), and that afterwards it ſhould be approved and ratified by the Pope, the Emperor and Ferdinand. This was another ſnare laid for Henry, which he perceived not 'till it was too late to avoid it. Tho' Ferdinand was then juſt on concluding the truce with Lewis XII, he nevertheleſs made himſelf one of the principal parties in this league, repugnant as it was to the truce. The ſubſtance of the new league, concluded at Mechlin the fifth of April, about the ſame time the truce was ſigned at Orthez, was as follows:

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 354, &c.

The terms of the league.

I. "That, within thirty days after the date of "this treaty, each of the confederates ſhould pro- "claim war with the King of France, and within "two months invade him, viz. the Pope in Pro- "vence or Dauphiné; the Emperor in ſome place "out of Italy; the King of Aragon in Bearn, "Guienne, or Languedoc; the King of England "in Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy; and "their armies ſhould be ſtrong and well provided "with all requiſites.

II. "That the Emperor (if he had not yet done "it) ſhould revoke all his proceedings in favor of "the council of Piſa." This demonſtrates how little Henry, or his plenipotentiaries knew of what paſſed at Rome, ſince it was now three months, or more that the Emperor had abandoned that council.

III. "That the Pope ſhould thunder his cenſures "againſt all the oppoſers of this league, and abettors "of the contrary party.

IV. "That, towards the expenſes of this war, "the King of England ſhould give the Emperor "a hundred thouſand gold crowns at three pay- "ments; thirty-five thouſand preſently after de- "claration of the war, a like ſum when the war "was commenced, and thirty thouſand within "three months after.

V. "That the Emperor's meaning was not to "enter into this league as guardian to Charles his "grandſon.

VI. "That the Emperor and King of England "ſhould ratify the treaty within a month, and the "Pope and King of Aragon within two months; "with this expreſs declaration that, in caſe the "Pope and King of Aragon ſhould not ratify the "treaty by the time appointed, it ſhould however "be in force between the Emperor and King of "England.

VII. "Laſtly; the confederates renounced all "exceptions whatever, and particularly that which "might be made to another's ſtipulating for "them."

Never perhaps was ſeen more inſincerity than in this whole negociation, ſince, of all the confederates, Henry alone intended to keep his word. Leo X ratified not the treaty; Ferdinand, as will be ſeen preſently, diſowned his embaſſador; as for the Emperor, he received Henry's money without concerning himſelf to perform his ingagements. Thus Henry was the conſtant dupe of theſe Princes, who were for him ſomewhat too politic.

Ferdinand's embaſſador at London ratifies and ſwears to the league of Mechlin.

The treaty being brought to London, Don Luis Carroz de Villaragud, Ferdinand's embaſſador, approved and ratified it by letters patent, dated April eighteen. He declared in theſe letters, that tho' he had a ſufficient power from the King his maſter to conclude the league with the plenipotentiaries of the confederate Princes, he had not been able, for certain weighty reaſons, to be preſent at the ſigning at Mechlin: but being very ſure, the treaty contained only what was agreeable to the King his maſter, who deſired nothing more earneſtly than its execution, he approved and ratified, in the ſaid King's name, all the articles of the treaty; and to remove all occaſion of diſputing the validity of his confirming it, he inſerted the treaty word for word, in his letters of ratification, and concluded it again with the earl of Surrey, the King of England's commiſſioner, by virtue of a full power ſent him for that purpoſe. Afterwards, the twenty-fifth of the ſame month, he ſwore to a ſtrict obſervance of the articles, on the ſouls of Ferdinand King of Aragon, and Juana Queen of Caſtile. It is uncertain whether the embaſſador was himſelf deceived, or whether, knowing it, he voluntarily contributed to impoſe on Henry. All can be ſaid is, that the great precautions taken to hinder his being ſuſpected of inſincerity, are not very common with thoſe who deſign to act upon the ſquare.

Henry is impoſed upon.

It muſt doubtleſs be thought ſtrange, that a Pope, an Emperor, and a King of Spain ſhould thus combine to lay ſuch a ſnare for a young Prince of twenty-one years of age, and who was even ſon-in-law to one of them: and yet it is ſcarce to be doubted that the league concluded at Mechlin, in the Pope's and the King of Aragon's embaſſadors abſenſe, was thus projected to intangle Henry, under color of keeping it more ſecret. They ſucceeded ſo well, that Henry, relying on the diverſions his pretended allies would make in Guienne, Bearn, Provence, Dauphiné and Burgundy, flattered himſelf that he might eaſily extend his conqueſts in Picardy. To that end, he made extraordinary preparations by ſea and land, which put him to a vaſt expenſe: but while we leave him imployed in preparing for the inſuing campain, it is requiſite we touch on what was tranſacting in Italy.

League between Lewis XII and the Venetians. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

The Venetians, not able to obtain a peace from Maximilian, who pretended to ſubject them to moſt unreaſonable terms, ſollicited afreſh the negociation they had commenced with France. On the other hand, Lewis XII, to whom time was precious, readily accepted their propoſals. Thus the league between that Monarch and the Venetians was quickly concluded (2), on the ſame foot as that of the year 1498. This was tranſacted by Andrea Gritti who, being then priſoner in France, was commiſſioned to conclude it in the ſenate's name. Preſently after, he was releaſed, as well as Alviano, who, returning to Venice, was appointed general of the republic's forces.

Mean while, the preparations which were continuing in England, and the hoſtilities already begun at ſea ſince April, between the French and Engliſh, ſhould have convinced him that Ferdinand had deceived him. However this be, the French army, commanded by La Trimouille, being arrived on the borders of the Milaneſe, Maximilian Sforza quited his capital, and retired among the Swiſſers, who were, to the number of ſeven or eight thouſand, at Como and Novara, where they expected ſupplies from Swiſſerland.

Ferdinand's general goes from Milan.

On the approach of the French, Ramon de Cardona, who was ſtill in Lombardy with the Spaniſh army, retired without making the leaſt motion to aſſiſt the duke of Milan, tho' Italy was not included in the truce of Orthez. To all appearance, Ferdinand was not diſpleaſed that the French ſhould make ſome progreſs in the Milaneſe, to keep them imployed there, while Henry carried war into Picardy: at leaſt, any other reaſon of his general's conduct can ſcarce be imagined. The duke of Milan, having no other forces but the Swiſſers to oppoſe to the French, Milan and all the other towns of that duchy, except Como and Novara, ſubmited to La Trimouille without offering the leaſt reſiſtance, while the Swiſſers, who were not ſtrong enough to take the field, remained immured within the walls of thoſe two places. While the French were making theſe conqueſts, Alviano took for the Venetians Peſchiera, Breſcia, Valeggio, and finally Cremona, after a fruitleſs attempt to poſſeſs himſelf of Verona by treachery.

About this time, the faction of the Adorni, who in Genoua ſided with France, found means to become ſuperior, and put the city again under Lewis's obedience.

LaTrimouille repulſed by the Swiſſers at Novara.

Lewis XII was now in poſſeſſion of the whole Milaneſe, Como and Novara only excepted. La Trimouille, knowing the Swiſſers expected a ſtrong reinforcement from their own country, thought he ſhould make haſte and beſiege Navara, before the arrival of theſe troops. He marched therefore to the town, and, in expectation of ſpeedily carrying it, made a furious attack: but whatever bravery the French ſhewed on this occaſion, they were repulſed with very conſiderable loſs, which even obliged the general to retire to Riotta, a village about two miles from Novara. Mean while, the Swiſſers, proud of repulſing ſuch a terrible aſſault, and begining to contemn the French, before whom they had not yet dared to appear in the field, ſuddenly reſolved to ſally from Novara, and fall on the enemy in their camp. This reſolution was immediately executed, to the great aſtoniſhment of the French, who, unable to reſiſt this unexpected attack, were intirely routed: but this was not all. Their conſternation after their defeat was ſo great, that they thought their only ſafety conſiſted in repaſſing the mountains, and returning to France with all poſſible diligence. The news of their flight reaching Genoua, the Adorni quitted the city to the Fregoſi their competitors, who choſe for Doge Octaviano Fregoſi, head of their family and faction. Thus, within a month's ſpace, Lewis XII got and loſt Genoua and Milan, and Maximilian Sforza, who had been expeled his duchy, again took poſſeſſion. But it was the latter end of the year before he recovered the caſtles of Milan and Cremona, held by the French and Venetians.

This revolution in the King of France's affairs occaſioned much the ſame to thoſe of the Venetians. Alviano, their general, no ſooner heard of the French army's misfortune, but he haſtily retired into the territories of Venice, and beſieged Verona: but Ramon de Cardona, who had affected a ſort of neutrality while the French were in the Milaneſe, knowing they were out of Italy, turned his forces againſt Alviano. He not only conſtrained him to raiſe the ſiege of Verona, but even, purſuing him from place to place, obtained over him a ſignal victory, which obliged the Venetians to refer their differences to the Pope, tho' he had declared againſt them by aſſiſting the Emperor. The neceſſity of their affairs compeled them to take that ſtep in order to gain time. They had loſt all their towns in the Milaneſe, and their own country had been horribly ravaged by the Spaniſh troops, even within ſight of Venice.

He is defeated by the Spaniards.

The Venetians made the Pope umpire.

While theſe matters paſſed in Italy, Henry was preparing to conduct into France a numerous army: but before I treat on the ſucceſs of his firſt campain, it will not be amiſs briefly to obſerve what occurred at his own court, as being not unworthy a few moments notice. Thomas Wolſey had been introduced to court by the biſhop of Wincheſter. Preſently after, he was made privy-counſellor, and as ſuch had opportunity to make himſelf better known to the King, and gain his eſteem, as well by his own qualifications, as by the intereſt of the biſhop his benefactor, who ceaſed not ingaging Henry to admire the ſtrength of his genius, and obſerve his fitneſs for grand and weighty affairs. Wolſey, on his part, neglected not what he judged capable of increaſing the King's good opinion of him. To a moſt indefatigable application, and extreme diligence in all affairs wherewith he was charged, he added a blind condeſcenſion for all his maſter's paſſions. The King was highly pleaſed to ſee in his court and council a churchman leſs rigid and ſcrupulous than the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or the old biſhop of Wincheſter. Wolſey danced, ſang, laughed, and gamboled with ſuch of the young courtiers as were moſt in favor; and, if Polydore Virgil, who neither did nor had reaſon to love him, is to be credited, he carried his complaiſance ſo far as to lend the King his houſe for his moſt ſecret pleaſures. However this be, his condeſcenſion, joined to his talents for buſineſs, and a paſſable knowledge in theology which he, as well as the King, had acquired by reading the works of Thomas Aquinas, ſoon gave him much advantage over all the other courtiers. When he found himſelf well eſtabliſhed, he made it is particular buſineſs to inform the King of his errors ſince his acceſſion to the throne, and how his youth had been abuſed. By this method he gradually inſinuated to him that he was ill-ſerved, and wanted miniſters of capacity to eaſe him in the adminiſtration of his moſt important affairs, and of ſhewing him the conſequences. In a word, he ſo managed, that he became himſelf that miniſter which he adviſed the King to ſeek, and by degrees was intruſted with the care and conduct of the King's principal affairs. His credit rendered him haughty, proud, inſolent and ungrateful to his old friends: in a word, he was taxed with all the failings of this nature which favorites are uſually charged with, and which indeed few favorites can avoid. Wolſey, like moſt others, grew exceſſively odious, chiefly becauſe his councils were always ſelf-intereſted, which the event diſcovered to all but the King, who was blind in that reſpect. His favor and credit cauſed the greateſt Potentates of Europe to ſtrive with emulation to gain him to their intereſts, and glory, at leaſt outwardly, in being of the number of his friends. The reaſon is becauſe, during this reign, the affairs of Europe were in ſuch a ſituation, that England was capable of making the balance incline to the ſide ſhe eſpouſed. Wolſey knew how to improve prove this advantage, to render himſelf the richeſt and moſt powerful ſubject the world ever ſaw; but labored not with the ſame ardor for his maſter's honor as for his own intereſt. After he was declared prime miniſter he managed, during the ſpace of ſeventeen years, all the King's affairs, both foreign and domeſtic (1).

Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Herbert.

Before Henry was ready to paſs into France, the war was already begun at ſea. In April, admiral Howard had put to ſea with thirty-two ſhips of war (2), while the French fleet remained at Breſt, expecting ſix gallies, which Pregent (3) was to conduct from Marſeilles. The Engliſh admiral approaching Breſt, determined on attacking the French ſhips as they lay at anchor: but on intelligence of Pregent's arrival at Conquet, he ſailed that way to attempt taking the ſix gallies, and attacked them with great bravery: but, during the ingagement, his ſhip being grappled with Pregent's galley, he entered it ſword in hand, and there cauſed great confuſion; when, ſoon after, the galley being unhappily diſingaged, he was left amidſt his enemies with very few followers, and, being unknown, was knocked over-board with half-pikes. The loſs of the admiral occaſioned ſuch a conſternation in the Engliſh fleet, that they durſt not continue the fight.

Hall. Stow.

This news arriving at court, the King confered the office of lord admiral on Thomas Howard, the deceaſed's brother. Mean while, as the French fleet, by receiving a ſtrong reinforcement, was become ſuperior to that of their enemies, the Engliſh returned to ſome of their own ports, expecting the new admiral's arrival. The French, incouraged by the retreat of the Engliſh, ſailed to the coaſt of England, and even made a deſcent in Suſſex, and carried off ſome booty.

Henry prepares to paſs into France. Hall.

During this, Henry was preparing to carry war into France, tho' none of his pretended allies had yet made the leaſt ſtep towards performing the treaty of Mechlin. Leo X had not ratified the treaty, and nothing was farther from his thoughts than ſending his forces into Provence or Dauphiné. The Emperor began to ſeek excuſes not to enter Burgundy with an army, tho' that was what he had poſitively promiſed. As for the King of Aragon, he had not only concealed from Henry his one year's truce with France, but was even trying to amuſe him with the hopes of his being inſtantly going to make a powerful diverſion in Guienne: he ſo artfully acted his part, that it was June before Henry was fully informed of the truce of Orthez. Inſenſed at ſuch fraudulent dealings, he diſpatched an embaſſy to the King his father-in-law, to upbraid him with breach of faith, and ſummon him to execute the treaty of Mechlin, or rather that ſigned by his embaſſador in his name at London: whereupon Ferdinand, ſeeing he could no longer wear the maſk, diſowned his embaſſador, and ſaid, he had exceeded his inſtructions. He however acknowledged that he had concluded, with Lewis XII, a truce for one year, being forced to it by the neceſſity of his affairs, but promiſed to do wonders when it was expired, and adviſed his ſon-in-law to accept of the truce, that they might afterwards unite their forces and jointly attack the common enemy: but Henry could rely no longer on promiſes. Thus, by the artifices of the Pope, the Emperor and Ferdinand, he ſaw himſelf ingaged to carry war alone into the enemy's country, which was to have been invaded in four different quarters. He was not convinced of their inſincerity 'till it was almoſt too late to recede, the greateſt part of his army having already paſſed the ſea, and juſt entering upon action. Luckily for him, Lewis XII, deceived by the treaty of truce concluded at Orthez, had already ſent away to Italy the beſt of his troops, imagining Henry would accept of the truce conformably to the King of Aragon's ingagement.

Henry VIII. An' 1513.

Not long after, Henry received a letter from the Emperor, wherein, with many excuſes, he intimated, that it was impoſſible for him this year to lead an army into Burgundy; but that, next year, he would punctually perform his ingagement. Mean while, to demonſtrate that he deſigned not to forſake him, he offered to ſerve as volunteer in his army. Thus, of the four allies who were to act at once againſt France, Henry alone was charged with the whole burden of this war. Edward IV, his grandfather, had been formerly in much the ſame caſe, and deemed it not any diſhonor to ſtrike up a a haſty peace with Lewis XI, when diſappointed by his allies. Had Henry followed his example, he would have terribly imbaraſſed thoſe by whom he was deceived; but, thirſting for renown, would ſhew he wanted them not. He had ſo relied on the ſincerity of his allies that, tho' the treaty of Mechlin was not to be ratified by the Pope and the King of Aragon 'till the fifth of June, he had cauſed the beſt part of his army to paſs over to Calais in the middle of May. It is evident, the ratification of the treaty of Mechlin had been ſo long retarded only to ingage Henry beyond a poſſibility of receding.

Before the departure of the firſt troops (4) Henry cauſed to be beheaded the earl of Suffolk, priſoner in the tower ever ſince the reign of Henry VII, who had poſitively promiſed Philip I, King of Caſtile, to ſpare the life of that nobleman: but, according to appearance, he gave the Prince his ſon orders like thoſe given by King David to Solomon his ſucceſſor with reſpect to Joab. The hiſtorians have attempted penetrating into Henry's motive for taking the life of this earl, at ſuch a juncture, who was not in condition to hurt him: but they have not advanced any thing ſatisfactory (5).

The two bodies of troops tranſported to Calais departed thence the ſeventeenth of June under command of the earl of Shrewſbury (6), and lord Herbert in order to march to Terouenne, to which they laid ſiege: but the King departed not from England 'till the thirtieth of the ſame month, having conſtituted Queen Catherine regent. He arrived the ſame day at Calais, being attended by Thomas Wolſey his prime miniſter, Charles Brandon another favorite lately made viſcount L'Iſle, with many others of the nobility (7). Edmund de la Pole was ſon of John de la Pole duke of Suffolk, by Elizabeth ſiſter of Edward IV: but this reaſon ſeems weak, ſince Margaret Queen of Scotland, the King's ſiſter, was the undoubted heir of the houſe of York, in caſe the King died without iſſue. (7) The King divided his own forces into three bodies. The vanguard, conſiſting of three thouſand men, was commanded by Charles Brandon, viſcount Liſle; the right wing by ſir Richard Carew, and the left by Thomas lord Darcy; Henry Bourchier earl of Eſſex was lieutenant general of the ſpears, and ſir John Pechy commanded the horſe. mained at Calais with a body of nine thouſand men, ready to march on the firſt occaſion. At length, having certain advice that the duke of Longueville was approaching to relieve the town, he haſtened from Calais to the ſiege, where he arrived the fourth of Auguſt. On the ninth, the Emperor came and confered with him between Aire and Terouenne, and three days after repaired to the camp and ſerved as volunteer under the King, ſcrupling not to receive a hundred crowns a day for his pay. By this mark of eſteem, and the imaginary honor he did the King, his meaning was to make amends for his breach of faith, and the hundred thouſand crowns he had handled for an expedition towards which he never dreamed of advancing one ſtep.

Mean time, the duke of Longueville, who commanded the French army, approaching Terouenne, Henry paſſed the Lys with the greateſt part of his troops, in order to meet him. The two armies ingaged, but not long; for the fight was ſcarcely begun, when the French, by what accident is unknown, ran away in confuſion without any poſſibility of their being rallied: but the principal officers choſe rather to be taken priſoners than follow ſo diſhonorable an example. The duke of Longueville was of the number, with chevalier Bayard, La Fayette, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, and ſome others of the greateſt diſtinction. This battle, if ſuch a rout may be ſo termed, was called, The battle of Guinegaſte, and, by ſome, The battle of Spurs, becauſe the French made more uſe of their ſpurs than than their ſwords. While the two armies were in view, before the ingagement, a body of French attempted to introduce a convoy of proviſions into the town, but were repulſed by lord Herbert, who was left to guard the trenches. After the battle the beſieged, deſpairing of relief, ſurrendered the city the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, and King Henry, accompanied by the Emperor, entered on the twenty-fourth.

Terouenne ſurrenders. Hall. Stow.

It ſeemed to be Henry's deſtiny to be always the Emperor's dupe. After taking Terouenne, Maximilian, who had only ſerved at the ſiege as volunteer, found means to have the place delivered to him, and immediately ordered it to be demoliſhed. It is not eaſy to conceive what induced Henry to this condeſcenſion: all can be conjectured is, that there was perhaps in the capitulation ſome article againſt razing the place, but that, altering his mind, he was willing to ſave his honor by delivering it to the Emperor. Even were this the caſe, there would be no leſs reaſon to be ſurpriſed at his conduct in this particular. It is eaſy to comprehend it was very advantageous to Charles of Auſtria, grandſon of Maximilian, that Terouenne belonged neither to the French nor the Engliſh: but what intereſt could Henry have to loſe ſo many men, and ſo much time, to reduce a place in order to have it razed in favor of Maximilian, who had not merited ſuch condeſcenſion (1)?

Henry gives the place to the Emperor, who razes it. Hall. Stow. Herbert. Hollingſh.

As the ſeaſon was not yet very far advanced, Henry determined, before the campain ended, to beſiege Tournay; whether he heard the place was ill provided, or the Emperor's intrigues had again influenced his council: for, the conqueſt of Tournay, which lies at ſome diſtance from Calais, was much leſs advantageous to Henry than to the archduke Charles, whoſe dominions it ſecured; whereas Boulogne would doubtleſs have been abundantly more convenient for Henry by reaſon of the neighborhood of Calais. Nevertheleſs the ſiege of Tournay was reſolved; probably, becauſe the Emperor hoped King Henry would give him that place as he had done Terouenne: but he found againſt him intereſts even ſtronger than thoſe of the King himſelf, which oppoſed his deſigns.

While preparations were making for the ſiege, Henry paid a viſit to Margaret, governeſs of the Netherlands, then at Liſle, and with her continued two days; when he returned to his army, which was marching to Tournay (2): but the Emperor left him on ſome diſguſt, the ſubject whereof is unknown. Next day, the fifteenth of September, the army arrived before Tournay, which held out but ſeven or eight days (3). Henry entered the city on the twenty-fourth, a month after his entry into Terouenne. By the capitulation, the inhabitants were to injoy their ancient privileges, on paying to Henry a ſmall annual acknowledgment of four thouſand livres Tournois, for ten years only (4).

Tournay taken. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 377. Sept. 23. Herbert. Hall.

After the reduction of Tournay, the King calling a council of war, it was debated, whether it was proper to keep the place, which ſeemed difficult, on account of its diſtance from Calais: but after a long debate a reſolution was taken to keep it, and leave for governor ſir Edward Poynings, with a ſtrong gariſon. The contrariety of the two determinations, with reſpect to Terouenne and Tournay will perhaps appear ſtrange. The firſt of theſe places, which was neareſt Calais, and ſecured the road from Calais to Tournay, was demoliſhed. The ſecond, which could not without great difficulty be relieved, was deemed neceſſary to be retained. This contrariety could proceed only from the great credit of Wolſey, who influenced the council as he pleaſed. He had caſt his eyes on the biſhoprick of Tournay, as a morſel very much ſuiting his palate, whereas, in compariſon thereof, that of Terouenne was nothing: and accordingly, he afterwards found means to obtain the adminiſtration of this ſee, under color, that the biſhop refuſed to ſwear fealty to the King. This is the true reaſon why it was reſolved to keep Tournay, and poſſibly of undertaking the ſiege (5).

The day ſucceeding Henry's entry into Tournay, Princeſs Margaret dowager ducheſs of Savoy, and the archduke Charles her nephew, came to congratulate him on his new conqueſt. During the whole fortnight they remained with him, he took care to entertain them with all ſorts of diverſions, as juſts, turnaments, running at the ring, balls, maſquerades, and the like. Mean while, amidſt all theſe feſtivities, the miniſters of the two courts commenced a treaty, which was concluded a few days after.

"I. That tho' Henry had bound himſelf not to "repaſs into England 'till the war was ended, he "ſhould however have liberty to return thither "with his army.

That, before the fifteenth of May, the "Emperor, the ducheſs Margaret, the archduke "Charles, the King of England, Queen Cathe-"rine, and Princeſs Mary, ſhould meet all toge-"ther at Calais to celebrate the archduke's mar-"riage with Princeſs Mary, purſuant to the treaty "concluded between the Emperor and the late "King Henry VII."

Remark on this treaty.

Whatever was to be done, Henry muſt always find money: Maximilian had already received a hundred thouſand gold crowns, without having performed any part of what he was ingaged to by the treaty of Mechlin, and found means to procure two hundred thouſand more by the preſent treaty, beſide the advantage of razing Terouenne, which very much annoyed his grandſon the archduke's dominions: nay, it is very probable, the diſguſt which made him quit the King's army proceeded from his not being able to prevail on Henry to promiſe him Tournay alſo when taken. This manifeſtly ſhews, he regarded Henry as a novice, very proper to be drawn into any kind of ſnare. Certainly Henry's many falſe ſteps in the begining of his reign can only be excuſed by his little knowledge of the character of the Princes with whom he treated.

Ferdinand propoſes to Henry a new league.

It is not to be queſtioned that the King of Aragon was of a like ſentiment concerning Henry his ſon-in-law. Notwithſtanding the ill turn he had done him laſt year, he had ſtill the aſſurance to ſend him an embaſſador at Liſle to propoſe a new league; as if his faith and ſincerity had been more to be depended on than a few months before: but it appears not that Henry was then diſpoſed to rely on his promiſes.

Henry returns to England. Herbert. Hall. Stow.

Henry departed Liſle the ſeventeenth of October, and on the twenty-fourth arrived at his palace at Richmond, after a glorious campain. I call it glorious, provided the ſucceſs of his arms only be conſidered: but, in another reſpect, it was not very honorable, ſince he had been the dupe of the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Aragon, who had thrown upon him the whole burden of a war which ſhould have been common to all the four. It is true, he had taken Terouenne and Tournay: but the firſt of theſe places being given to the Emperor, and razed, was to him of no benefit. As for Tournay, he never reaped any conſiderable advantage from it, by reaſon of its diſtance from Calais. Wolſey was thereby the ſole gainer, the biſhoprick of that city, which he at length obtained, together with the abby of St. Amand, being of a much greater revenue than what the King himſelf received from Tournay and its territory.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1513.

The ill ſucceſs of the Italian campain had reduced Lewis XII's affairs to a very indifferent poſture, and loſing the battle of Guinegaſte, with the capture of Terouenne and Tournay, had utterly diſconcerted them. But this was a trifle in compariſon of the danger France was in by a Swiſs invaſion, after the French were expeled the Milaneſe. The warlike Swiſſers, excited againſt Lewis by the Pope and Emperor, not contented with their advantages over him in Italy, reſolved to attack him in his own realm. The occaſion was favorable, by reaſon of the ſeveral above-ſpecified junctures: wherefore, to improve this opportunity, the Swiſſers levied fifteen thouſand men (1), to whom Maximilian joined the whole nobility of Franche-Comté, and ſome German cavalry, under conduct of Ulrick duke of Wirtemberg. This army entering the duchy of Burgundy, incamped before Dijon, where La Trimouille, lately returned from Italy, had ſhut himſelf up with ſome troops (2); but that place was ſo weak that there was no likelihood of its preſervation. Nevertheleſs he defended it ſix weeks: but finally perceiving that, by the loſs of Dijon, not only Burgundy but the whole French monarchy would be in the utmoſt danger, he judged it his duty to prevent it without waiting the King's orders, which might come too late. By a capitulation with the Swiſſers, he bound himſelf to pay them four hundred thouſand crowns (3), of which he paid down twenty thouſand, and, in the King's name, promiſed that he would deſiſt from all his pretenſions to the duchy of Milan. The Swiſſers, pleaſed with their expedition, retired into their own country, carrying with them four hoſtages, who found means to eſcape when they underſtood Lewis refuſed ratifying the capitulation.

Lewis XII, finding himſelf attacked from ſo many quarters, and not doubting that the Pope and King of Aragon procured him all theſe troubles, at length determined on accommodating matters with the Pontif: which accommodation might the more eaſily be effected, by reaſon Leo X had not, like Julius II, any perſonal prejudice againſt him. Since the French were out of Italy, he had nothing to demand of King Lewis but diſſolving the council of Piſa, without which indeed he could not conſent to a pacification. The council was ſo dwindled that Lewis, in abandoning it, made his Holineſs no very great ſacrifice. It is true, the ſubmiting in a point he had hitherto openly maintained ſeemed ſomewhat diſhonorable: but as the Piſa council had been properly ſummoned againſt Julius II, he thought he might without reproach yield to another Pope. Howſoever all this was, Lewis, perceiving that, by his reconciliation with Leo X, he ſhould take from the Kings of England and Aragon the pretext they uſed to make war upon him, was at length induced to renounce his council, and acknowledge that of Lateran. This renunciation was ſolemnly made in the tenth ſeſſion, held towards the cloſe of December.

Leo X, in the begining of his pontificate, wrote to Henry, as to all the reſt of the Princes, earneſtly exhorting him to peace. Such was the language it behoved him to uſe at firſt in order to diſcharge the duty of the common father of Chriſtians. Henry, who ſaw plainly, and was afterwards ſtill more fully convinced, that this was only grimace, replied, he could not make peace without his allies, and that a ſeparate peace would be directly repug-

Henry ſees he is abuſed.

Nothing contributed more to open Henry's eyes, than this ſecond letter. He had fancied, when he proteſted that he took arms in the church's defenſe, that his allies were ſenſible his meaning was not, on that account, to neglect his own intereſt, that language being properly only to amuſe the public. He had the more reaſon to believe it as, even in the treaty of league, each of the allies had evidently propoſed to himſelf temporal advantages; and yet he ſaw the Pope had no ſooner obtained his deſire, but he took the words of the treaty's preamble in the literal ſenſe, as if there had been indeed no other deſign than to labor for the church, and under that color pretended to diſſolve a league formed by himſelf. This convinced him, that the Pope, in drawing him into a war with France, had only his own intereſt in view. On the other hand, he was not much better pleaſed with the King of Aragon, nor had reaſon to be ſo. As for the Emperor, he had performed nothing of what he had promiſed. All theſe conſiderations, having at length opened his eyes, produced a peace with France, which was concluded the year inſuing: but before we cloſe this, it will be neceſſary to relate what paſſed during the campain between the Engliſh and Scots.

He reſolves to make peace with France.

War between England and Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert.

James IV, perceiving Henry ready to carry war into France, called his parliament, and repreſented to them the indignities Scotland had ſuffered from the Engliſh ſince the laſt pacification; nor was Breton's affair forgot in this enumeration: but the beſt reaſon he alledged to induce the Scots to a war was, that France, the ancient and faithful ally of Scotland, being about to be invaded by the King of England, he could not diſpenſe with aſſiſting her. This reaſon, tho' very plauſible, was not however univerſally approved: many thought it ſtrange that the King ſhould thus wantonly, and without urgent neceſſity, break a peace advantageous to Scotland, ſolemnly ſworn to, and even lately renewed; but the King's creatures and the penſioners of France, whom La Mothe, the French embaſſador, had already prepared to ſerve the King his maſter on this occaſion, carried it by a great majority; ſo war was reſolved.

James takes Norham. Herbert, &c.

James waited not for a reply to his letter, to take the field. On the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, he entered Northumberland, and took diverſe places, particularly Norham caſtle. The Engliſh writers affirm his army to be ſixty thouſand ſtrong; nay, ſome mount the number to a hundred thouſand, which is ſcarce credible. We are not however to diſpute its being very numerous, conſidering the care Buchanan takes to tell us how extremely it was diminiſhed by deſertions, and by being kept a conſiderable while unemployed. The earl of Surrey was then in Yorkſhire with twenty-ſix thouſand men: but, on the firſt news of the Scots entering England, he marched directly towards them, and, by the fourth of September, was near enough to offer them battle by a herald, who reported that the King of Scotland accepted it for the inſuing Friday. James then lay incamped on the edge of mount Cheviot, where he could not eaſily be attacked (1): and therefore the earl of Surrey, perceiving the Scots would fight only in ſo advantageous a poſt, determined on waiting 'till they deſcended on the plain. The Engliſh not appearing on the day appointed, a certain ancient Scotiſh peer † took occaſion to repreſent to James; "That he had done enough to "ſave his honour: that it was not prudent to fight "the Engliſh in their own country, but the beſt "way would be to retire with his booty into Scot-"land, where it would be in his power to fight or "avoid a battle as he pleaſed: that, as he had "taken arms only to make a diverſion in favor of "France, he no leſs imployed the Engliſh forces "without fighting, than by hazarding his army: "that, on this occaſion, he ought not to liſten to "the intereſted counſels of the French embaſſa-"dor, who only wanted to try ſome great "action at another's expenſe, in order to free the "King his maſter from his preſent ſtreights: but, "in ſerving France, Scotland was likewiſe to be "regarded." James looked on this counſel as too circumſpect. As he had determined on giving battle, he fiercely replied, "He would fight the "Engliſh even were they a hundred thouſand." In the interim, the earl of Surrey, to draw him from his poſt, marched along a river (1) which parted the two armies, as if he intended to enter Scotland thro' Carliſle, towards which place he ſeemed to bend his courſe. The Scotiſh King, having thereof notice, ſet fire to his camp, and marched along the ſame river on the oppoſite ſide: but, unhappily for him, the ſmoke of his own camp prevented his ſeeing the Engliſh, who forded the river unperceived. Then James, halting not far from Floddon, drew up his army. It was there the earl of Surrey attacked him, having with difficulty paſſed a ſort of moraſs between the two armies. The particulars of this battle are ſo variouſly related, by the hiſtorians of both nations, that the one narrative is not to be followed without deviating from the other: but, with regard to the ſucceſs, it is not the ſame; ſince they all agree, that the Scots loſt the day, after valiantly fighting 'till night, which parted the combatants. The two armies retiring, the Engliſh knew not they were victorious 'till the morning, when they perceived their enemies had quited the field of battle, with all their artillery. The Engliſh own, they loſt five thouſand men in this incounter, which occurred on the ninth of September: but they ſay the Scots loſt ten thouſand (2). The Scots pretend, no more than five thouſand fell on each ſide; but confeſs their loſs was very conſiderable by the great number of lords and officers of their nation killed; whereas the Engliſh loſt not one perſon of diſtinction (3). King James was never ſeen after that day. The Engliſh imagined they found his body, wounded in two places, on a heap of the ſlain, and ordered it to be put into a coffin of lead, tho' they durſt not inter it, becauſe he died excommunicate: but the Scots affirmed it not to be their King's body. They report, that, before the battle, he had cauſed five men of his own ſtature to wear arms like his own, and that the corpſe which the Engliſh took for King James's, was that of one Elphinſton, who greatly reſembled him: however, they knew not what was become of their King. One perſon indeed avered, that he ſaw him croſs the Tweed on horſeback, after the ingagement; but as the fight laſted 'till night, this evidence is not much to be relied on; nevertheleſs it was the foundation of a report of his not being dead. Some ſuſpected he was killed, in retiring from the battle, by lord Alexander Humes, or his vaſſals: but this fact was never well proved. However this be, it was never known for certain, whether the body found by the Engliſh on the field of battle was King James's or not (4). Mean while, Henry, ſuppoſing it to be the very corpſe of James IV, wrote to his Holineſs for a diſpenſation to inhume it in St. Paul's church (5). Leo X anſwered by a brief, ſignifying, "That the King of England had given "him to underſtand, that, in a treaty concluded be-"tween the late King of Scotland and Henry VII, "and renewed by Henry VIII, the firſt had ſub-"mited to excommunication in caſe he acted in "violation thereof, and yet had broken the peace: "that therefore he had been pronounced excommu-"cate by the cardinal archbiſhop of York, by vir-"tue of a power granted by Julius II: that he died "in a battle, without having been abſolved; but, "in conſideration of his royal dignity and nearneſs "of blood, the King of England deſired permiſ-"ſion to bury him in conſecrated ground. On "theſe conſiderations, the Holy Father was pleaſed "to grant his requeſt, not doubting, as he was told "and ought to believe, James in his laſt moments "ſhewed ſome ſigns of contrition, ſuch as his cir-"cumſtances would admit. That therefore, he ap-"pointed the biſhop of London, or any other pre-"late the King ſhould pleaſe to nominate, to exa-"mine the matter; and, if it appeared that James "expreſſed any ſigns of repentance before his death, "he gave him power to abſolve him: that how-"ever the abſolution ſhould ſerve for no other pur-"poſe than his interment in holy ground. More-"over, he ordered the biſhop, to injoin the King of "England to undergo ſome convenient or ſuitable "penance in the name of the deceaſed King."

Henry VIII. An' 1513.

Among many remarks which might be made on this brief, I ſhall confine myſelf to this one. There was no declaration of war between James and Henry before James's letter, dated the ſixteenth of July, and received the twelfth of Auguſt, nor any hoſtility commited before the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, when James entered England: ſo the King of Scotland cannot be ſaid to have violated the truce 'till that inſtant. Now, he died the ninth of September, excommunicated by the cardinal of York, who was then embaſſador at Rome. Hence I think it may be infered, that the cardinal had excommunicated James without knowing the cauſe, or hearing his reaſons, and probably on a bare letter ſent by Henry, that the King of Scotland intended to break the peace: I ſay, he only intended to break the peace; ſince there is no likelihood that, from the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt when James entered England, to the ninth of September the day of his death, the cardinal, who was at Rome, could have been informed of the actual rupture, and proceed to excommunication. I ſay nothing of the ſuppoſition, that James, ſlain on the ſpot, ſhewed any ſigns of contrition, eſpecially as it was even uncertain, whether the body they would have interred was the King of Scotland's. I paſs over likewiſe the limitation ſet to the abſolution, that it ſhould ſerve only for burying the defunct Prince in conſecrated ground, and the penance injoined a living perſon in the name of a dead one: each reader may make what reflections he thinks proper on theſe matters.

Remark on this brief.

An' 1414. Intereſts and views of the European Potentates.

Such being the poſture of affairs in Europe at the cloſe of 1513, it is no wonder the deſigns and intereſts of the Princes ſhould be different from what they were at the begining of the ſame year. It is therefore neceſſary, before we enter on the recital of tranſactions in 1514, to mention how the principal Sovereigns ſtood affected.

Lewis XII.

Lewis XII burned with deſire to recover Genoua and Milan: but he perceived that, to ſucceed in that deſign, the allies muſt be divided, otherwiſe there was not even a poſſibility of undertaking it. The Pope, Emperor, King of Aragon and the Swiſſers were equally concerned to oppoſe it; and yet, as they had alſo their ſeparate intereſts, he thought it would not be impoſſible to divide them, by offering to each apart, or at leaſt to ſome of them, advantages as great as thoſe they could naturally expect from their union: beſide, he hoped, in treating with each in particular, to excite among them jealouſies and ſuſpicions which would induce them to haſten treating with him, for fear of being deſerted. His hope of ſucceeding this way was the greater, as moſt of the Princes with whom he was in war, were not over ſcrupulous, but rather very ready to ſacrifice their allies to their own private intereſt: wherefore Lewis had recourſe to this artifice, to free himſelf from his preſent imbaraſſment. At the begining of this year 1514, he took care to renew the negociation concerning the marriage of Princeſs Renée, his ſecond daughter, with Charles archduke of Auſtria, as being very ſenſible that Maximilian and Ferdinand were equally deſirous of it, eſpecially on the conditions they themſelves propoſed: nevertheleſs he therein ſtarted difficulties capable of continuing the negociation without intirely breaking it off. This project the Pope could not look on without uneaſineſs. He was as much afraid of Milan's being in the hands of a grandſon of the Emperor and King of Aragon, as of ſeeing the French King reſtored; his intereſt requiring that Milan ſhould remain in the Sforza family, and the ſame was paſſionately wiſhed for by the Swiſſers. The Venetians would alſo have therein found a great advantage, had not a different intereſt prevailed; and that was, to oblige the Emperor to make peace with them on reaſonable terms: but this they could not hope without the aſſiſtance of France; and this aſſiſtance could not be obtained without aſſiſting Lewis XII to recover the Milaneſe.

Maximilian.

Maximilian found his account in his war with Venice, by reaſon it coſt him little. Since the league of Cambray, he had always been powerfully aided by either France or Spain, or rather had never made war but at another's expenſe. His allies were neceſſarily obliged to find him men or money, otherwiſe they might be aſſured he would ſpeedily ſhift ſides. Since he had abandoned France, the Spaniſh troops had done all in the war with Venice; and the King of Aragon, with all his policy, was not able to avoid acting for him. It is not therefore ſurpriſing that he was ſo difficult, when a peace was on foot, or uſed his indeavors to foment diviſions among the Princes.

The King of Aragon.

As for King Ferdinand, ſince he was poſſeſſed of Navarre, it was his intereſt to imbroil affairs, and cheriſh in Italy the hopes and fears of the ſeveral parties, to make himſelf neceſſary, and that a peace might not be concluded without him. He thereby tried to hinder Lewis from thinking on Navarre, and hoped at length to come to a treaty which ſhould leave him in quiet poſſeſſion of his conqueſt; and, for that reaſon, he acted all kinds of parts, in order to attain his ends. One while, he aſſiſted the Emperor againſt the Venetians; another while, he ſollicited him in their behalf. Sometimes he excited the Pope and Swiſſers not to ſuffer King Francis to poſſeſs himſelf of Milan; and ſometimes he offered to aſſiſt the ſame Prince to conquer that duchy: this was merely glaring fallacy and artifice to maintain a diſſenſion to him ſo advantageous: however, his policy began to fail him. He had ſo forfeited his reputation, with reſpect to ſincerity, that he was no longer truſted: it was purely thro' neceſſity, or from a deſire to create ſuſpicion in their enemies, that the reſt of the Sovereigns made with him any treaties, whereon they were ſenſible they could not rely.

Henry VIII.

Henry VIII had honorably got clear of his firſt campain, but plainly perceived himſelf indebted for his good ſucceſs to the impetuous humor of Lewis, who had neglected the defenſe of his own kingdom in order to recover Milan, whither he had ſent the flower of his army. The truth is Henry, depending on the treaty of Mechlin, and the diverſions his allies were to make in different provinces of France, had conducted into that kingdom barely twenty-five thouſand men; a force by far too feeble to afford him much hope of advantage, had he been to deal with the whole forces of his adverſary. Forſaken as he was by the Pope, the Emperor and the King of Aragon, how would he have diſingaged himſelf, had Lewis XII reſolved to defer his Milan expedition to another time, and march his intire army into Picardy? Thus Henry ſhould have conſidered, and in effect did conſider, that he was more indebted for the victory of Guinegaſte, and the taking Terouenne and Tournay, to the circumſtances of the time, than to his conduct and proweſs. He was therefore diſpoſed to get clear of an affair he had indiſcreetly imbarked in, without flattering himſelf any longer with the imaginary aſſiſtance of his allies: it was however neceſſary to conceal his inclination, in order to draw from France advantageous conditions in a treaty. Such was the ſituation of affairs in the begining of the year 1514. But, before I ſpeak of thoſe of England in particular, it is requiſite to recite what ſteps were taken by the Princes concerned in the troubles of Italy, becauſe that was then the chief point whereon all other matters depended.

Leo X tries to reconcile the French and Swiſſers. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

Leo X, being alarmed at the negociation which Lewis XII had renewed with the Emperor, relating to the marriage of Renée his ſecond daughter, uſed all poſſible indeavors to reconcile the Swiſſers to France, that Lewis might be the leſs inclined to treat with Maximilian and the King of Aragon. But he wiſhed that Lewis would ratify the capitulation of Dijon, as to what concerned the duchy of Milan; and, on the other hand, exhorted the Swiſſers to be ſatisfied with a more moderate ſum than was promiſed by La Trimouille: this was the plan he had formed for that reconciliation. In ſhort, he had ſo far gained his point, that the King of France had offered a truce for three years, without however departing from his pretenſions to Milan, and many of the leading Swiſſers were therewith ſatisfied: but it was not poſſible to perſuade that people to abate even a tittle of the capitulation of Dijon; nay, they even debated, whether they ſhould make a ſecond incurſion into France, to revenge the violation of that treaty. Thus the Pope's pains were fruitleſs, and the Swiſſers ſtill continued France's mortal enemies.

Ferdinand prolongs the truce with Lewis XII. Guicciard. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 395.

Ferdinand, having intelligence of what was tranſacting in Swiſſerland, was apprehenſive of being deſerted, whether Lewis relinquiſhed his pretenſions to Milan, or the Swiſſers accepted the truce he offered them: ſo, without communicating a ſyllable to his allies, he ſpeedily ſent Quintana his ſecretary to Paris, who renewed for one year the truce with France on the ſame foot with the former; only, by a ſecret article, Lewis promiſed not to invade the Milaneſe this year. In the publication of the truce in France, there was no mention of Milan: but Ferdinand publiſhed it in Spain with that article; ſo that the world was not a little puzzled how to judge of this affair. Lewis made no ſcruple to prolong the truce, becauſe he could not undertake to invade Milan and Navarre before he had made peace with England: beſide, he was very willing to have it thought, that the truce he had prolonged with the King of Aragon would be followed by a pacification.

This was a conſequence natural enough, and ſeemingly it inclined Henry ſeriouſly to think of peace. But, on the other hand, Lewis was on the point of being thereby greatly prejudiced, in that the Pope, to break his meaſures with reſpect to Milan,

Milan, labored with all his power to procure a pacification between Maximilian and the Venetians. He, above all things, deſired that the French ſhould never more ſet foot in Italy; the intereſt of his See, of all Italy in general, and his own in particular, ſo requiring. While the French were in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe, Italy had never been free from diſturbances, the Pontifs had been leſs regarded than before, and the Florentines had preſerved their liberty: theſe were ſufficient reaſons to make the Pope wiſh they might never return; beſide, he had formed projects for raiſing his family, which their neighborhood might obſtruct. One great means to attain his ends was, to deprive Lewis XII of the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, which would infallibly happen, if it was poſſible to find ſome expedient to make their peace with the Emperor. Laſt year the Venetians, preſſed by the Spaniſh army, had agreed to make his Holineſs umpire, and the Emperor had accepted him; but the buſineſs had ever ſince lain dormant. Preſently after Ferdinand's renewing the truce with Lewis XII, the Pope, fearing a peace would be concluded between the two Monarchs at the expenſe of the duchy of Milan, ſtrove to revive the negociation between Maximilian and the Venetians. He was very ſenſible that, if it ſucceeded, the King of France would in vain expect that republic's aſſiſtance to conquer Milan. Finally, with much ſollicitation, he obtained from both parties a formal promiſe to ſtand to his arbitration, and to impower him to ſettle the conditions of accommodation as he ſhould judge proper: however, by a writing under his own hand, he ingaged not to pronounce ſentence without their mutual concurrence.

Difficulties of the peace.

It was extremely difficult to ſettle this peace, ſince, as the war ſtill continued in the ſtate of Venice and Friuli, the leaſt ſucceſs was ſufficient to cauſe the parties to riſe or fall in their pretenſions. When the Venetians found themſelves preſſed, they very willingly agreed that the Emperor ſhould keep Verona; but then Maximilian would have alſo Vicenza, Padoua and Treviſo. When his affairs were not proſperous, he was ready to leave them theſe three places, but then they could not think of making peace without Verona. Thus his Sanctity, finding the various ſucceſs of the war was a perpetual obſtacle to his projected agreement, paſſed a proviſional ſentence, ordaining; "That both "parties ſhould lay down their arms: that the "Emperor ſhould depoſite in his hands Vicenza, "and whatever was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards in "the Padouan, and Treviſan: that the Venetians "ſhould do the like with regard to Crema, and "pay down to the Emperor fifty thouſand ducats; "but that this proviſional agreement ſhould be "deemed void, if the two parties ſhould not think "proper to ratify it; but, in caſe they approved it, "he promiſed to pronounce a definitive ſentence "within a year." The Venetians thought not proper to ratify the ſentence, being perſuaded that, in their preſent circumſtances, a truce was abundantly more prejudicial than the continuation of war: thus the Pontif's labor was ineffectual. Such was the ſituation of affairs in Italy during the year 1514. We muſt now examine what paſſed in England.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1514.

Henry, at his return from his glorious campain, thought only on mirth and diverſions. The parliament however met the third of January, but there was nothing done of any moment, with reſpect to public affairs. Before the ſeſſion ended, the earl of Surrey was created duke of Norfolk, which title and dignity his father had injoyed, and loſt with his life at Bothworth-field, fighting for Richard III (1): by this change, Thomas Howard, the new duke's ſon and heir, became earl of Surrey. Charles Brandon viſcount Liſle, one of the King's favorites, was alſo created duke of Suffolk; and Charles Somerſet, earl of Worceſter. Margaret of York, daughter of the duke of Clarence, Edward IV's brother, obtained likewiſe the title of counteſs of Saliſbury, as heir to the earl of Warwick her brother, beheaded by Henry VII (2).

Thomas Wolſey had now been ſome months prime miniſter, without receiving other particular marks of his maſter's favor: but Wolſey was not forgetful of himſelf. The biſhoprick of Lincoln being vacant, he ſo ordered that the King demanded it for him of his Holineſs, who had ingroſſed the collations of all the Sees by anticipated reſervations. Soon after, Lewis Guillard, biſhop of Tournay, neglecting to repair to his dioceſe ſince the city was in the King of England's hands, the Pope readily ſuppoſed he had quited his See, and gave the adminiſtration thereof to Thomas Wolſey, both in temporals and ſpirituals. This was ſuddenly and almoſt at once a conſiderable augmentation of the new Favorite's revenue. Leo X, not expecting much either from the Emperor or King of Aragon, eaſily perceived he might want the King of England. In order to gain his protection, he had diſpoſed of the Sees of Lincoln and Tournay in favor of Wolſey, to win him to his intereſt by preſents which coſt him nothing: but, after having ſatisfied the favorite, he muſt teſtify, by ſome mark of diſtinction, his eſteem for the maſter. While the Pope, Emperor and King of Aragon were laboring to accompliſh their projects, Lewis XII was not unmindful of his own affairs (3). Among all his enemies, none gave him ſo much uneaſineſs as the King of England; and that chiefly for two reaſons. Firſt, Henry was young, greedy of glory, rich in ready money, and moreover always ſure of ſupplies from his parliament, eſpecially in caſe of a war with France. Secondly, the diverſion he could and did make in Picardy, by means of Calais, rendered abortive all Lewis's future projects in Italy; ſince he thereby kept the forces of France ſo divided, that it was in a manner impoſſible to aſſiſt each other on any emergency. It was therefore Lewis's main concern to remove from his ſide this thorn, otherwiſe he could not undertake to recover Genoua and Milan. Accordingly, he had been very ſeriouſly indeavoring it, ever ſince the close of last campain, by the ministry of Lewis of Orleans duke of Longueville, taken prisoner at the battle of Guinegaste. This private embassador it was who, in his frequent conversations with Henry, labored by degrees to open his eyes, by shewing how little he might rely on his allies, and demonstrably pointing out to him the artifices they used to draw him into their snares. Henry was convinced he spoke truth; but, in all appearance, was informed of many particulars which he knew not before. However this be, these conversations had such effect, that Henry told the duke, "He "was not averse to peace, provided the terms "were reasonable." Lewis XII, having notice thereof, ordered the duke of Longueville to negociate the affair secretly, and to attempt discovering the King of England's real intentions. Seemingly, Henry insisted some time on his claim to the whole realm of France, and particularly to Guienne and Normandy, which gave Longueville apprehensions his negociation would be unsuccessful: however, to induce Henry to abate somewhat of his pretensions, the duke had orders to demand Princess Mary his sister for the King his master, who had lost Ann of Bretagne his Queen, the begining of the year. This private negociation, to which only Thomas Wolsey Bishop of Lincoln was admited, continued some time without making great progress, by reason of Henry's exorbitant demands. Finally, at a secret conference, which the King himself had with the duke of Longueville, he suddenly desisted from the hardest of his claims, and frankly told him on what conditions the peace might be concluded; adding, "He was absolutely determined on not mak-"ing any abatement." The following is a letter from the King to Wolsey, under his own hand, after the conference, wherein appears his said ultimate determination (1).

Lewis not pleased with Henry's propofals.

Lewis XII, being informed of the King of England's resolution, entertained great hopes of a peace: there were however two articles which troubled him. The first was to pay annually one hundred thousand crowns, as a compensation for Henry's claim to the kingdom of France: this was, in some measure, to own the justice of his title, and pay him a sort of tribute, whereto he could not consent. The other article related to Tournay, which he desired to recover, and which however was not mentioned in Henry's propofals: but with regard to this article, there was one obstacle which was not easily to be surmounted, and that was, Wolsey was concerned: it was not sufficient to gain Henry by flatteries, or by giving him a sum of money in lieu of Tournay; the favorite must also be recompensed for the loss of a See which brought him a considerable revenue. It was therefore to indeavor settling these two articles that Lewis dispatched away to England a splendid embassy; and for this negociation he made choice of Lewis d'Orleans duke of Longueville, John de Selve first president of Roan, with Thomas Bohier, to whom Du Bellai gives the title of general of Normandy, and the King, in his commission, that of chevalier general of France. Mean while, the two Kings agreed on a cessation of arms during the treaty.

He sends embassadors to England. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 405, 406. July 29.

A truce,

Henry refuses to restore Tournay.

It was easier for the French embassadors to prevail on Henry to alter his ultimate resolution concerning the first article, than to obtain the restitution of Tournay: the reason is evident. In the first

Rapin has given us a verbatim translation, as he does of several others: but as, doubtless, it will be more to the English's reader's satisfaction to have originals as they are, rather than re-translations, we give this literatim from Rymer, as above; a method which, in all such cases, shall be constantly observed.

article, King Henry alone was concerned, whereas in the ſecond, the miniſter's intereſt was properly in queſtion. However, as that Prince was determined to make peace with France, Tournay could be of no farther uſe, and a ſum of money would have been doubtleſs more advantageous than the preſervation of that place: but Wolſey comprehended that, when Tournay ſhould be in the King of France's poſſeſſion, he would infallibly loſe the adminiſtration of the See; wherefore the negociation of the embaſſadors on that article was intirely fruitleſs. It was not the ſame with reſpect to the penſion of the hundred thouſand crowns, demanded by Henry; they found means to perſuade him to be ſatisfied with a million of crowns, in which were included the ſeven hundred forty-five thouſand contained in the treaty of Eſtaples; but whereof, in reality what had been paid was far from being conſiderable. The Spaniſh embaſſador, reſiding at London, uſed all poſſible indeavors to intervene in the negociation: but Henry would never ſuffer him, well knowing, he only intended to obſtruct it. The commiſſioners of the two Kings (1) having ſettled all articles, the treaties were ſigned the ſeventh of Auguſt.

Henry admits not the Spaniſh embaſſador to interfere in the treaty.

Three ſeveral treaties ſigned at London. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 413.

There were three ſeparate treaties: the firſt concerned only a renewal of the alliance between France and England: the ſecond was about Princeſs Mary's marriage with Lewis XII: the third related to the payment of the million of crowns. As theſe treaties ſerved for foundation to many others hereafter concluded, it is neceſſary to inſert at leaſt the ſubſtance of the moſt material articles.

TREATY I.

Of Peace and Amity between Lewis XII and Henry VIII, concluded at London, Auguſt 7, 1514.

THAT the amity between the two Kings ſhould laſt 'till a year after the death of one of them. That the ſucceſſor of him who died firſt, ſhould within one year give notice to the other, whether he would prolong this, or make a new treaty.

That all impoſitions laid, within fifty-two years laſt paſſed, by one King on the ſubjects of the other, ſhould be aboliſhed.

That the peace ſhould not be deemed violated by the outrages commited on either ſide.

That neither of the two Kings ſhould afford protection or refuge to the other's rebels.

By the 14th, 15th, and 16th articles, the two Kings bound themſelves to mutual aſſiſtance in three caſes: 1. In defenſe of each other's dominions: 2. For recovery of the territories with-held by other Princes: 3. In caſe one of the two Kings ſhould be attacked on account of the preſent treaty, and affirmed, on his honor, it was for that cauſe. In each of theſe caſes the conditions were different (2): but in the laſt, they promiſed mutual aid, tho' the aſſailant ſhould be relation, friend, or ally of one only, or of both.

Lewis included in the treaty, as his allies, the Pope, the Swiſſers, and the King of Scotland (3). On Henry's part, were named the Pope, Bologna, all the towns of St. Peter's patrimony, the archduke of Auſtria, and the Swiſſers (4).

Scotland was included in the treary, but on condition that the Scots ſhould commit no hoſtilities againſt England, after the 25th of November. Henry VIII. An' 1514.

That the treaty ſhould be ratified and ſworn by the two Kings, and confirmed by the parliament of England and the general ſtates of France.

That each of the two Kings ſhould indeavor to obtain of the Pope a ſentence of excommunication againſt the infractor of the peace.

TREATY II.

Concerning the marriage of Lewis XII with Princeſs Mary.

THAT matrimony ſhould be contracted by proxies, and "per verba de præſenti," within ten days after date of the treaty. Ibid. p. 423.

That the King of England (5) ſhould convey, at his own charge, the Princeſs his ſiſter to Abbeville, where, within four days after her arrival, the King of France ſhould ſolemnly eſpouſe her.

That Princeſs Mary ſhould have in dower four hundred thouſand crowns, two hundred thouſand whereof ſhould be reckoned for jewels, &c. and, in caſe of recovery, Lewis ſhould be obliged to reſtore only the jewels, &c. which ſhould be valued at the ſum of two hundred thouſand crowns.

That the other moiety, amounting to two hundred thouſand crowns, Henry ſhould pay, by deducting the ſum out of one million the King of France was bound to pay by a late treaty.

That the future Queen's jointure ſhould be as great as that aſſigned to Ann of Bretagne, or any other Queen of France.

That, in caſe of Lewis's deceaſe, Princeſs Mary ſhould injoy her dower and jointure during life, whether ſhe reſided in France or England.

TREATY III.

For the payment of a million of crowns.

BY this treaty, Lewis XII acknowledged that, by the treaty of Eſtaples, Charles VIII was bound to pay Henry VII, or his ſucceſſors, the ſum of 745000 crowns, and that himſelf was obliged to pay the arrears thereof. p. 428, 439.

Moreover, that Charles duke of Orleans, his father, by his obligation dated March 7, 1444, had owned himſelf debtor in a certain ſum to Margaret of Somerſet, grandmother of Henry VIII.

That theſe two ſums not being yet paid, Lewis bound himſelf to pay to the King of England, or his ſucceſſors, a million of crowns, "as well for "the arrears of the ſaid two ſums, as on account "of the good affection he bore him, and to the "end their amity might be the more laſting."

That this million ſhould be paid by Lewis, to the King of England, by half-yearly payments of fifty thouſand livres Tournois, 'till the whole was diſcharged.

Thus the war, which had been undertaken on pretenſe of religion, and for God's glory, ended in a treaty, which mentions neither religion, nor the Pope, nor the church.

On the other hand, tho' Princeſs Mary had been ſolemnly affianced to Charles of Auſtria, Lewis XII and Henry VIII made no difficulty concerning this

In the ſecond, Lewis was to lend Henry ſix hundred lances only, and Henry him but five thouſand archers, with the ſame ſea-forces on both ſides as before-mentioned. In the third, one was to aid the other at the charge of him who was invaded.

second marriage, neither did they so much as vouchsafe to demand the Pope's dispensation to absolve Mary from her first contract: only a few days before signing the treaty, Mary declared in the presense of a notary public, and other witnesses; "That she had been forced to plight her faith to "the Prince of Castile, archduke of Austria: "That moreover the archduke, having ingaged "to espouse her by proxy, and "per verba de "præsenti," as soon as he was fourteen years of "age, had violated his promise." She added farther; "That she was credibly informed, the "counsellors and confidents of the Prince of Ca-"stile were, to the utmost of their power, instil-"ling into him an aversion for the King of Eng-"land her brother." On these allegations, the two Kings, making themselves judges in a cause which doubtless appertained to the Pope's cognizance, thought fit the marriage should be consummated.

Remark on the third treaty.

I have still to remark on the third treaty; that, tho' Henry had declared to the duke of Longueville, as appears in his letter to Wolsey, that he could not make peace except the King of France would pay him a yearly pension of a hundred thousand crowns, as a compensation for the inheritance he with-held from him, an expedient was found to satisfy him with much less. The whole was reduced to Lewis's bond to pay him a million of crowns, two thirds of which were already due before the treaty. Beside, that this bond might not be considered as a compensation of the King of England's title to France according to Henry's intentions, it was expresly said in the treaty, to be in payment of the arrears of the seven hundred forty five thousand crowns, due to the King of England by the treaty of Estaples, of another sum due from the late duke of Orleans to Margaret the King's grandmother, and, lastly, for Lewis's good affection to Henry. Hereby was made vanish the principal foundation whereon Henry had grounded his demand of a pension of a hundred thousand crowns; a demand considered by him at first as the basis of the treaty, according to his letter to Wolsey. It may therefore be affirmed, that Henry was no less over-reached by the King of France in the treaty of peace, than he had been by the Pope, the Emperor and the King of Aragon in that which had ingaged him in the war. This proceeded not from his not understanding his own interests; since, in his letter, it appears that he was very sensible of the consequence of his demand. To what then can his easiness be ascribed but to the insinuations of his prime minister, who certainly erred not out of ignorance? Probably, Lewis XII found means to make Wolsey his friend. We shall see still more plainly hereafter, that this minister was abundantly more mindful of his own than his master's advantages, when they came in competition, and that he lost no opportunity of inriching himself.

Death of cardinal Bambridge. Herbert. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 404.

While Wolsey was imployed with the French embassadors in negociating the peace, cardinal Bambridge, archbishop of York, died there on the fourteenth of July (1). The same day cardinal Julio di Medicis, afterwards Pope by the name of Clement VII, sent the King notice, acquainting him withal, that he had prevailed with the Pope not to dispose of the see of York before his pleasure was known. Whereupon the King demanded the archbishoprick for Thomas Wolsey, which was immediately granted. This minister was then in such favor, that he absolutely directed all the affairs of his royal master, who had for him great esteem and affection. It may be presumed that he was now doing Lewis XII some good services, since there are, in Rymer's collection, several letters from that Monarch to him, begining with these kind words, "My lord of York, and very good friend."

August and September passed in preparations for the new Queen of France's voyage; in the celebration of the marriage by proxies in France and England; and in the ratifications of the treaties: after which, Princess Mary was conducted to Abbeville with a numerous train of lords and ladies, where the marriage was consummated the ninth of October (2).

Leo X proposes to King Lewis a new league. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

While the peace between France and England was treating at London, the Pope, Emperor, and King of Aragon omited nothing they imagined would obstruct it. They plainly perceived, it could not but turn to their prejudice, and that the burden of the war would fall upon them: they were even apprehensive lest Henry should join against them with France. Leo X had writ to Henry, persuading him to a peace; and yet, when he saw it on the point of conclusion, would have been glad his exhortations had not been regarded: wherefore, to cross the negociation at London as far as lay in his power, he proposed a new league with the King of France, imagining it would be a means to abate his eagerness for a peace with England. But as Lewis took a fortnight to give him his answer, he was afraid of being left alone, and for that reason made haste and concluded a defensive league, for only one year, with the King of Aragon.

He makes one with Ferdinand.

Fruitless indeavors of the Emperor and Ferdinand to obstruct this pacification between Lewis and Henry. Guicciard.

On the other hand Ferdinand, fearing Lewis, after making peace with England, would invade Navarre, offered him his assistance to recover Milan: but Lewis was too well acquainted with that Prince to repose in him the least confidence. Finally, the Emperor and Ferdinand, desiring at any rate to hinder him from concluding with England, sent him their consent in form for the marriage of Renée his second daughter with Charles of Austria their grandson: and at the same time, Maximilian ratified the one year's truce made by Ferdinand with France; but all this wrought no effect. They had even the mortification to hear, that they were neither of them included in the treaty of London; a clear evidence how little Henry valued their friendship: nevertheless, they both feigned to be very well pleased with the peace, tho' in their hearts they were extremely chagrined.

The Pope tries to amuse Lewis XII. Guicciard.

It was expected that the King of France, being freed from the war with England, would infallibly recover Genoua and Milan. The Pope was thereof so strongly persuaded, that he wrote to exhort him to that expedition, tho' at the same time he imployed his best efforts to break his measures, by an agreement between Maximilian and the Venetians. He even dispatched to Venice Pietro Bembo, afterwards cardinal, to incline the Senate to

Before the coronation was over, there were solemn justs and turnaments held at Paris, by Francis de Valois, heir to the crown, at which the duke of Suffolk, and the marquis of Dorset came off with honor. The King and Queen of France were spectators; but the King was so old and infirm, that he lay on a couch. He forms vaſt projects for his houſe. Sardi. Guicciard.

Leo X was at that time forming grand projects in favor of Juliano di Medicis his brother. His deſign was to become maſter of Ferrara and Urbino, and to join theſe two ſtates to Parma, Plaſenza, Reggio, and the city of Modena lately purchaſed of the Emperor, in order to caſt them into one ſtate for this brother, whom he would fain have made a great Prince: nay, it is even reported that he intended to annex the kingdom of Naples, and had, in order to make that conqueſt, joined in a league with the Venetians: but, as he ſaw the King of France would quickly invade the Milaneſe, he ſhewed great regard for him, leſt he ſhould make an enemy of a Prince who, if he came to be poſſeſſed of Milan, would have it in his power to obſtruct his deſigns. Mean while Lewis, not ſatisfied with the Pope, preſſed him to declare himſelf, reſolving to know for certain, whether he was to conſider him as a friend or enemy. Leo, who perceived his intent, amuſed him with fair words, without however being determined, becauſe his purpoſe was to regulate his conduct by the events of that rupture which he foreſaw. This hindered not Lewis from vigorouſly continuing the neceſſary preparations for his expedition into Italy, whither, in the inſuing ſpring, he deſigned to repair perſonally: but while he was ſtudying means to relieve the Lantern-tower, which he ſtill held at Genoua, and by the help whereof hoped to become maſter of the city, he received intelligence of its being ſurrendered by capitulation, and immediately razed by the Genoueſes. However, this ill news ſufficed not to deter him from his deſigns on Italy.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert.

Before I cloſe the year 1514, it will not be unſerviceable briefly to relate what paſſed this year in Scotland. James IV left two ſons, of whom the eldeſt, who bore his own name, was not yet full two years old. By a will, made before he took the field, he left the regency of the kingdom after his death to his Queen, ſiſter of Henry VIII, during her widowhood. The ſtates being aſſembled early in 1514, immediately acknowledged for King James V, ſon and heir to the deceaſed: as for the regency, there would doubtleſs have been great debates, had not the loſs of Floddon battle made the Scots apprehenſive that the King of England would improve the advantage he had over them. There had never been in Scotland a Queen-regent, and that would have been ſufficient to reject the clauſe of the late King's will: but it was hoped the Queen would prevail with the King her brother to leave in peace a country whereof ſhe had the government. The Queen being declared regent, and writing to the King her brother, to intreat him not to diſturb the minority of the young King his nephew, Henry generouſly anſwered; he was equally inclined to peace or war, and left it to the Scots to chuſe which they pleaſed.

The Queen dowager is regent. Herbert. Hall.

She marries and loſes the regency.

After this declaration, Scotland would, very probably, have remained in quiet under the dowager's regency, had not that Princeſs married again ſome months after. She choſe for her conſort Archibald Douglaſs earl of Angus, one of the greateſt lords in Scotland, and by this ſecond marriage filled the kingdom with trouble and confuſion. As, by the late King's will, ſhe was to be regent only during her widowhood, the queſtion was to appoint another in her room. Douglaſs her huſband uſed all his indeavors to have her continued in the regency. He affirmed, there was no other way to preſerve peace with England; and beſide, Henry would be obliged to ſupport the Queen his ſiſter in caſe any one ſhould pretend to diſturb her: but this laſt conſideration had, on thoſe who dreaded the earl's too great advancement, a quite contrary effect to what he expected. They were ſenſible that, being huſband to the regent, he would always be countenanced by the King of England, and by his aſſiſtance inabled to ingroſs more authority than they wiſhed him. Alexander Hume, governor of all the country north of the Firth, was the head of thoſe who oppoſed the Queen's regency. He was a man proud and haughty, who could not indure a ſuperior. During the late King's life, he had been preſident of the Marches bordering on England, where he had commited ſuch outrages that, as ſome ſay, for fear of being called to account, he killed or cauſed to be killed James IV, when he was retiring from Floddon field after the battle. However this be, Hume imployed his whole intereſt to break Douglaſs's and the Queen's meaſures, and propoſed for regent James Steward duke of Albany. This duke was ſon of Alexander duke of Albany, brother of James III, who, to avoid the perſecutions of the King his brother, was forced to fly into France, where he died. He left there this ſon who, being married and adhering to the ſervice of Lewis XII (1), had received many favors from that Monarch, and acquired great reputation. Tho' he had never been in Scotland, he was however the young King's neareſt relation, and Hume had credit ſufficient to get him declared regent. Hereupon the ſtates ſent deputies to offer him the regency, intreating him to come inſtantly and govern the realm in the King's name. Lewis XII dying while theſe matters were in agitation, Francis I, his ſucceſſor, having great reaſons not to diſpleaſe the King of England, would not ſuffer the duke of Albany to depart 'till he had finiſhed his affairs with Henry: for which cauſe the regent arrived not in Scotland before May 1515. Scotland, during this interval, being without a governor, the diſſenſions among the grandees much increaſed, every one having time to form his cabals againſt the regent's arrival.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1514.

The duke of Albany elected regent.

The firſt day of the year 1515 was the laſt of Lewis XII's life (2): but that Prince's demiſe occaſioned not any alteration in the ſituation of the Gallic realm's affairs. The duke of Valois, who ſucceeded him by the name of Francis I, plainly diſcovered, by adding the title of duke of Milan to that of King of France, that he intended to purſue his predeceſſor's deſigns. Mean while, he thought not proper to declare his intentions, 'till he had ſettled his affairs both at home and abroad.

By the death of Lewis XII, Queen Mary his relict was at liberty to diſpoſe of herſelf, and to follow her own inclinations rather than the public views of the King her brother. Before her marriage, ſhe had conceived a no ſmall affection for Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk, a moſt accompliſhed nobleman; nay, it is even reported that the King had promiſed to marry her to him: but Lewis XII coming in the way, and her marriage with that Prince being to ſeal the peace between France and England, ſhe was under a neceſſity to ſacrifice her love to the good of the two kingdoms. the duke of Valois, preſumptive heir to the crown of France, had the ſaid Engliſh duke very narrowly watched, for fear he ſhould give the King a ſucceſſor. This evidences the Queen's inclination was no ſecret. Lewis XII's death occurring within three months after his nuptials, the dowager Queen was unwilling to run a ſecond hazard of being forced into the arms of another ſpouſe not of her own chuſing. Henry, ſuſpecting her deſign, wrote to her the begining of February, deſiring her not to re-marry without his participation: but the Queen believed it would be eaſier to obtain the King's pardon when the thing was done, than his permiſſion to do it (1): wherefore, in March, about two months after the deceaſe of Lewis XII, ſhe privately eſpouſed the duke of Suffolk. The very next day, ſhe notified the matter in a letter to the King her brother, and taking the whole blame on herſelf, intimated to him, that ſhe had in ſome meaſure forced the duke to this raſh action. Henry ſeemed at firſt highly inſenſed; but his anger was ſoon appeaſed. Their peace being made, they returned to Henry, and were very well received (2).

The parliament in England.

Diverſe ſtatutes. Herbert.

The parliament was then ſitting, and, as England was in profound tranquillity, the houſes were imployed ſolely in domeſtic affairs, which to foreigners are of little or no conſequence. There were however three ſtatutes paſſed this ſeſſion which deſerve notice. It was provided by the firſt, That, for the incouragement of the woollen manufacture, no unwrought wool ſhould be exported. This act by reaſon of its importance, has been often revived and yet, even to this day, no effectual means has been found to prevent the clandeſtine exportation of wool. The ſecond ſtatute declared all the King's poſterior letters patent to be void, except mention was therein made of the preceding ones: this was to prevent the King's being impoſed on. The third was no leſs neceſſary. It frequently occurred that, towards the end of a ſeſſion, ſeveral members went home, imagining there was nothing of moment to be done; and then the factious took advantage of their abſenſe, to propoſe and paſs ſuch bills as probably would have been thrown out had the houſe been more numerous. It was therefore inacted; "That the members who abſented "themſelves before the ſeſſion cloſed, without the "ſpeaker's and commons leave to be entered in "the clerk of the parliament's book, ſhould loſe "their wages (3)." I muſt now interrupt for ſome time the recital of domeſtic, to treat of foreign affairs, which are to ſerve for foundation to what will hereafter be advanced relating to England.

The alliance between France and England renewed. Du Bellay. Guicciard. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 473. 476.

A renewal of the alliance between France and England too nearly concerned Francis I, for him to fail of performing that article of the treaty, whereby the ſucceſſor of him who died firſt was to acquaint the other, whether he deſigned to prolong the term of the ſaid alliance. As he intended to paſs into Italy, to recover the duchy of Milan, it was abſolutely requiſite he ſhould ſecure the King of England. To that purpoſe, about the middle of March, he ſent to the firſt preſident of Roan, his embaſſador at London, a commiſſion to renew his alliance with Henry, as well as the bond for the payment of the million of crowns, whereto Lewis XII was obliged. This was done by a new treaty, ſigned the fifth of April, and exactly like the former. p. 476.

Ferdinand ſeeks Henry's friendſhip. P. 494.

After all the frauds Ferdinand had practiſed towards Henry, there was no room to hope for a perfect friendſhip between them. Nevertheleſs the King of Aragon, who was not the leaſt diſcouraged, ſent his ſon-in-law Henry a freſh embaſſy, to propoſe renewing their alliance. Very probably, he believed not that Henry had ſo ſoon forgot the tricks he had played him; but it imported him the world ſhould know he had a miniſter in England. This embaſſador arrived in May; but was ſuffered, 'till October, to dance a fruitleſs attendance, without being diſpatched: nay, poſſibly enough, he would never have ſucceeded in his negociation, had not Wolſey imployed his credit to turn Henry from the reſolution he had taken of never more having any concerns with the King his father-in-law. I ſhall elſewhere diſcourſe more amply on this ſubject.

His embaſſador very coldly received.

Henry tries to be reconciled with the archduke Charles.

While the Spaniſh embaſſador was waiting in vain at London, Henry had two at Bruſſels, who made no greater progreſs. His dealing with the young archduke had not been over and above gallant, in ſo unceremoniouſly, without any apology, diſpoſing of, to Lewis XII, the Princeſs whom he had affianced. In reality, Charles had not repaired to Calais the fifth of May laſt year, as he was bound by the treaty of Liſle: but it could not thence be infered he had renounced his marriage, at leaſt before he was aſked, whether he intended to accompliſh it. Henry was therefore apprehenſive that the archduke, having lately aſſumed the government of the Netherlands, and made a treaty with France, would meditate vengeance for the affront: wherefore, in order to ſound him, or prevent the effects of his reſentment, he diſpatched away two embaſſadors, (4) to propoſe renewing the former alliance between Henry VII and Philip I, their fathers; but thoſe miniſters were made undergo a tedious attendance at Bruſſels, without being much regarded, or receiving any anſwer.

The affairs of Europe were then in a ſituation which would not allow the young archduke to ingage in any party. It was neceſſary, in order to take juſt meaſures, to wait the ſucceſs of the war which Francis I was preparing to carry into Italy. To all appearance, it would produce events likely enough to change and diſconcert the intereſts and projects of moſt of the Sovereigns, Since Francis's acceſſion to the crown, he had ſufficiently evidenced that he designed not to leave Maximilian Sforza in quiet injoyment of the Milanese. On the other hand, the King of Aragon was under apprehensions for Naples and Navarre. Francis I was a young Prince, full of courage and ambition, and it could not be doubted that he had formed great projects; and therefore all eyes were on him, to see in what manner he would commence his reign. He was making preparations which discovered he had some grand scheme on foot, and took not much pains to conceal that he had Milan in view. Mean while, he used for pretense of his armament, the invasion wherewith Burgundy was threatened by the Swissers: but the league he had lately renewed with Venice, and his offer to Ferdinand to prolong the truce, provided the secret article concerning the Milanese was annulled, were plain indications of his designs. Guicciard.

Ferdinand forms a league against France. Guicciard.

All this sufficed not to make Ferdinand perfectly easy: he was afraid of being deceived by Francis, and that his preparations were intended for Navarre. To prevent this danger, he rejected Francis's offer, and withal made use of it to induce the Emperor and Swissers to join with him in defense of the Milanese; intimating, that there was no room to question that the King of France would turn his arms that way. As for the Emperor, he needed not much sollicitation: he readily ingaged in every league, because he ever found means to do his own business at another's expense. With regard to the Swissers the difficulties were greater, because Francis had among them adherents who indeavored to dissuade them from the league: but finally his adversaries prevailed (1), and the league was concluded between the Emperor, King of Aragon, duke of Milan and Swissers. Ferdinand, on this occasion, failed not playing off one of his usual artifices. He persuaded the Swissers that, to defend the Milanese, the shortest way was to attack the King of France in his own kingdom. For that purpose, he ingaged to make a powerful diversion on the side of Fontarabia, while the Swissers should invade Burgundy, and the Emperor, by continuing war in the state of Venice, disable the Venetians from assisting the common enemy. His chief aim was to defend Navarre, in case King Francis thought of turning his arms that way, and then to hinder that Prince from possessing himself of the duchy of Milan. To both these ends was his league with the Swissers equally subservient: for, if Francis invaded Navarre, the Swissers would divert him from his purpose, by making inroads into Burgundy; but in case he really purposed the recovery of Milan, the Swissers, as next neighbors and most concerned, could not dispense with assisting that duchy. What Ferdinand had foreseen came to pass. Francis, having ordered his forces to file off towards the Alps, the Swissers sent their troops into Italy, where they seized the two passes thro' which only it was thought possible to enter the Milanese. When Ferdinand was assured the King of France was marching towards Milan, he disbanded the army levied for defense of Navarre, leaving the Milanese to be guarded by the Swissers. Even the army Ferdinand had in Italy, under command of the viceroy of Naples, moved not a foot to join them. The Emperor remained at Inspruck quite inactive. Leo X, who had likewise acceded to the league, afforded them not the least assistance. Thus the whole burden of the war fell on the Swissers, without even the other allies supplying them with a single penny of the money promised, But this was not strange: the Swissers were no more exempted than the King of England, and so many other Potentates, whom Maximilian and Ferdinand had served in the same manner.

He deceives the Swissers.

Francis passes into Italy. Guicciard.

The Swissers deserted by their allies.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1515.

Mean while, Francis I, having found means to march his army thro' a streight which seemed impracticable (2), the Swissers who guarded the passes retired to Milan, and Francis advanced also towards the same city. When he was within a small distance, he offered the Swissers a sum of money to return home. This negociation was already in great forwardness, when they received a supply of fifteen thousand men of their nation; which reinforcement inspiring them with fresh courage, they resolved, by suggestion of cardinal de Sion, immediately to attack Francis, who lay incamped at Marignano, little expecting such a visit. They were defeated, and ten thousand slain on the spot; after which, they retired into their country, leaving Francis master of the whole Milanese. Maximilian Sforza, who had shut himself up in the castle of Milan, surrendered it by capitulation, and was sent into France, to pass his life privately. Guicciard.

Francis gains the battle of Marignano.

Before Francis commenced this expedition, Octaviano Fregoso had brought Genoua under the dominion of France, and instead of Doge, stiled himself governor for the King.

Genoua subjected to France. Guicciard.

Leo X had been in hope that Francis would never be able to enter Italy. He had joined in the league against him, but so secretly that Francis knew nothing of it 'till he came to Verceil. During the whole interval between that Prince's arrival in Italy and the battle of Marignano, the Pope was under great perplexities. He had sent an army into Lombardy to support the duke of Milan: but when he heard Francis had surmounted the difficulties of the passage, he sent orders to Lorenzo di Medicis, who commanded his army, not to commit any hostilities against the French; and, at the same time, he assured Francis, that his army was there only to guard Parma and Plasenza. Mean while, as the affair of Milan was not yet decided, he durst not make too many advances to the French King, for fear of disgusting the allies, who would have it in their power to be revenged had Francis been worsted. But, after the battle of Marignano, he immediately struck up a reconciliation with that Monarch; and, tho' he had grievously offended him, obtained however advantages which he could scarce have expected, even had he sided with him originally. The Popes make leagues, and undertake wars as temporal Princes, and when their affairs prosper not, disintangle themselves as heads of the church, and vicars of Jesus Christ. Tho' Leo X's behavior to Francis was such that he deserved no favor from that victorious Prince, he nevertheless obtained whatever he pleased, and, among other things, the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction, for which the Pontifs his predecessors had thitherto in vain sollicited the Gallic Monarchs (3). Guicciard. Burnet.

Leo X makes his peace with Francis. Ibid.

Tho' Henry had not been able intirely to avoid the snares laid by the Pope, Emperor, and King of Aragon, he had happily got clear, but with a firm resolution never more to be thus over-reached. His affecting not to mention them, in his treaty with France, evidently demonstrated he did not much value their friendship. But he was not so fortunate as to persist in this resolution, since it was his own fault that he ingaged in a fresh war with France, not so much for his own, as the interest of others. His change may be ascribed to three several causes. The first is, his jealousy of the glorious success of Francis's arms in Italy. The ſecond, to prevent the growing power of that neighbor. The third, and principal, was the intereſt of his favorite Wolſey who, fancying he had cauſe to complain of the King of France, would be revenged. The two firſt need no farther explanation. It is well known, that Princes are like other men, ſubject to paſſions, and that jealouſy may induce them to run counter to their intereſt. It is alſo known, that policy is as it were the hinge on which almoſt all their actions turn: but, on this occaſion, Henry went on very erroneous grounds, ſince nothing was more capable of ſecuring the peace of England than the King of France's acquiſitions in Italy. The third cauſe requires a more particular explication.

Wolſey's great credit. Pol. Virg.

Thomas Wolſey, archbiſhop of York, was King Henry's prime miniſter, and chief favorite: but ſaying thus expreſſes not the matter fully. It muſt be added, that he governed his maſter ſo abſolutely, that he turned him which way he pleaſed: yet he managed ſo artfully, that the King always fancied he took his own courſe, when he only followed the ſuggeſtions of his miniſter. Wolſey, for a perſon of ſuch mean extraction, had great talents; but he had alſo great failings. He was exceſſively vindictive, greedy of poſſeſſions and honors, and inſufferably proud and imperious. He no ſooner ſaw himſelf fixed in his maſter's favor, but he ſought means to remove from court all thoſe who, by the King's eſteem for them, gave him any jealouſy. Hall. Stow. Herbert. Richard Fox biſhop of Wincheſter, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who had been moſt in favor, received ſo many mortifications from this magiſterial prelate, that at length they left the court, purely not to be expoſed to his inſults. Fox withdrew to his dioceſe the begining of this year (1). The two dukes ſoon followed (2), and Warham archbiſhop of Canterbury retired alſo at the end of the ſame year. Theſe old miniſters being thus removed, Wolſey became ſtill more abſolute over the King, who had only him to adviſe with in his moſt important affairs. The reſt of the privy-council were all the favorite's creatures. The hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, that Wolſey's intereſt was the ſole rule of the counſels he gave his maſter; and, as this intereſt anſwered his reigning paſſions, revenge, greedineſs, ambition and pride, the reader muſt not be ſurpriſed when he ſees him hereafter inducing his Sovereign to make ſo many falſe ſteps.

Francis I wants to recover Tournay. Pol. Virg. Herbert. P. Daniel.

Francis I, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne of France, had meditated how to recover Tournay from the Engliſh: there had even paſſed, in the begining of the year, a treaty on that ſubject, but to no purpoſe, becauſe Henry demanded, in exchange for Tournay, ſome places in the neighborhood of Calais (3), which Francis did not judge proper to grant him (4). But the greateſt difficulty came from Wolſey, who was far from adviſing the King his maſter to reſign Tournay, becauſe himſelf would have loſt the adminiſtration of that biſhoprick and the abby of St. Amand, which brought him a great revenue. On the contrary, he had been extremely urgent with Francis I to beſtow ſome good benefice on Lewis Guillard biſhop of Tournay, that he might ſuffer him peaceably to injoy his adminiſtration, Francis had promiſed it, but without deſignig to perform. Inſtead of aiding him to keep his ſaid adminiſtrations, he ſecretly perſuaded Guillard to ſollicit the Pope for his reſtoration, and even ſtrongly ſeconded his petition. He was of opinion, that, when once Wolſey ceaſed to be adminiſtrator, the reſtitution of Tournay would become abundantly eaſier.

Henry VIII. An' 1515.

While Francis was ſtill in France, buſied in preparing for his Italian expedition, the Pope, yet uncertain of the ſucceſs of that enterpriſe, did not much regard the biſhop's ſollicitations. But when he ſaw that Prince maſter of Genoua, and entered the Milaneſe at the head of a powerful army, he readily granted a bull to Guillard, reſtoring him to his biſhoprick, and even allowing him to make uſe of the ſecular arm to obtain poſſeſſion. This bull, which ſacrificed the King of England's and his miniſter's intereſt to thoſe of the French King and the biſhop of Tournay, would ſeem very ſtrange, did not the conſideration of time and circumſtances make the wonder ceaſe. Leo X had given Francis juſt cauſe to complain of his conduct, and beheld that Monarch on the point of re-poſſeſſing himſelf of the Milaneſe, and concluding a treaty with the Swiſſers in order to diſmiſs them. It was therefore his intereſt to appeaſe him, by granting a favor he ſo eagerly deſired. Henry was extremely offended at this bull, which reſtored to the biſhoprick of Tournay a prelate who refuſed to ſwear fealty to him, and on which the King of France and reſtored biſhop of Tournay might proceed to raiſe there ſome ſedition. He therefore ſent orders to his embaſſador at Rome, to expoſtulate with the Pope, and repreſent to him the conſequences of his partiality. Leo X could not but acknowledge the charge: but, at that very juncture, Francis gaining the battle of Marignano, and preparing to make him feel the effects of his reſentment, it was no proper ſeaſon to inſenſe him farther, by revoking the bull. This convinced Wolſey that Francis was the real author of Guillard's reſtoration. Mean while Pope Leo, not a little imbaraſſed on the King of England's oppoſition, choſe to leave the affair undecided, by refering it to the examination of two cardinals, who probably were ordered not to haſten the concluſion. In the mean time, Wolſey was uncertain whether he ſhould keep the biſhoprick of Tournay: and that was preciſely what the King of France wanted, that this uncertainty might induce the ſelfiſh miniſter to find ſome expedient to make himſelf amends, after which it was apparent he would no longer oppoſe the reſtitution of Tournay. Moreover, to preſerve his friendſhip, which was very neceſſary by reaſon of his credit with the King his maſter, he promiſed to aſſiſt in procuring him a cardinal's hat. Wolſey was extremely ambitious of that dignity: On the deceaſe of cardinal Bambridge, he was in hopes of ſucceeding him in the cardinalate, as well as in the archbiſhoprick of York, and had even imployed, to ſollicite it in his name, cardinal Adrian de Corneto (5), the Pope's collector in England, under whom Polydore Virgil ſerved as ſub-collector; but Adrian, inſtead of ſerving him as he had promiſed, had done him ill offices. Wolſey, thereof having notice, was ſo inſenſed that, on ſome ſlight pretext, he commited Polydore to the tower. Then he cauſed the King to write with his own hand to Pope Leo, requeſting him to nominate in cardinal Adrian's room another collector. Henry's letter was ſo ſtrong and paſſionate, that the Pontif judged proper to comply with his demand: however, in his brief of adviſe, he told him; "He was very ſenſible "his anger againſt cardinal Adrian was inſtilled into "him by Wolſey." Mean while, Polydore Virgil continued in the tower, 'till at length cardinal Julio di Medicis and the Pope himſelf interceded for him, by letters of Auguſt thirty, and September three. As this was at the very inſtant when Francis was ſolliciting for Wolſey a cardinalate, that miniſter deemed it unſeaſonable to deny his Sanctity a boon of ſo ſmall conſequence; ſo Polydore got out of the tower, where he had been about a year. This ill treatment was, doubtleſs, one of the reaſons which induced him, in his hiſtory of England, not to forget any one of cardinal Wolſey's bad qualities.

Wolſey made cardinal. Hall. Herbert.

Wolſey, having at length obtained a cardinal's hat, was tranſported with joy when he received the news by a courier diſpatched to him by the King of France (1): but notwithſtanding he was wholly indebted to that Monarch for this favor, the injury he imagined, to have received in the affair of Tournay, created within him abundantly more reſentment than the preſent obligation inſpired gratitude and acknowledgment. In order therefore to be revenged, he reſolved on indeavoring to ſet the King his maſter at variance with Francis, and cauſe him to enter into a new league againſt France. Herein he gratified three predominant paſſions; his pride, in manifeſting to all Europe, that even Sovereigns offended him not with impunity; his revenge, in creating Francis great troubles; and his own intereſt, in ſecuring the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick of Tournay. In reality, a rupture between the two Kings was a moſt effectual method of preventing Guillard's reſtoration to his See. This is obſerved by hiſtorians as the principal cauſe of the alteration we are going to behold in Henry's conduct. Jealouſy and policy may likewiſe have contributed thereto, but leſs as true cauſes, than as incentives uſed by Wolſey to inflame his maſter's choler. Probably, under color that his honor was concerned, he repreſented to him the neceſſity of humbling the French King's pride, and inſinuated how dangerous it was for England that France ſhould grow too powerful. When he had prepared Henry, he privately acquainted Maximilian, that it would not be impoſſible to diſingage the King his maſter from the intereſts of France. We may reaſonably preſume that the Emperor with joy received this overture: beſide, his being without aid and allies, and conſequently little able to preſerve his conqueſts in Italy, he knew that, which way ſoever he was treated with, he ſhould always be furniſhed with money. While Wolſey was projecting a negociation with Maximilian, the Spaniſh embaſſador, who had unpleaſantly paſſed ſome months at London, was looked on at court with a much more favorable eye: nay, a treaty was begun with him about renewing the alliance between England and Spain, which, being ended the nineteenth of October, contained however only a confirmation of the ancient treaties of amity.

Mean while the Emperor, willing to improve the preſent opportunity, ſent to the King a Milaneſe embaſſador, to deſire aid in the name of Franceſco Sforza, who was in Germany, and had aſſumed the title of duke of Milan ever ſince Maximilian his brother had reſigned his right to the King of France. Tho' Wolſey had taken care to diſpoſe Henry to a rupture with France, he was not, it ſeems, fully determined. Franceſco Sforza's requeſt, or rather the Emperor's, ſeemed to him ſo important, that he deſired to have the opinions of the biſhop of Wincheſter, and the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, who to that intent were ſent for to court. The council being met to debate on this affair, cardinal Wolſey ſpeaking firſt, made a harangue abounding with bitterneſs againſt France, laboring to demonſtrate how much it was England's intereſt to oppoſe her growing power (2). The biſhop of Durham, and all the new counſellors, ſtrenuouſly ſupported the cardinal's opinion: but the old ones indeavored to diſſuade the King from breaking the peace lately concluded with France, ſince the new King had not given him any cauſe, and adviſed him rather to turn his arms againſt Scotland. Henry, who was already prepoſſeſſed, took a middle way, inſinuated doubtleſs by his miniſter: and that was, privately to aſſiſt the Emperor and Franceſco Sforza (3). Whereupon he ſent orders to Pace (4), his embaſſador at Maximilian's court, to treat with them, and to promote the treaty, returned him large ſums of money (5). Thus was he gradually ingaged, without foreſeeing that theſe ſteps muſt neceſſarily terminate in open war, as Wolſey deſired.

In Rymer's collection is extant a paper, evidencing the cardinal not to have forgot himſelf in theſe negociations. It is a promiſe from the duke of Milan's ſecretary, who, by virtue of expreſs power from the duke his maſter, ingaged to pay the cardinal a yearly penſion of ten thouſand ducats, to commence from the day of his maſters reſtoration. It is true this paper, being neither dated nor ſigned, may be conſidered only as a draught of the ſaid contract; but it is however a proof of the cardinal's ſelfiſh diſpoſition. The Emperor no ſooner heard that Henry was inclined to aſſiſt him againſt France, than he diſpatched to England Matthew Skinner cardinal of Sion, to negociate a league with him. This is the ſame prelate who, a little before, had incouraged the Swiſſers to attack King Francis.

They alledged, that they were ſo exhauſted by the late war with France undertaken, at the inſtance of Julius II for the church's defenſe, that they were not in condition to grant a new ſubſidy: that beſide, by a decree of the council of Conſtance, the Pontif could not lay any impoſition on the clergy, without conſent of a general council.

becauſe he was ſupported by the Sovereign: I mean Wolſey. Since that prelate was advanced to the cardinalate, he was become vainer, prouder and more imperious than ever. He never ſtired without a Prince's retinue, always attended by a crowd of domeſtics, cauſing the cardinal's hat to be carried before him like a ſort of trophy, and having it placed on the altar when he went to the King's chapel (1). He was the firſt eccleſiaſtic in England who ever wore ſilk veſtments, and uſed gold in ſaddles. In a word, he deviſed all kinds of methods to diſtinguiſh himſelf. His pride and arrogance gave ſuch univerſal offenſe, that it was inceſſantly talked of with indignation: but none durſt open his mouth before the King, ſince the old biſhop of Wincheſter, for only glancing thereat, was ſo ill received that ſhortly after he withdrew to his dioceſe. The archbiſhop of Canterbury was no leſs offended than the reſt, to ſee the archbiſhop of York thus affect ſo great a diſtinction: but what gave him moſt offenſe was, to ſee the croſs of York carried before the cardinal, tho' he was within the province of Canterbury. I have elſewhere ſpoken of this conteſt between the two archbiſhops, which, after having cauſed violent quarrels, could not be otherwiſe decided than by the King's expreſs command to the archbiſhop of York, not to have the croſs carried before him in the other province. But Wolſey, who thought himſelf much above his predeceſſors, in contempt of theſe prohibitions, prepared to revive the conteſt. Warham, who was of a peaceable temper, eaſily perceived that, tho' he ſhould attempt to hinder it, he ſhould not ſucceed, becauſe Wolſey had ſuch abſolute ſway over the King: wherefore, to avoid perpetually having this object before his eyes, he deſired the King leave to reſign the chancellorſhip, and retire to his palace. His requeſt was immediately granted; and the ſame day the King gave the ſeals to cardinal Wolſey. In all appearance, he had created Warham ſo many mortifications only to oblige him to quit his office, with which he deſired to be inveſted himſelf. To ſupport the ſplendor of his dignity with more ſtate than any other before him, the King daily loaded him with freſh favors, prebends, wardſhips and the like, which continually augmented his revenues. Beſide the archbiſhoprick of York and the chancellorſhip, he had in farm, on very low terms, the Biſhopricks of Bath and Wells, and Hereford (2), held by Italians reſiding at Rome: yet all ſufficed not to ſatiate his avarice. I muſt now, before I cloſe the year 1515, briefly recite the Scotiſh affairs, the knowledge whereof is requiſite for a reader's better underſtanding diverſe events mentioned in the ſequel.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

Alexander duke of Albany, who had been declared regent in 1513, arrived not in Scotland 'till May 1515. He found the kingdom full of factions and diviſions, which made him ſenſible the adminiſtration commited to him would prove extremely troubleſome; but what gave him moſt uneaſineſs was, that the King of England was but too much concerned in what paſſed in Scotland, and to the utmoſt of his power fomented theſe diſſenſions. Under color that Scotland had been ſometime without a regent, Henry VIII, as the young King's uncle, had aſſumed the title of Protector of Scotland, and by virtue thereof his embaſſadors at Rome demanded of his Holineſs the eccleſiaſtical preferments of that kingdom, which he beſtowed on his creatures. But as ſoon as the duke of Albany was arrived, he wrote to Pope Leo, in the young King's name, ſharply complaining of the King of England's incroachments, and the court of Rome's condeſcenſion: he even menaced the Pontif, in his letter, not to apply to him for the future, on any account whatſoever, if this grievance were not ſpeedily redreſſed (3).

The duke of Albany, tho' of Scotiſh extraction, was a mere ſtranger to Scotland (4), from whence the duke his father had retired in 1483. As, at his entrance on the regency, he was deſirous of acquainting himſelf with the realm's condition, he unhappily applied to Hepburne biſhop of Murray, a fiery, vindictive churchman, who took this occaſion of revenging himſelf on his adverſaries. This prelate, being prior of St. Andrew's, had been elected archbiſhop of that church in the begining of the preſent reign: but he was forced to reſign the archbiſhoprick to Forman biſhop of Murray, who was armed with a pontifical bull. However, Forman would never have ventured to make uſe of this bull, had he not been ſupported by Alexander Hume, a powerful nobleman already mentioned. By his credit and authority, Forman was inſtalled in St. Andrew's, having reſigned the biſhoprick of Murray to Hepburne, and promiſed to pay him a certain penſion. Hepburne, finding he had a fair opportunity to be revenged, painted out Hume to the regent in ſuch colors, that when he came to court he was looked on with a very ill eye. Hume, being by nature exceſſively proud and high-ſpirited, reſolving to convince the regent that no man ſhould ſlight him with impunity, went to the Queen dowager and, perſuading her that the King her ſon was in danger, adviſed her to carry him into England. This combination reaching the regent's ears, he repaired ſuddenly to Sterling caſtle and ſecured the King's perſon: but in order that his enemies ſhould not put any ill conſtruction on this action, he renewed his oath of allegiance to the King, and commited the care of his education to three perſons of irreproachable characters.

Alexander Hume and his brother William, finding their plot diſcovered, fled immediately into England, and were ſoon followed by the Queen and her conſort the earl of Angus. When the regent heard this, he ſent Henry embaſſadors to juſtify his conduct, and at the ſame time ſo artfully treated with the fugitives, that he prevailed with them to return into Scotland; but the Queen being very far advanced in her pregnancy, ſhe was obliged to ſtay at Harbottle caſtle in Northumberland, where ſhe was delivered (5) of a daughter, whom they named Margaret (6). HENRY VIII. AN' 1516.

The death of King Ferdinand (1), in February 1516, broke the meaſures cardinal Wolſey had taken to ingage all Europe in a war with France. Thus, notwithſtanding the cardinal's projects, Henry was forced to remain in peace, becauſe the other Potentates intereſts were not agreeable to his, or rather to the paſſions of his miniſter. But tho' Europe was very pacific for ſome time, it will be however neceſſary to relate, in each year of this calm, the ſituation of affairs of the principal ſtates, in order to ſhew the occaſion of the ſubſequent combuſtions.

Ferdinand King of Aragon's death. Herbert. Hall.

Nothing remarkable paſſed in England in the begining of the year 1516, except the birth of a Princeſs, whom the Queen brought into the world the eighteenth of February, and named Mary (2). Cardinal Wolſey, commonly ſtiled cardinal of York, ever mindful of what could procure him any advantage, cauſed thoſe who had managed the King's money to be called to a ſtrict account. The majority were however ſpared: but thoſe who had not the addreſs to make the miniſter their friend, were rigorouſly treated (3).

Birth of Mary, Henry's daughter. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

After Ferdinand's deceaſe, the kingdom of Aragon came of courſe to Joana his eldeſt daughter, already Queen of Caſtile. But that Princeſs was incapable of governing her dominions, by reaſon of her defect of underſtanding which had obliged the King her father to keep her confined; ſo that the adminiſtration of theſe two kingdoms, with all their dependencies, could not be diſputed with Charles of Auſtria, Joana's eldeſt ſon, and Sovereign of the Netherlands. But as that Prince reſided in Flanders, Ferdinand had left by his will the regency of Aragon to Alfonſo his natural ſon, biſhop of Saragoſſa, and that of Caſtile to cardinal Ximenes, 'till Charles ſhould come himſelf and aſſume the government. Mean while, when Ximenes would have taken poſſeſſion of the regency of Caſtile, Adrian Florentio, doctor in divinity, who managed the Prince of Auſtria's affairs in Spain, produced letters patent from his maſter, conſtituting him regent of that realm. But Ximenes refuſed to acknowledge him as ſuch, pretending that Charles had not power to appoint a regent before he was received for governor. The conteſt was however adjuſted by this expedient, that the orders ſhould be ſigned by both: but the cardinal left the doctor the bare name of regent only, and himſelf diſcharged all the functions. Mean while, Charles aſſumed the title of King of Caſtile, with the conſent of the ſtates of that realm: but the Aragonians, more jealous of their privileges than the Caſtilians, refuſed to give him the title of King of Aragon, while his mother Joana was alive: nay, there was a party in the kingdom who maintained, that Joana herſelf could not pretend to the crown of Aragon, becauſe daughters were excluded by the national laws, and therefore Charles could not derive from his mother a right ſhe never poſſeſſed. But others affirmed, that the excluſion of females extended not to their male-heirs. This was much the ſame caſe as happened formerly in France, in the diſpute between Edward III, and Philip of Valois. I ſhall enter no farther into the affairs of Spain. What I have ſaid is ſufficient to ſhew the neceſſity Charles was under of going thither, and how dangerous it would have been for him to ingage in a war againſt France, in the begining of ſo unſettled a reign. Accordingly, he neglected nothing to renew the treaties of peace and alliance, as well with France as England, but with liberty to take other meaſures when his affairs ſhould be in another ſituation. Juſt before the King of Aragon's deceaſe, he had, as Sovereign of the Netherlands, renewed the alliance with England, by a new treaty concluded at Bruſſels the twenty-fourth of February this year. About a month after, Henry, who was contriving to form a league againſt France, ordered his embaſſador to treat with Charles on that head. But Ferdinand's death ſo changed the face of affairs, that Henry was forced to be ſatisfied with a bare defenſive league, which I ſhall preſently mention; but muſt previouſly relate the ſucceſs of a campain made by the Emperor in Italy.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1516.

Rym. Fœd. Vol XIII. P. 533, 545.

P. 525.

It was not without reaſon that Maximilian had readily imbraced the opportunity offered him by cardinal Wolſey, of making war upon France. There was no more likelihood of his being able to keep his conqueſts in the ſtate of Venice, ſince Francis I was become maſter of the Milaneſe, and had joined forces with the Venetians: beſide, he could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the Pope, who had lately agreed with Francis. As for the Spaniſh army, which was retired to Naples, it was not eaſy to make them return, ſince they were neceſſarily to march thro' the Eccleſiaſtical State. On the other hand, King Ferdinand's death had changed the poſture of affairs, and quite deſtroyed the Emperor's hopes. So far was the new King of Caſtile from having any thoughts of a war with France, that it highly concerned him to maintain peace with that kingdom, in order to have time to ſettle his affairs in Spain. Thus the Emperor, contrary to his uſual method, was forced to act alone, during this year, in expectation of ſo imbroiling affairs, that other Potentates ſhould at length be conſtrained to join with him. He had already received ſome of the King of England's money, and cardinal Wolſey put him in hopes of ſtill larger ſums. With this aid, he aſſembled an army of about twenty thouſand men, Germans and Swiſſers, and in March entered the ſtate of Venice, while the Venetians, aſſiſted by a body of French troops commanded by Lautrec, were beſieging Breſcia. On his approach, the French and Venetians raiſed the ſiege, and after making a ſhew of diſputing his paſſing the rivers, retired to Milan to avoid a battle. Thus the Emperor approached Milan without much difficulty.

The Emperor's expedition againſt Milan. Guicciard. Mezerai. Pol. Virg. Herbert.

The French were in ſo great conſternation that they were like to abandon both city and duchy, and retire into France. Had Maximilian made the beſt expedition he was able, he would have doubtleſs conſtrained them to execute this reſolution: but having amuſed himſelf two or three days to no purpoſe, by the time he came before Milan the French had received news that ten thouſand Swiſſers of the Cantons in alliance with France were coming to their aſſiſtance, and were within a day's march.

The arrival of the ten thouſand Swiſſers at Milan, threw both parties into equal conſternation. The French, who conſidered theſe troops as a ſure aid, were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment when they heard that they abſolutely refuſed to fight againſt the Swiſſers in the Imperial army. Theſe laſt, on their part, demanded their pay with ſuch boldneſs, that Maximilian was afraid, it was a pretext not to join battle with their countrymen newly arrived at Milan. He had no money for them, and was apprehenſive the French had but too much to corrupt them: ſo, when it was leaſt expected, he ſuddenly retired, after which, having no money to pay them, the army diſbanded.

The Emperor makes as if he would reſign the Empire to Henry. Herbert.

Maximilian, having thus miſſed his aim, was forced upon new trials to ingage the Pope, the King of England, and the young King of Caſtile his grandſon, in a league againſt France: but this project was not eaſy to be executed. The Pontif had his private views, which ſuffered him not to break openly with Francis. Charles's council were better adviſed than to agree, that their maſter ſhould ingage to gratify his grandfather's paſſion at a time when he was neceſſarily obliged to haſten into Spain, and take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. Thus the Emperor's whole refuge lay in the aſſiſtance he could expect from England: but as there was no likelihood, that Henry would undertake a war of which he was to bear the ſole expenſe, Maximilian bethought himſelf of a device to preſerve his good diſpoſition towards him, or at leaſt to draw money from him; and that was, to declare to Robert Wingfield, the Engliſh embaſſador at his court, that he was tired with the burden of the Empire, and, having a particular eſteem for the King his maſter, intended to reſign it to him. For that purpoſe, he charged him to write to the King, that if he would come to Triers, he would call a diet and ſettle that grand affair, after which, he offered to attend him to Rome, to be a ſpectator of his receiving the Imperial crown: he moreover put him in hopes, he would reſign to him his right to the duchy of Milan, and aſſiſt him in its conqueſt. Henry eaſily perceived Maximilian's aim in making ſuch offers, and therefore wrote to his embaſſador to thank the Emperor for his good intention, deſiring him to defer the execution of this project to a more convenient ſeaſon, when the French ſhould be expeled Italy. Mean while, in return for his good-will, he ſent him ſome money, excuſing the former defect of payment, with laying the blame on a Genoueſe banker (1).

Francis I. forms the project of invading Naples, but does not do it. Mezerai. Guicciard.

While Maximilian was indeavoring to imbroil the French affairs, Francis was forming new projects. He had good reaſon to be pleaſed with his glorious campain, which, in a ſhort time, had regained him the duchy of Milan. Mean while, Ferdinand's death inſpiring him with freſh hopes, he formed the deſign of ſeizing the kingdom of Naples, imagining the new King of Spain would be unable to defend it before he was thoroughly ſettled in his kingdoms: beſide, he believed he had ſo attached the Pope to his intereſts, by the treaty of Bologna, that he doubted not finding in him all the aſſiſtance neceſſary to his undertaking, looking on him as his beſt friend: but he was not well acquainted with Leo X's character. That Pontif did by no means deſire the French ſhould become more powerful in Italy, and if he inſinuated to Francis that he was in his intereſts, it was only to prevent his oppoſing the projects he had himſelf formed in his own family's favor. The Emperor's invaſion of the Milaneſe, this year, interrupted the execution of Francis's deſign upon Naples, and what afterwards occurred made him lay aſide all thoughts of it: however, his deſire to conquer that kingdom occaſioned a defenſive league againſt him, towards the end of the year, as after a few more words, concerning the Italian affairs, will be ſpecified.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1516.

No ſooner was Leo X reconciled with Francis I, than he deprived, on a frivolous pretext, the duke of Urbino of his duchy, and therewith inveſted Lorenzo di Medicis, who thenceforward aſſumed the title of duke of Urbino, and the aged diſpoſſeſſed duke retired to Mantoua.

The Pope diſpoſſeſſes the duke of Urbino. Cimarelli. Guicciard.

It was in order to accompliſh this deſign, that the Pope had flattered Francis with the hopes of aſſiſting him in the conqueſt of Naples. But after he had got poſſeſſion of Urbino, by that Monarch's connivance, inſtead of thanking him for the favor, his whole ſtudy was bent how to drive the French out of the duchy of Milan. To that end, he held ſecret intelligence with the Emperor, the King of England, and the new King of Spain, and, by the help of his emiſſaries, imployed his utmoſt efforts to perſuade the Swiſſers to break their alliance with France. Tho' he acted with all poſſible precaution, he could not treat ſo privately but that his ſecret practiſes came to the King's knowledge, who pretended however to be ignorant of them. On the contrary, he did whatever lay in his power to gain the Pontif ſincerely to eſpouſe his intereſt, otherwiſe he was ſenſible his attempt upon Naples would never ſucceed. Leo X deſired nothing better than to amuſe him, while he was ſecretly acting againſt him. But at length, Francis more and more diſcovering his inſincerity, ſet aſide all thoughts of the conqueſt of Naples, and determined on treating with the King of Spain, who, in the preſent ſituation of his affairs, could not but be deſirous of maintaining with him a good underſtanding. Thus the two Kings being equally inclined to a peace, ſent their plenipotentiaries to Noyon to conclude it. The treaty was ſigned the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, the ſubſtance whereof was; That Charles ſhould eſpouſe Louiſa, Francis's daughter, then about a year old. That he ſhould have with her the King of France's pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, and 'till the marriage ſhould be conſummated, Charles ſhould allow annually, for the young Princeſs's maintenance, a hundred thouſand crowns. That within ſix months he ſhould reſign the kingdom of Navarre to Henry d'Albret, ſon of John d'Albret and Catherine, King and Queen of Navarre, who were diſpoſſeſſed by Ferdinand; and in caſe Charles ſhould not perform this article, Francis ſhould be at liberty to aſſiſt the King of Navarre. Laſtly, That the Emperor ſhould reſtore Verona to the Venetians, who in return ſhould pay him two hundred thouſand crowns, and give him a full diſcharge for the ſum of three hundred thouſand crowns lent him, by King Lewis XII, to maintain the war againſt Venice. It is very viſible, that in a treaty ſo advantageous to France, Charles's meaning was only to gain time, by granting him whatever he could deſire, for fear of being prevented from going to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. Accordingly, this treaty was afterwards very ill obſerved.

He indeavors to drive the French out of Italy.

Francis tries in vain to gain him.

Treaty of Noyon between Francis and Charles. Mezerai. Herbert. Du Beliai. Guicciard.

The peace of Noyon was directly contrary to the deſigns of the Pope, Emperor, and King of England. The Pope was extremely deſirous the French ſhould be expeled Italy. Maximilian was wholly intent on raiſing enemies to Francis, to hinder his aiding the Venetians. He readily comprehended that he muſt reſolve either to ratify the treaty of Noyon, and conſequently reſtore Verona, or defend his conqueſt without the aſſiſtance of any ally. To avoid both theſe extremes, he tried all poſſible ways to imbroil affairs, and kindle a new war which might occaſion a league againſt France; hoping thereby to be able to reject, without danger, the treaty of Noyon, which he believed very prejudicial to his intereſts. It is true, the reſtitution of Verona would be worth to him five hundred thouſand crowns; but from that ſum muſt be deducted the three hundred thouſand which he owed, but never intended to pay, to the King of France: ſo, for the ſum of two hundred thouſand crowns, he was bound to reſtore Verona, that is to ſay, he was to be ſhut out of Italy, which was what alone made him conſiderable in the preſent ſituation of the affairs of Europe. Henry VIII was no leſs deſirous of a war with France, being prompted thereto by cardinal Wolſey, or by his jealouſy of Francis. But it was not the ſame with the archduke, to whom a peace for ſome time was very advantageous.

Negociations againſt France, Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 547.

This was the ſubject of the ſeveral negociations, ſet on foot from the concluſion of the treaty of Noyon to the end of October. The chief aim of the Pope, Emperor, and King of England, was to diſingage the eight Swiſs Cantons, in alliance with France, from the intereſt of that crown, that their troops might ſerve to invade the Milaneſe. Mean while, they were laboring to form a league, wherein they paſſionately deſired to ingage the new King of Spain: but all they could obtain was, his conſent to a defenſive league, in caſe Francis attacked any of the confederates. Leo X, anſwerably to his uſual cuſtom, would not openly declare himſelf, but intimated, that he would readily join in the league when concluded, if a place was left for him. As to the Swiſſers, it was reſolved to include them, tho' they deſired it not, on the hopes of ingaging them by means of ſome chiefs of their nation, who had been gained.

which end only in a defenſive league. Ib. p. 556.

Articles of the league of London. Ibid.

This league was therefore concluded at London the twenty-ninth of October, about two months after the treaty of Noyon. It imported; "That "Maximilian, with the Kings of England and "Spain, ingaged to defend each other againſt any "Prince who ſhould attack one of the three, and the "number of troops, each was to find, was ſet-"tled (1): that all Princes, Potentates, repub-"lics, and ſtates, which deſired to enter into the "league, ſhould be admited: that as the confede-"rates had reaſon to hope the Pope would willing-"ly accede, they declared him head of the league. "Finally, that all the Swiſs Cantons ſhould be "deemed included in the league, provided they "ratified it, and to that end the penſions, which "ſhould with them be agreed on, ſhould be aſ-"ſigned them." By a private article, ſigned two days after, it was ſtipulated what each of the allies was to pay towards the penſions which ſhould be diſtributed to the Swiſſers, "as well to the "public as to private perſons (2)", (which are the very words) to induce them to come into the league. This ſhews there was no certainty of gaining them, and that the chief reliance was on the cabals of ſome intriguing men of their nation.

The Emperor makes peace with Venice.

To this league, inconſiderable as it was, tended all the motions of Pope, Emperor, and King of England, during this whole year's courſe. Maximilian had conceived hopes of ſome greater gain; and tho', by ſtipulation, his allies were, in ſome meaſure, bound to aſſiſt him, if the King of France continued to aid the Venetians, he ſoon diſ-reliſhed a league which procured him no money. Before the year was expired, he accepted and ratified the treaty of Noyon. At the ſame time, he concluded with the Venetians a treaty for ſome months, and they mutually concurred to put to arbitration the reſt of their differences. This determination of Maximilian quite changed the face of affairs, as will appear in the year inſuing. We find in Rymer's collection of public acts, that preſently after the league was ſigned, Henry ſent Richard Pace to the Swiſſers, to perſuade them to come into the league; but this meſſage proved of no effect. On the contrary, the Emperor reſolving to make peace with the Venetians, agreed, that the five Cantons which had refuſed to join with France, ſhould accede to the treaty made by the other eight with that crown.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 570.

Before I quit the tranſactions of 1516, it will be neceſſary briefly to touch on what paſſed in Scotland. Henry, having formed great projects againſt France, and conſcious how cordially the duke of Albany wiſhed that realm's good, concluded on forcing the Scots to remove him from the regency: and, with that view, he required them to ſend embaſſadors, to whom he might impart certain matters advantageous to both kingdoms. This negociation tended only to preſs the Scotiſh grandees to expel the duke of Albany: he even wrote to the parliament of Scotland, that the beſt way to preſerve peace between the two nations, was to ſend back the regent into France, under color that it was dangerous to truſt the preſumptive heir to the crown with the guardianſhip of the young King; intimating withal; "That, in caſe of refuſal, he ſhould be "obliged, by proper methods, to provide for his "royal nephew's ſafety." He alſo gave to underſtand, that he claimed the regency as uncle to the infant King. But to this letter the parliament returned ſuch a reply as fully convinced Henry, that the Scots were not at all diſpoſed to gratify his requeſt (3).

Whether Hume was concerned in the King of England's proceedings, or was only ſuſpected, the parliament ſummoned him to appear and anſwer to the accuſations brought againſt him. Hume, not thinking fit to appear, was condemned for default. He looked on this ſentence as unjuſt, and in revenge commited hoſtilities on ſome of his enemies. Hereupon the parliament granted to the viceroy a levy of ten thouſand men, to chaſtiſe the rebels: but his friends adviſing him to ſubmit, he caſt himſelf on the clemency of the regent, who ſent him to Edinburg, and commited him to the cuſtody of James Hamilton (4) his brother-in-law. Soon after, Hume perſuaded lord Hamilton to eſcape with him, and claim the regency, as James III's ſiſter's ſon (5), and conſequently as nearly related to the King as the duke of Albany. He urged; "That "if the duke could alledge, he was deſcended "from the male-line, it might be objected, that "he was ſon of a fugitive, born out of the king-"dom, and ſcarce acquainted even with the coun-"try language." Truce between England and Scotland;

Mean while, the embaſſadors ſent by the regent into England in May, had concluded a truce the firſt of June. But as Henry had granted the truce only to facilitate the execution of his deſigns, he appeared little inclined to obſerve it, after receiving the above-cited anſwer. However, in order to avoid a war, which muſt have been fatal to Scotland, the regent ſent him, by Francis de la Fayette, certain articles, deſiring his approbation, on which condition, he offered to come in perſon and pay him his reſpects. At that time the affairs of the reſt of Europe having, as has been intimated, aſſumed a new countenance, Henry agreed to prolong the truce to the cloſe of the year 1517.

The Lateran council reſolves on reforming the calendar.

Theſe are the moſt conſiderable occurrences in the ſeveral ſtates of Europe during the year 1516. I ſhall only add a word concerning the Lateran council, which ſtill continued its ſeſſions without being much burdened with buſineſs. As the council interfered not either with the church's reformation, tho' they ſeemed to be called for that very purpoſe, or with the extirpation of hereſy, they reſolved, in order to keep themſelves imployed, to reform the calendar, which was become extremely defective. To that purpoſe his Holineſs, cauſing memorials to be drawn, undertook to write to all the Chriſtian Princes, inviting them to ſend their beſt aſtronomers to Rome, or at leaſt order them to examine what had been propoſed on that ſubject. We find, in Rymer's collection, the brief addreſſed to Henry VIII, where the Pontif ſays, "He had "adjourned the next ſeſſion to December, to give "the mathematicians time to ſend in their opi-"nions."

The Emperor reſtores Verona to the Venetians, and prolongs the truce for five years. Guicciard.

The Emperor, having ratified the treaty of Noyon as far as it concerned him, reſtored Verona to the Venetians, the fifteenth of January 1517, having received two hundred thouſand crowns, and an acquittance for what he owed the King of France. Moreover, to afford the arbitrators time to adjuſt the differences he ſtill had with Venice, he agreed the truce ſhould be prolonged for five years; but on condition that, during the truce, the Venetians ſhould pay him twenty thouſand crowns annually. It was in a manner impoſſible to make with him any ſort of treaty, without his being thereby a gainer of ſome money. Thus finally terminated a war which may be looked on as a mere conſequence of the league of Cambray. The Venetians were ingaged in it from firſt to laſt, and expended at the very leaſt five millions of ducats of the public treaſure, beſide the infinite damages their ſubjects had ſuſtained.

He concludes with Francis and Charles a league againſt the Turks. Herbert.

Maximilian, having thus deſiſted from his deſigns upon Italy, went into the Netherlands to viſit his grandſon Charles before he departed for Spain. During his ſtay there, he concluded with him and the King of France a league againſt the Turks, wherein a place was reſerved for the King of England. The Pope and Lateran council earneſtly preſſed all the Princes of Chriſtendom to join in this league, on pretenſe of the progreſs the Turks were making in Egypt againſt the Mamalucs, after which, he pretended, their deſign was to attack the Chriſtians. But what followed ſufficiently evidenced, that his Sanctity's ſole view was to amaſs treaſures for his own uſe, and to inrich his family.

Mean while, Charles, the new King of Spain, thought only of ſpeedily going to take poſſeſſion of his kingdoms. He had juſt made with Francis I a peace ſo advantageous to France, that he had no apprehenſion of that Prince's breaking it, becauſe ſo doing would not be for his intereſt: and therefore, when the Engliſh embaſſador preſſed him to ratify the London league, he defered it ſome time on diverſe pretexts, becauſe, deeming it needleſs, he dreaded offending the King of France. He ratified it however after ſome alterations, and finally, in Auguſt, departed for Spain, where his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary. On his arrival, he diſmiſſed cardinal Ximenes, who died with reſentment. After that, he ſo gave himſelf up to the Flemings, whom he brought with him, that the Spaniards conceived ſuch a jealouſy as carried them afterwards to great extremities.

The Pope and Francis diſſemble their ſentiments of each other.

Pope Leo, as I obſerved, continually amuſed Francis with the hope of a ſtrict alliance with him, at the very time he was raiſing him enemies on all ſides. Francis was partly informed of his practiſes, but was not acquainted with the whole; wherefore, in expectation of really attaching him to his intereſts, at the long run, as we ſay, he neglected not one ſtep he judged capable of gaining him, even faining to think him his beſt friend when he moſt ſuſpected him: but as the Holy Father was in his conſcience ſatisfied that he merited not the amity of King Francis, he could not believe his advances ſincere. Mean while, it was for his intereſt that Francis ſhould publicly appear to be his friend, and therefore he kept very fair with him, and not without cauſe. In the begining of the year 1517, Franceſco Maria della Rovere, who had been diſpoſſeſſed of the duchy of Urbino, prepared to recover his dominions. When, by the truce concluded between the Emperor and Venice, the Spaniſh troops in the Venetian territories were become uſeleſs, La Rovere found means to gain and imploy them in his ſervice. With theſe ſupplies he took Urbino, and carried terror into Tuſcany and the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate. Lorenzo di Medicis, the new duke of Urbino, or rather the Pope his uncle, being then unable to recover that duchy, he was obliged to have recourſe to the aſſiſtance of Chriſtian Princes, under color that the church was grievouſly oppreſſed, the Medicis family's intereſt being then the ſame with thoſe of the church. Francis I, who had gaining the Pontif conſtantly in view, made uſe of this opportunity to do him a ſignal ſervice, in ſending him a good body of troops, under conduct of Leſcun, Lautrec's brother. This war however laſted ſeven or eight months, during which the Pope never ceaſed preſſing all the Chriſtian Potentates to contribute towards the charges of a war which, according to him, ought to have affected the whole univerſe: Henry VIII, being ſollicited like the reſt, refuſed to be any way concerned in the diſpute: but the Pontif found means to ingage his ſubjects, by levying a tenth upon the clergy, of which cardinal Wolſey was nominated his Sanctity's collector. The Urbino war terminated in a manner little expected by La Rovere: Leo corrupted the Spaniards in his ſervice, who in his name ſtruck up an agreement which he was forced to accept. Thus, being once more obliged to quit his dominions, he again took ſhelter in Mantoua.

While Pope Leo was buſied in the Urbino war, he diſcovered a plot againſt his perſon, contrived by the cardinal of Sienna, who had bribed a ſurgeon to poiſon him. His ſaid eminence, when the conſpiracy took vent, being abſent from Rome, Leo, who paſſionately thirſted to have him in his power, ſcrupled not uſing fraud to attain his deſire. He ſent him a ſafe-conduct, and moreover ſolemnly ingaged his word to the Spaniſh embaſſador not to do him any injury. The cardinal, being ſo weak as to come to Rome on the faith of Leo's ſafe-conduct, was inſtantly ſhut up in caſtle St. Angelo, and afterwards there ſtrangled. The Spaniſh embaſſador complained of this breach of faith; but was was by the Pontif told; "That a ſafe-conduct "was never ſuppoſed to extend to high-treaſon, "without expreſs mention of the caſe." Some other cardinals, accuſed or ſuſpected of being concerned in the combination, were depoſed, impriſoned, or ſeverely fined.

Marriage of Lorenzo di Medicis with the heireſs of Boulogne. Guicciard.

Francis I never ceaſed courting the Pope to gain his friendſhip, as being apprehenſive leſt, by his ſecret practiſes, he ſhould re-kindle the war, to deprive him of Milan. He imagined to have found at laſt a moſt infallible method for attaching him to his intereſts, in procuring Lorenzo di Medicis a very advantageous match with Magdalen heireſs of the houſe of Boulogne. This propoſal was gladly accepted, and Lorenzo, repairing to Paris for that purpoſe, did, in the Pontif's name, ſtand godfather to the young Dauphin, born the begining of this year. In acknowledgment for the King's favor to Lorenzo, the Pope granted him tenths upon the clergy, under color of the war to be entered on againſt the Ottomans: but he took care to aſſign therefrom fifty thouſand livres, for expenſes of the nuptials which were to be ſoleminſed at Paris.

Sale of indulgences on pretenſe of a war with the Turks. Guicciard. Sleidan.

This pretended war which Chriſtendom was to undertake againſt the Turks, ſeemed to his Holineſs to be a fair opportunity to inrich himſelf by contributions of Chriſtians. To that end, he granted plenary indulgences to all ſuch as would contribute, and cauſed them to be publicly ſold at a price ſo moderate, that people muſt have been ſhametully careleſs of their future welfare not to make the purchaſe; and this cheapneſs it was which made the Pontif expect to reap immenſe profit, ſince, in all probability, not a Chriſtian would be without them. Mean while, that the money ariſing from the ſale might be regularly collected, all Chriſtendom was cantoned out into ſeveral diviſions, and in each were appointed collectors to receive the money, and preachers to extol the benefit of indulgences (1). But, by a certain accident which at firſt ſeemed very unconſequential, the archbiſhop of Mentz, who was commiſſioned to appoint the preachers in Germany, thought proper to aſſign the Saxon diviſion to the Jacobins, whereas, in former Croiſades, that imploy had been alloted to the Auguſtines. The wrong done to theſe latter rouſed their jealouſy. They narrowly examined the deportment of both preachers and collectors, firſt ridiculed and afterwards exclaimed againſt them very loudly. At length, Martin Luther, a monk of the Auguſtine order, and divinity-profeſſor in the new univerſity of Wirtemberg, publiſhed ſome writings againſt them, not without ſatyrical remarks on the very indulgences. This boldneſs created him ſome enemies, who, by their oppoſition, obliged him by degrees to inquire more carefully into the grounds of thoſe indulgences; and he was ſoon convinced they had no foundation in the holy Scriptures. From thenceforward he uſed his utmoſt indeavors to undeceive the public concerning the hitherto-received ſentiment of the Pontifical power. Hence ſprang the reformation which afterwards ſpread itſelf in Germany, and diverſe other ſtates of Europe.

MartinLuther begins to appear. Sleidan.

The Pope at firſt little regarded Luther's repreſentations. He not once imagined that the Papal power, which ſeemed to ſtand on immoveable foundations, could be prejudiced by a ſingle fryer: wherefore, contemning this trifling oppoſition, he continued without interruption to ſell his indulgences. He every where publiſhed, that a powerful effort was to be made on the Infidels, and exhorted all Chriſtians to contribute, according to their abilities, towards ſo neceſſary a war, which would procure them, beſide many temporal advantages, deliverance from the pains of purgatory, provided they would qualify themſelves to injoy the indulgences. One thing however very much cooled the zeal of many Chriſtians for this Croiſade. It was diſcovered that his Holineſs had already, for his own temporal concerns, diſpoſed of the money which was to ariſe from the ſale of indulgences: for inſtance, he had aſſigned to his ſiſter Magdalen di Medicis, wife of Franceſco Cibo Innocent VIII's natural ſon, part of the money to be raiſed in Germany. Nevertheleſs, he continued his ſollicitations in every ſtate of Europe. He forgot not writing to Henry VIII, exhorting him to join his forces with thoſe of the other Chriſtian Potentates, and exciting him to this pious work by great commendations of his conſtant zeal in defenſe of the holy See, and exaltation of the faith. All theſe encomiums cloſed with a demand of two hundred thouſand ducats for the pretended war upon the Infidels: but it appears not that Henry complied with his requeſt. The Turks were then imployed in Egypt and Perſia, and the Croiſade was founded only on a bare conjecture that, after ending thoſe wars, they would invade Chriſtendom. One muſt have wilfully ſhut his eyes, not to perceive the whole to be merely a pretext to repleniſh his Sanctity's coffers: beſide, in the then poſture of affairs in Europe, Henry had no great occaſion for the Pontif.

The Pope continues to ſollicit a Croiſade.

In this interim, cardinal Wolſey, perceiving the league of London would come to nothing, becauſe Francis was not diſpoſed to commence a freſh war with any of the confederates, dreaded his laying hold on this pacific interval to move the Tournay buſineſs. On the other hand, by many circumſtances which had occurred ſince the ſaid affair had been put into the commiſſioners hands, he was ſufficiently convinced how much he was conſidered, on account of the abſolute ſway he bore over his royal maſter. Indeed, nothing could be expected from the King but thro' his means, and for that reaſon all the Princes ſtudiouſly made their court to him, to gain him to their intereſts. In Rymer's collection of this year's public acts, we find that Charles King of Spain aſſigned him a penſion of three thouſand livres annually, tho' he had not as yet received from him the leaſt ſervice; and therefore it was for thoſe he hoped to receive in futuro. Mean while, Wolſey was uneaſy about Tournay. As the Pope and King of France regarded him only for the ſake of what he could do for them, he ran the hazard of their retracting the deference they expreſſed for him, in caſe they ſhould ever chance to ſtand no longer in need of his aſſiſtance. He began therefore privately to intimate to Francis I, that it would not be impracticable to prevail on King Henry to part with Tournay for a valuable conſideration in money, provided he himſelf was recompenſed for the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick. I ſhall, under next year's occurrences, recite the ſucceſs of this negociation.

he would paſs over and have with him a perſonal conference. The Emperor, who had never intended any ſuch reſignation of the Empire, and ſtill leſs at that juncture, replied very courteouſly; "That, "to ſave King Henry the trouble of croſſing the "ſea, he would himſelf go and confer with him "in England." But when the embaſſadors preſſed him on the affair they were charged with, they found he ſought only to evade his ſaid ſpontaneous offer. One while he ſaid; he would reſign the Empire to Henry, but firſt would try to obtain of the Imperial diet, that himſelf might retain the title of King of the Romans; and the ſame be rendered hereditary to his family. Another while; he talked of making Charles his grandſon Emperor, Henry King of the Romans, Ferdinand Charles's brother King of Auſtria, and himſelf only marſhal of the Empire. Such irreſolution convinced the embaſſadors nothing was to be expected from the negociation; and they notifying the ſame to their Sovereign, that Prince was readily perſuaded, that Maximilian had no other deſign than to draw from him a ſum of money.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert. Pol. Virg.

The affairs of Scotland were ſtill in the utmoſt diſorder, by reaſon of its inteſtine diviſions. Alexander Hume and his brother William, after ſeveral pardons, were finally beheaded (3). Theſe two brothers being thus removed, the duke of Albany, hoping Scotland would be in perfect tranquillity, reſolved to take a journey into France, promiſing to return in few months: but being detained there longer than he expected, by accidents hereafter mentioned, the Scotiſh affairs fell into very great confuſion, on account of the diſſenſions among the grandees, which were inflamed by thoſe who deſigned therefrom to take advantage.

An' 1518. Leo X ſends legates to ſollicit the Croiſade. Guicciard. Hollingſh.

Mean while, Pope Leo eagerly puſhed the affair of the pretended war, contriving, with the embaſſadors reſiding at his court, projects which would have required a more fervent zeal and a perfecter union than are uſually to be met with among Potentates. To execute his deſigns, he muſt have amaſſed vaſt ſums of money, and that was the ſecret intent of the league propoſed by his Holineſs, and whereof he was to be head and director. In order thereto, he exhauſted, if I may ſo expreſs it, the church's treaſures, to incourage the faithful to exchange their periſhable wealth for eternal advantages. This affair was carried ſo far, that he ſent legates to every court, to excite the Sovereigns to unite their forces to deſtroy the Infidels. There was not one who did not outwardly expreſs a moſt ardent deſire to apply himſelf to ſo holy a work, provided he could be ſecured from being diſturbed by his neighbors: but that was what rendered the execution of this project extremely difficult, becauſe they had not any confidence in each other. Nor had they a tittle more in the Pope himſelf, who, ſince the begining of his pontificate, had but too plainly diſcovered that the concerns of religion were not what moſt affected him. Wherefore, in ſeeing him act thus zealouſly, they could not help ſuſpecting, that the deſire of inriching himſelf by voluntary contributions of Chriſtians, by the ſale of indulgences, by tenths of the clergy, and by the bounties of Sovereigns, was what moſt fired his zeal. Nevertheleſs, not one of them cared to ſhew any averſeneſs to the undertaking, leſt he ſhould be taxed with not having a due regard for religion: but they gave only words, whereas his Sanctity wanted deeds. Hence the Pope's ſcheme of a univerſal league had not, as will hereafter be ſeen, the ſucceſs he expected: nevertheleſs his ſaid project, tho' merely chimerical, ſerved for pretenſe and a cloke to many other deſigns. The Emperor, deſiring to have one of his grandſons choſen King of the Romans, uſed the pretext of this imaginary war, Chriſtendom was in danger of from the Turks, to ſhew the neceſſity of continuing the Imperial dignity in the houſe of Auſtria, there being no other in Germany able, by its own ſtrength, to withſtand their arms. Charles King of Spain made uſe of the ſame pretenſe for the ſame purpoſe. Beſide that, as he had occaſion for ſome years of peace, he ſtrenuouſly inſiſted on the project of a general truce, that the Chriſtian Princes might be free to unite their forces againſt the Ottomans. Francis plainly ſaw, by the defenſive league made againſt him, that a pretext was only ſought to invade him, and recover the Milaneſe; wherefore a general truce could not but be advantageous to him in his then circumſtances. He had moreover in view the reduction of Tournay, which could be effected only during a peace. Henry VIII, knowing that the Pope, Emperor, and Kings of France and Spain had joined in a league againſt the Turks, was apprehenſive that league veiled ſome combination againſt him; and for that reaſon, he would not refuſe entering into the ſame ingagement, for fear of furniſhing them with a handle. Thus the chief Potentates of Europe being concerned to improve the Croiſade, or at leaſt not to reject it, the leſſer powers were alſo obliged to follow the torrent: and this it was which gave the Pope great hope he ſhould at laſt accompliſh his deſigns; but, as in reality not one of the Princes thought the affair practicable, the project was ſtill very remote from being executed.

Henry VIII. An' 1518.

The project of the Croiſade uſeful to the houſe of Auſtria. Mezerai.

While Leo X amuſed himſelf with theſe expectations, Francis was abundantly more ſeriouſly meditating how to recover Tournay, than on any thing concerning the Croiſade. On the other hand cardinal Wolſey was afraid of loſing the adminiſtration of that biſhoprick, becauſe he ſaw no likelihood of ſowing diſcord between France and England, at a juncture when every Potentate in Europe expreſſed a deſire to live in peace. He could not therefore keep the adminiſtration, provided Guillard, the rightful biſhop, would ſwear allegiance to King Henry, whereto he ſeemed inclined. This induced him to imbrace the ſecret offers of Francis, to make him ample amends if he could prevail on the King his maſter to reſtore that place to France.

Negociation touching Tournay. Herbert. Stow. Pol. Virg.

(1) The chief author of this inſurrection (which began April 28) was one John Lincoln a broker. He drew up a paper full of complaints againſt the foreign merchants, which he got doctor Bele, a noted preacher, to read in his pulpit on Eaſter Tueſday; whereupon the mob aſſembled, and commited ſeveral outrages. The curious may find a particular account of this commotion in Hall, fol. 59——63. Hollingſh. p. 840, &c.

(2) This diſtemper continued from July 'till the middle of December. Francis

Henry VIII. An' 1518.

Francis was very ſenſible that, before all things, the cardinal was to be ſatisfied, not only to get him Tournay, but to procure it as cheap as poſſible. This was the ſubject of a private negociation between them, before any part of the affair was communicated to Henry. To ſucceed, Francis ſpared neither flatteries, nor promiſes, nor preſents. If Polydore Virgil may be credited, theſe preſents were very conſiderable: however, it was between them ſtipulated; That the cardinal ſhould be recompenſed with a yearly penſion for his loſs of the adminiſtration; and that the King of France ſhould pay Henry ſix hundred thouſand crowns for Tournay. But as this ſum was ſomewhat too exorbitant, a certain expedient, hereafter ſpecified, was found to reduce it to one conſiderably more moderate. On theſe two conditions, the cardinal undertook to obtain his maſter's conſent to the King of France's deſires. One of leſs aſſurance than cardinal Wolſey, and not ſo ſecure of the King's confidence, would doubtleſs have been greatly imbaraſſed, ſince the buſineſs was to convince the King of directly the contrary to what thitherto he had been indeavoring to perſuade him, namely, that Tournay was no longer of any utility. When Francis would have treated for the reſtitution of Tournay, Wolſey had repreſented to the King; "That, both "for his own and England's intereſt, it was of "very great conſequence to keep that place, which "was moreover a perpetual monument of his "victories, while it ſhould be in his hands." Now altering his tone, he undertakes to perſuade, and indeed does perſuade him; "That the place is "quite uſeleſs, and the maintenance of its gariſon "abundantly out-balances all advantages he can "thence propoſe to receive: that it was better to "yield it to the King of France, who earneſtly "ſued for it, and, to obtain it, ſcrupled not con-"deſcending to make preſents to a miniſter: that "nothing could be more honorable for the King, "than to ſee that Monarch make the firſt advan-"ces to procure his friendſhip, and render it per-"petual by the Dauphin's marriage with Princeſs "Mary, as he alſo propoſed: that therefore the "preſent opportunity ſhould be improved to re-"ceive a good ſum of money in lieu of Tour-"nay, which, being ſo remote from Calais, would "infallibly be loſt on the firſt rupture between the "two crowns: that hereby the King of France, a "moſt powerful Prince, would be obliged to be "his friend, and their union would render them "umpires of Europe: that this union was the more "neceſſary, as it was time to think of oppoſing the "growing power of the houſe of Auſtria, which "family, poſſeſſing the Empire, Spain, the Ne-"therlands, the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, "was infallibly on the point of becoming extreme-"ly formidable to all other Sovereigns." The ſtrength of theſe reaſons was too manifeſt for Henry to reſiſt them: all he could think ſtrange was, that the cardinal had not ſooner propoſed them, but 'till then had rather uſed arguments directly oppoſing the reſtitution of Tournay. But, as it has been remarked, Wolſey had over him ſuch aſcendancy that he could perſuade him, pro and con, juſt as he pleaſed (1).

Pol. Virg.

Henry having agreed to the cardinal's propoſals, what remained was to treat on the matter. As ſoon as Francis was informed of it, he ſent to England a ſolemn embaſſy, conſiſting of admiral Bonnivet, Stephen Poncher biſhop of Paris, and M. de Villeroy ſecretary of ſtate (2). For form's ſake, ſome time muſt be imployed in this negociation, tho' the King of France and Wolſey had already agreed on the chief articles, by the mediation of Villeroy, who had been in London ever ſince the begining of July, whereas the collegues arrived not 'till two months later. The French embaſſadors had full powers to treat of renewing friendſhip between the two Kings; of a league with the Pope and all Chriſtian Princes who deſired to be included in it, for the defenſe of religion and the church; of a marriage between the Dauphin and Princeſs Mary King Henry's daughter; of the reſtitution of Tournay, St. Amand, and Mortagne; and of an interview of the two Kings. Moreover, they brought Francis's letters patent, whereby he promiſed to pay annually to his good friend the cardinal of York, a penſion of twelve thouſand livres, in conſideration of his relinquiſhing the adminiſtration of the biſhoprick of Tournay. As the treaties concluded on theſe articles were not ready 'till the begining of October, I ſhall briefly touch on another affair, tranſacted at this very juncture.

The Pope was ſtill intent on the Croiſade buſineſs, whence he hoped to draw great profits. He wrote laſt year to all Chriſtian Princes, to notify the victory of Selim the Turkiſh Emperor over the Mamalucs of Egypt, whoſe Empire he had utterly ſubverted. Early in this year, he cauſed the college of cardinals to ſend a letter to Henry, repreſenting to him, the danger Chriſtendom was in after the victory obtained by the Ottoman Emperor over the Sultan of Egypt, who, according to the beſt advices, was ſlain in battle. The cardinals exhorted the King to undertake the defenſe of religion, jointly with all the other Chriſtian Sovereigns, with the Pope and ſacred college, who were ready to ſacrifice to that end, their own, as well as the church's treaſures. The plain meaning of all this was, that Henry ought to contribute largely in money towards the Croiſade, his country being too remote from Turky to ſend thither his forces.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 603.

Some time after, the Pope ſent legates a latere (3) to ſeveral courts (4), with orders to exhort the Sovereigns to accept and preſerve a five years truce, injoined by his power apoſtolic. They were likewiſe to uſe their indeavors to perſuade them to unite all their forces, and make war upon the Turk. Cardinal Lorenzo Campejo was appointed for England, and already departed from Rome in the begining of May, in order to execute his commiſſion. But Wolſey deemed it a very great affront, that the Pope had not thought of him for his legateſhip. Wherefore, while Campejo was on the road, he ſent a truſty meſſenger to Rome, repreſenting to his Holineſs, "That, by ſhewing ſo little regard to "a cardinal actually in England, and the King's "prime miniſter, he put it out of his power to do "him any ſervice: that whatever he ſhould ſay to "ſupport what his Sanctity required, would be of "no weight, ſince he ſhould be conſidered as one

They who for a certain time, and in certain places, are delegated to convene ſynods for reſtoring church-diſcipline and other emergencies. 4. " whom the court of Rome could not truſt with " the legateſhip: that it was rather the Pontif's in- " tereſt to make uſe of him to obtain his views, " conſidering the confidence wherewith the King " honored him, and that, without his aſſiſtance, " the preſent affair would be in danger of miſcar- " rying." Leo X, therefore, by this repreſenta- tion, readily comprehended, that Wolſey muſt be ſatisfied: and by a bull, dated May 17, he joined him with Campejo in the ſame commiſſion (1), giving equal authority to both, " knowing (ſays he " in the bull directed to Wolſey) your great credi- " with the King, and how eaſily you can perſuade " or diſſuade him." Mean while Campejo arriv- ing at Boulogne, Wolſey found means to detain him there 'till he had received the Pontif's anſwer: for which reaſon it was the twenty-ninth of July be- fore the Italian legate made his entry into London. As he had but a very mean equipage, Wolſey ſent him twelve mules carrying coffers ſumptuouſly co- vered: but certain of the ſaid coffers happening to ſlip down during the proceſſion, and being broke open with the fall, were found empty (2), to the great ſport and laughter of the populace, who de- rided this external pageantry. In Rymer's collecti- on of public acts is extant a bull of Leo X, with extraordinary powers to the two legates, authoriſing them to grant a plenary indulgence to the faithful of either ſex, who ſhould be preſent at the maſs which either of the legates ſhould celebrate in preſenſe of the King and Queen, or at leaſt at the bene- diction, provided they confeſſed their ſins, or de- ſired to confeſs, and were penitent.

The legates commiſſion.

The legates commiſſion conſiſted of two points. The firſt was; to attempt obtaining from the clergy an aid of money for the war againſt Infidels: but the eccleſiaſtics ſo well maintained their ground, that all their efforts were ineffectual. The ſecond was; to perſuade Henry to join in the projected league with all Chriſtian Potentates for defenſe of religion and the church. The Pope's deſign was not to undertake a war againſt the Turk, but only, under that color, to procure a round ſum of money. Thus, the league he was meditating was ſolely to make the world believe, he really intended to at- tack the Ottomans; which effected, he had a moſt plauſible pretext to lay impoſitions on all the clergy, and drain the purſes of Sovereigns and their ſub- jects, to bear the charges of the pretended war. With this league therefore he was to begin, and on that head the legates were commiſſioned to treat with King Henry, who ſeemed inclined to accede, tho' he might eaſily foreſee the league would evapo- rate in ſmoak.

Cardinal Adrian de- poſed.

As cardinal Wolſey's credit increaſed in England, it became likewiſe greater at the Pontifical court. He had, as has already been obſerved, got cardi- nal Adrian de Corneto removed from the office of his Sanctity's collector in England: but a chaſtiſe- ment ſo moderate not ſufficing to ſatiate Wolſey's vindictive ſpirit, he had ſo managed, that King Henry wrote to the Pontif, requeſting him to de- prive Adrian of the cardinalate, and of the bi- ſhoprick of Bath and Wells, then in his poſſeſſion. Leo X could not but think it very ſtrange, that the King ſhould make ſuch a requeſt, and yet not al- ledge any reaſon: however, without giving him a poſitive denial, he contented himſelf with ſaying; " He would, at a properer ſeaſon, give him ſatis- " faction." In 1517, a conſpiracy was formed againſt the Pope, wherein cardinal Adrian was con- cerned, and was therefore impriſoned. Guicciar- dini affirms, he was never more heard of, and that it is not known what became of him (3): but, in Rymer's collection, is to be ſeen a letter of cardinal Julio di Medicis, dated the fifth of July 1518, no- tifying to King Henry that, in a conſiſtory held that day, cardinal Adrian was depoſed and ſtriped of all his preferments; intimating withal to the King, that it was done in regard to him: but it is more probable, he was puniſhed for his having of- fended the Holy Father. However this be, a few days after, the Pope gave cardinal Wolſey the ad- miniſtration of the biſhoprick of Bath and Wells, preſuming he ſtood in need of that additional in- come to ſupport the dignity of his purple.

p. 609, 622, 623.

The negociation of the two cardinals proceeded very ſlowly, ſince it was not ſufficient to incline Henry to the league, but all the European Sove- reigns were alſo to give their conſent. Accordingly, the Pontif, to the utmoſt of his power, ſolli- cited every Potentate, magnifying the danger to which the Chriſtian religion was on the point of be- ing expoſed. Finally, all Princes returning him the ſame anſwer, viz: " That it was requiſite all the " Sovereigns ſhould unite in this affair," he diſ- patched away a bull to his legates in England, im- powering them to conclude between the Emperor, and the Kings of France and Spain, a league againſt the Turks. His drift was, that this league ſhould be offenſive, elſe it would be of no advan- tage to him, except the Turk really intended to in- vade Chriſtendom, which was hitherto looked on as a very uncertain ſuppoſition. But Leo was too well known, for the Princes to be thus taken in a ſnare, which tended only to render his ſaid Holi- neſs maſter of their own, and their peoples purſes: wherefore, pretending zealouſly to enter into his project, they contented themſelves with concluding together a defenſive league to protect the Pope, the holy See, and their reſpective dominions, againſt all invaders, and particularly againſt the Ottoman Emperor (4). Of this league the Pope was de- clared head, provided he ratified it within a certain time ſpecified; but, the treaty mentioned not what each of the allies was to furniſh: all which demon- ſtrates that this league, according to the parties in- tentions, was only to caſt a miſt before peoples eyes, to give Leo ſome ſatisfaction, and perhaps ſomewhat to frighten the Turks.

This was not what the Pontif required: he could have wiſhed, all the Princes of Chriſtendom had joined together in a league offenſive againſt the Turk, and ingaged to ſend their forces to Conſtan- tinople, to attack the Ottoman Emperor in his capital. In ſuch caſe, he was ſenſible that the moſt remote would have been eaſily induced to furniſh their quota in money. Ever ſince Europe's frenzy for Croiſades began to abate, the Popes had not miſſed any occaſion to attempt rekindling the ſame mad zeal which had formerly procured to their pre- deceſſors ſo many great advantages. But the peo- ple as well as their Sovereigns were utterly diſcou- raged, becauſe it was but too viſible that, by thoſe

Leo X, ſeeing he could obtain no more, approved and ratified the league the thirty-firſt of December, after which it was never more mentioned: all thoſe terrible preparations, the Turks were ſaid to have been making to fall upon the Chriſtians, intirely vaniſhed, as ſoon as the Pontif found his artifices could not produce the effect he expected.

Several treaties between France and England.

While this affair was on the anvil, cardinal Wolſey, jointly with the French embaſſadors, was buſied in preparing the agreed on treaties to be ſigned.

I. Treaty, of marriage between the Dauphin and Mary. p. 624--641.

The firſt related to the eſpouſals of Princeſs Mary with the Daughin, which were to be ſolemniſed when the young Prince ſhould have compleated his fourteenth year, each of the two Kings ingaging himſelf to the forfeiture of five hundred thouſand crowns, in caſe it was his fault the nuptials were not accompliſhed. Mary's dower was to be three hundred thirty three thouſand gold crowns, one moiety to be paid on the day of marriage, and the other one year after. The jointure was to be as great as had ever been aſſigned to any Queen of France, and particularly to Ann of Bretagne and Mary of England, King Lewis XII's conſorts.

II. Treaty concerning Tournay. p. 642. Hall.

The ſecond treaty was on the reſtitution of Tournay, for which Francis ingaged to pay Henry ſix hundred thouſand crowns, of thirty-five-ſols Tournois each, beſide fifty thouſand livres Tournois due to him from the inhabitants (1); but out of theſe two ſums Francis was to deduct Princeſs Mary's dower: as to the payments, he obliged himſelf to pay fifty thouſand livres on taking poſſeſſion of the place, and then twenty-five thouſand livres every ſix months 'till the whole was diſcharged (2).

III. Treaty relating to hoſtilities. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 649.

The third treaty concerned ſuch outrages as might thenceforward be commited againſt the peace, by the ſubjects of either King, and contained certain rules to procure ſpeedy reparation.

IV. Treaty touching an interview. p. 679.

By the fourth, the two Monarchs agreed on an interview in the village of Sandinfelt, between Ardres and Guiſnes.

Wolſey's recompenſe for his loſſes. p. 611.

Theſe treaties being ſigned, the fourteenth of October, the French embaſſadors gave cardinal Wolſey their maſter's letters patent, whereby he bound himſelf to pay him yearly a penſion of twelve thouſand livres Tournois, to ſatisfy him for his loſing the biſhoprick of Tournay.

Eſpouſals of the Dauphin with Mary. p. 666, 678.

So ſoon as the two Kings had ratified the treaties, and ſolemnly ſworn to the peace at London and Paris, the King and Queen of France, acting in the name of the Dauphin their ſon, affianced Princeſs Mary, repreſented by the earl of Worceſter (3) her proxy. This ceremony was performed at Paris the twenty-firſt of December (4).

AN' 1419. Death of the Emperor. Guicciard. Herbert.

Europe then injoyed a profound tranquillity. But, on the Emperor Maximilian's demiſe, which happened (5), January 21, 1519, new troubles aroſe. By his death, France, Spain, Italy, Germany, England, Scotland and the Netherlands were ingaged in wars no leſs deſtructive to thoſe regions than were the late preceding commotions. Maximilian was no ſooner in his grave, than the Kings of France and Spain openly declared themſelves candidates for the Empire, and began to cabal among the electors to obtain their deſires. This threw the electors into great perplexity: on which ſide ſoever they turned, they ſaw for themſelves, for Germany and for all Europe, advantages and inconveniencies which merited their whole attention. It would have been the intereſt of Germany to keep the ballance even between the two Monarchs who aſpired to the Imperial dignity, and to reject both: but by chuſing one of the competitors, ſuch ſuperiority would be given him as could not but be detrimental to all Europe, particularly to Germany. I ſhall not farther inſiſt on the reaſons the electors had to chuſe one, or reject both: it is well known, on theſe occaſions, the public good does not always ſerve for rule and foundation to form deciſions of this nature. Leo X wiſhed, as it was indeed his intereſt, the electors would agree to chuſe one of their own body. Charles being poſſeſſed of the kingdom of Naples, and Francis of the duchy of Milan, the election of one of theſe Monarchs could not but one day diſturb the peace of Italy, and prove deſtructive to the Pontifical authority; and accordingly the Pope uſed his utmoſt efforts to perſuade the electors to take that courſe; however, he was forced to act ſecretly, for fear of making the two candidates his enemies, by openly declaring againſt them.

Death of Lorenzo di Medicis. Guicciard.

While the reſolution of the electors was impatiently expected, Lorenzo di Medicis, the Pope's nephew, was ſeized with a diſtemper which carried him off: by which unforeſeen event that branch of the Medicis family was reduced to the perſon of Pope Leo, the ſole legitimate deſcendant of Coſmo the Great, who firſt acquired the ſovereignty of Florence. Some indeavors were uſed to perſuade that Pontif to reſtore his country to liberty; but his affection for the Florentines extended not far enough for him to ſuffer them to injoy that valuable bleſſing, whereof he had been at ſuch pains to deprive them. Reſolving therefore to keep that ſtate, he ſent cardinal Julio di Medicis, his uncle Juliano's natural ſon, to govern in his name. Soon after, he annexed to the church the duchy of Urbino, and razed the walls of its capital, leſt La Rovere ſhould think of recovering his ſaid rightful domain.

The Pope keeps Florence, and governs it by a legate.

He annexes the duchy of Urbino to the church.

The electors being aſſembled to proceed to the election of a new Emperor, Francis and Charles ſent to the aſſembly embaſſadors to manage their concerns. The Pope would alſo have there a nuncio, who had orders privately to indeavor that both theſe Princes might be rejected; yet outwardly to conform himſelf to the diſpoſition of the electors. Henry VIII, perceiving what difficulties would occur in the choice of either of the candidates, ſent Richard Pace to the diet, to try whether any thing was to be expected for him: but as he thought of it too late, his embaſſador found the affair ſo ad-

Diverſe occaſions of quarrel between Charles and Francis. Guicciard.

Don Carlos Quinto's election was, to Francis I, a terrible mortification. It was immediately and univerſally conjectured, that the emulation between thoſe two potent Monarchs would infallibly occaſion cruel combuſtions; and this conjecture was but too well confirmed by experience. Beſide the King of France's jealouſy, which was doubtleſs one of the chief cauſes of the inſuing rupture, there were differences between them of very great importance, and extremely difficult to adjuſt. King Francis had pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples. Moreover, by the treaty of Noyon, Charles was bound to reſtore Navarre to Henry d'Albret, within four months after ſigning the treaty; and this article was yet unperformed. On the other hand, Charles, as heir of the houſe of Burgundy, believed he had a lawful title to that duchy. He pretended that, after the deceaſe of the laſt duke, his great-grandfather, Lewis XI had unjuſtly ſeized it, on a bare allegation that it was a male fee, tho' the contrary was evident. During his minority, he had ſuffered his title to lye dormant: but, when arrived at years of maturity, he had thoughts of reviving it; and the lately-obtained Imperial dignity abundantly contributed towards confirming him in that reſolution. The duchy of Milan was another cauſe of diſpute, which would naturally beget a war between theſe two Potentates. Its being a fief of the Empire could not be denied; nevertheleſs Lewis XII had ſeized it, and Francis re-conquered it, and was then in poſſeſſion, without either's being inveſted by the Emperor Maximilian, or having even requeſted ſuch inveſtiture. Charles therefore could alledge it was his duty to aſſert the rights of the Empire, and indeavor to diſpoſſeſs the King of France of that duchy. The duke of Gueldres afforded another occaſion of quarrel between theſe two Monarchs. He was the Emperor's profeſſed enemy, and France protected him openly. Finally, the treaty of Noyon gave Charles another cauſe of complaint. He pretended; "That "Francis had extorted from him ſo diſadvantage-"ous a treaty, by menacing war when his affairs "neceſſarily required his preſenſe in Spain, to take "poſſeſſion of his realms: that therefore the re-"ſignation of the kingdom of Navarre, and the "hundred thouſand crowns penſion to which he "had been ingaged, under the ſpecious pretext of "a maintenance for the Princeſs his future ſpouſe, "were no other than the price of a peace which "he had been conſtrained to purchaſe."

Intereſts of the Princes of Europe.

But tho' theſe two powerful Sovereigns beheld each other with a jealous and envious eye; and wanted not pretexts for a war, neither of them durſt however begin before he had founded the other Potentates: and how they ſtood affected will alſo be neceſſary to be well known, to inable readers to comprehend the ſequel, the intereſts of Princes giving to hiſtory a certain perſpicuity, which is in vain ſought for without that aſſiſtance.

Henry VIII. An' 1519.

Leo X equally dreaded both thoſe Monarchs, being ſenſible, to which ſide ſoever the ballance inclined, Italy muſt be in danger. Could he have ſet them at variance, without making Italy the ſeat of war, he would have done it moſt willingly: but that was not poſſible; much leſs was it in his power to remain preciſely neutral: the reaſon is, becauſe he could not hinder the conteſts concerning Naples and Milan from being decided by arms, and therefore could not avoid interpoſing in a quarrel wherein himſelf muſt be ſo nearly concerned. He took therefore the courſe which beſt ſuited his diſpoſition, and that was to be reſerved and manage both parties, 'till he found it his intereſt to declare: yet, thro' all his diſguiſes, he diſcovered a certain partiality to the Emperor, in granting him a diſpenſation to hold the Empire with the kingdom of Naples, tho' that was directly contrary to the terms on which he had given him the inveſtiture of that Kingdom. Francis thereof made complaint; but his Holineſs excuſed it, as not having in his power to refuſe, without being involved in troubles from which he ſhould not be able eaſily to extricate himſelf.

Of Leo X.

Mezerai.

As for Henry VIII, the poſture of affairs between Charles and Francis might have rendered his reign very glorious, had he not intirely given himſelf up to the intereſted counſels of cardinal Wolſey. It lay purely in his own breaſt to preſerve the peace of Europe, by keeping the balance even between the two rivals, without ſuffering it to incline too much to either ſide. This was his grand intereſt as well as the kingdom's, and accordingly this was his reſolution. Hence it was that he frequently ingaged in one or other party; but not always as the intereſt of Europe, the welfare of his realm, and his own glory required. Thus, while he thought to follow the maxims of good policy, he ſerved, without perceiving it, to gratify the paſſions of his miniſter, as will hereafter be manifeſt.

Of Henry VIII.

Charles and Francis were ſo convinced of the advantages to be reaped from the King of England's friendſhip, that they neglected nothing they ſuppoſed would procure it. The beſt, or rather the only means ſo to do, was to gain cardinal Wolſey to their intereſts: and therefore, they ſpared neither flatteries, promiſes, nor preſents to make him their friend. They took occaſion ſometimes to write to him, purpoſely to ſtile him "Their "friend; their father." In their letters they extolled his virtue, his prudence, his capacity, in ſuch affected terms, that he muſt have been blind not to perceive they had farther views than barely to expreſs their eſteem. Wolſey made good uſe of theſe teſtimonies of their friendſhip, to put his maſter in mind how formidable he was to theſe two Monarchs, ſince they even diſdained not beſtowing on his miniſter ſuch careſſes: but withal it ſerved him to inſinuate, how far his merit excelled that of other miniſters, ſince it was ſo univerſally blazoned

There were then only ſeven electors who, together with the four above-mentioned, were the archbiſhop of Treves or Triers, the marquis of Brandenburg, and the King of Bohemia. See Guicciard. l. 13. and considered. All this produced the effect he expected. Henry deemed himself the arbiter of Europe, and remained so persuaded of his favorite's capacity, that he no longer saw but with his eyes, or acted but with his concurrence.

The cardinal's preferments.

Thus Wolsey was then on the summit of fortune's wheel. He was favorite, prime minister, lord chancellor, administrator of the bishoprick of Bath and Wells, archbishop of York, sole legate à latere, his collegue Campejo having been recalled. He had pensions from the Emperor and King of France, and received immense profit from his chancellorship, by the privileges his royal master had thereto annexed: moreover Henry ceased not making him presents, and giving him continual occasions of augmenting his revenues. On the other hand, the Pope, the Emperor, the King of France and the republic of Venice strove with emulation to gain his favor, and seemed, as I may say, to glory in their dependance on this aspiring prelate. About the begining of this year, King Francis, sent him letters patent, whereby he consented that he alone should regulate the ceremonies of his interview with Henry, giving him thereby a most authentic testimony of the confidence he placed in his probity, on a point wherein, generally speaking, Sovereigns are extremely jealous. Mean while, the advances made by such great Potentates to this cardinal, did not argue so much their esteem for him, as their dread of losing the King his master's friendship. Francis I, to give Henry a fresh token of his respect, desired him to stand godfather to his second son, afterwards King of France by the name of Henry II. These particulars sufficiently evidence Henry's felicitous situation, and how glorious his reign might have been, had he known how to improve such advantages: but, unfortunately for him, instead of acting for himself and his own glory, he in effect labored only to agrandise his favorite.

Wolsey's excessive pride.

It would have been difficult to conceive to what height the cardinal's pride was carried, had not all the historians taken care to describe it, and all in the same colors. Cardinal Campejo's legateship having set his said eminence on a level with him, he could not long indure such equality. By his credit at Rome he had got him recalled (1), and himself appointed sole legate, with power to visit the monasteries, and all ecclesiastics in general (2). To obtain this commission, he had taken care to fill his Sanctity's ears with defamations against all the English clergy, intimating, how necessary it was to commit the reforming them to his care (3): but this was only to increase his authority, and subject the whole church of England to his orders. When he saw himself invested alone with the dignity of legate, he let loose, if I may so say, the reins to his vanity. He no longer said mass otherwise than after the manner of the Pope himself, not only bishops serving him therein, but earls, nay dukes giving him water and the towel. When he went into the city, two crosses were carried before him by two of the tallest priests to be met with, mounted on the largest horses: one of which crosses was that of legate, and the other that of York. At first these things served only for diversion to the people, who passed their jokes on this pompous pageantry (4), but it was not long before they became feelingly sensible of abundantly more grievous effects of the power assumed by the legate. A new court of justice was erected, called the Legate's Court, the jurisdiction whereof extended to all actions relating to conscience; that is, properly speaking, to all the actions of life, since there is scarce any but where conscience may be some way concerned. One John Allen, being made judge of this new court, commited numberless rapines and extortions, under color of reforming the manners of the people, tho' he was himself a man of a very indifferent character (5). Strict inquiry was made into the life and manners of all persons without exception, which gave occasion to the new judge to oppress such as refused to compound with him. Particularly, he pretended that his jurisdiction reached to all suits arising from wills or marriage-contracts, and drew to his court numberless causes, without the King's judges daring to oppose (6). On the other hand, the legate treated the clergy with inconceivable rigor, and confered all the benefices of the kingdom on his creatures, without troubling himself about the rights of churches, monasteries, or patrons. This is what had ever occasioned violent quarrels between the Kings of England and the court of Rome, and given birth to the famous statute of Præmunire, daily violated by the legate, Henry suffering in him things which undoubtedly he would not have allowed in the Pope himself; nor indeed was he informed of transactions any farther than just as Wolsey pleased. At length, the archbishop of Canterbury, seeing so many oppressions, judged it his duty to acquaint the King, who seemed surprised, and charged the archbishop to tell Wolsey, that it was his pleasure he should amend whatever was amiss (7). The effect of this remonstrance was, that the cardinal still more hated the archbishop, for whom he had already conceived no small aversion, for having, in one of his letters, presumed to subscribe himself, "Your brother of "Canterbury (8)." But soon after, one John London a priest (9), boldly accusing the judge of the legate's court, it was not possible to hinder tha affair from coming to the King's knowledge. As this judge was convicted of numberleſs miſdemenors, Henry ſo reprimanded the cardinal, that from the ceforward he became, if not better, yet at leaſt more wary.

Wolſey, by means of the new Emperor, aſpires to the Papacy. Herbert.

The grandure, opulence, power and authority injoyed by Wolſey in England, were not capable of ſatisfying his ambition, while there was ſtill one ſtep higher to be aſcended by a churchman. He had ſome time ſince begun to take meaſures to attain the Pontificate, when the See ſhould be vacant, and the King of France had already offered him the votes of fourteen cardinals. But ſince Charles was elected Emperor, Wolſey deemed him ableſt to procure him the papal dignity, and, in all probability, was carrying on with that Prince ſome ſecret negociation thereto tending. For that purpoſe, he gradually diſingaged the King his maſter from the intereſt of France, to turn him to the Emperor. Mean while, he believed he could not, without too much diſcovering himſelf, hinder the interview of Francis and Henry, which had been defered 'till the year 1520 (1): but he well knew how to prevent the ill effects this interview might produce againſt the Emperor, his new friend. Beſide, he could not bear the thoughts of loſing the pleaſure of appearing before the court of France with a magnificence little inferior to that of a King, and of ſeeing himſelf, in the preſenſe of the Engliſh, honored and careſſed by the King of France, and his whole court, as he would probably be. This was an opportunity which a perſon ſo fond of pageantry and oſtentation could not neglect.

Affairs of Spain.

The Emperor had reaſon to careſs cardinal Wolſey. He had met in Spain with unexpected difficulties. The Caſtilians and Aragonians were bent to preſerve their privileges, which were continually attacked by Charles's Flemiſh counſellors. On the other hand, that Monarch, on pretext of the Croiſade publiſhed by his Sanctity, having demanded a tenth of the clergy, that demand had cauſed throughout Spain commotions which involved this new Enmperor in ſtrange perplexity. There had been alſo an inſurrection in Auſtria which was not appeaſed without difficulty. Finally, King Francis was ſecretly laboring to excite troubles in Naples, Sicily and Navarre, to annoy Charles, and to withdraw from him his allies. All this made Henry's friendſhip ſo neceſſary to him, that it was no wonder he ſhould indeavor to win over Wolſey to his party, ſince there was no other way to gain the maſter but thro' the miniſter's credit. King Francis uſed the ſame method, which exceedingly increaſed the arrogance of this prelate, who, ſeeing himſelf courted by theſe two Monarchs, had it in his power, if I may ſo ſay, to ſet on his ſervices juſt what price he pleaſed.

The Emperor and King of France equally court Wolſey's friendſhip.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

While all the world was impatiently expecting the effect of the jealouſy between Charles and Francis, the affairs of Scotland ſtill remained in the ſame ſituation, that is, in extreme diſorder, on account of the regent's abſenſe. When he departed Scotland, he hoped to return in few months; but was not ſuffered to follow his inclination. Francis I, foreſeeing the want he might have of England, had made a private treaty with Henry, promiſing to detain the duke of Albany in France. Thus Henry, by a different way, obtained what the parliament of Scotland had flatly refuſed him. It was very eaſy to conceive, why he oppoſed the duke of Albany's return: his aim was to involve Scotland in trouble and confuſion, to have an opportunity to interpoſe in the affairs of that kingdom, under color of ſupporting the intereſts of the young King his nephew. He could not therefore execute it better than by fomenting diſcord among the nobility, which the regent's preſenſe might have remedied: but the war which afterwards broke out between Charles and Francis, and wherein he was but too much concerned, prevented the proſecution of his deſigns againſt Scotland. Probably this ſaved the kingdom, which otherwiſe was in apparent danger of being conquered by the Engliſh.

Diſcovery of Mexico and New Spain.

Before I cloſe the year 1519, I muſt not omit remarking, that this year the Emperor received news of the diſcovery and begining of the conqueſt of Mexico and New Spain. The mention of this particular is the more neceſſary, tho' it ſeems foreign to our hiſtory, as it was the gold and ſilver wherewith that new world furniſhed Spain, which contributed moſt to render Charles V ſo powerful as he will hereafter appear. Beſide, money growing more plenty by the commerce carried on by other countries with Spain, the reader muſt not be ſurpriſed to find hereafter more numerous armies, greater magnificence in Princes courts, and the dowries of Princeſſes much larger than before: but Spain firſt improved the gold and ſilver of the new world, and was thereby inabled, in the reigns of Charles V and Philip II, to aſpire to univerſal monarchy.

An' 1520. The regulation of the interview between the two Kings by Wolſey. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 705. March 12. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The confidence King Francis repoſed in cardinal Wolſey, in giving him power to regulate his interview with Henry, would have been very honorable for that miniſter, if, on the other hand, this proceeding had not ſhewn his little eſteem for him, as believing him liable to corruption. Howſoever this was, Wolſey, by virtue of powers received from the two Kings, did, on the twelfth of March 1520, make a regulation, importing, among other things, "That the interview ſhould be on the "fourth of June between Ardres and Guiſnes: that "the King of England ſhould go towards Ardres, "as far as conveniently he could (2), without how-"ever paſſing the Engliſh pale, and the King of "France ſhould meet him at the place where he "ſhould ſtop." Hereby he ſo ordered it, that Francis paid the firſt viſit to Henry: but he aſſigned for reaſon, that the King his maſter having croſſed the ſeas purpoſely to do his friend honor, it was very juſt King Francis ſhould, in ſome meaſure, make him amends, by advancing to receive him a little beyond the limits of his own territories, in ſome open place appointed by deputies on either ſide. The reſt of the regulation concerned the ſafety of the two Monarchs, their Queens, the dowager Queen of France, ſiſter of Henry, Louiſa of Savoy ducheſs of Angoulême, Francis's mother, the trains of the Princes and Princeſſes who were to aſſiſt at the interview, the place where the two Kings were to meet and confer together, and laſtly, the diverſions which the two courts were to take.

but the cardinal dares not propoſe it to Henry.

During the time between the regulation and the interview, Francis got Wolſey ſounded, to know whether, by his means, he could not prevail with Henry to reſtore Calais for a ſum of money. Undoubtedly, this propoſal was attended with ſecret promiſes to the cardinal anſwerable to ſo ſignal a ſervice, ſince he thought not fit to reject it. He cared not however to ſpeak of it directly to the King; but tried ſo to manage that others ſhould inſpire him with the thought, that, in caſe the King adviſed with him upon it, he might give his opinion more freely. To that end, in his converſation he would frequently turn the diſcourſe upon Calais, and ſay, "What have we to do with this Calais,

"which * costs us so much? It were to be wished "we were honestly rid of it!" This artifice failing, he never ventured to make the King so extraordinary a proposal; and the rather as, being resolved to ingage with the Emperor, he was not so over desirous to oblige the King of France.

* Being on the continent.

Henry set out for the interview.

The time of the interview approaching, Henry arrived at Canterbury the twenty-fifth of May, in order to pass Whitsuntide there, and then proceed to Calais: but news was next day brought him, that the Emperor was landed at Dover. This arrival surprised the whole court, and perhaps the King himself: but Wolsey had no reason to be surprised, since the Emperor had, on the twenty-ninth of March last, by letters patent dated from Compostela, promised to give, or cause to be given him by the Pope, the bishoprick of Badajos (1), within two months after the personal conference he was to have with the King of England, as appears in Rymer's collection. Hence it is plain, the Emperor's journey to England had been determined on ever since March, at least between that Prince and Wolsey: but it is uncertain, whether Henry had thereof any notice. However this be, the cardinal was commissioned to go and welcome his Imperial Majesty at Dover, at which place the King arrived likewise on the morrow. Then the two Monarchs went together to Canterbury, where Henry sent for his Queen, who was exceedingly rejoiced at sight of her nephew the Emperor, having never seen him before (2). Charles's aim in this visit was to dissuade King Henry from the interview with Francis; but he could not succeed, the King of England convincing him that he could not with any honor recede: but, very probably, he had also in view the securing cardinal Wolsey, in order, by his means, to gain King Henry to his interest. It is the common opinion, his journey was not fruitless, but that he could obtain the cardinal's favor only by promising to imploy his whole credit to raise him to the Papacy, in case Leo X died before him. Tho' the Emperor had not obtained all his desires, he departed very well satisfied with his visit; Henry having promised not to enter into any ingagement with the King of France to his prejudice (3). On the thirtieth of May, Charles proceeded to Flanders, and Henry to Calais (4).

The interview of Francis and Henry. Herbert. Stow. Hall. Hollingsh.

I shall not dwell on a circumstantial description of the interview of those Monarchs between Ardres and Guisnes, as regulated by cardinal Wolsey. During its continuance nothing was to be seen but entertainments, tournaments, balls, masquerades and other diversions, wherein the two courts mixed to their mutual satisfaction. All things on both sides were so magnificent, that this Princely assembly was named, The camp of the cloth of gold (5). But amidst all those recreations which the two courts took together, public affairs were not neglected. The following articles were agreed on by the two Kings at their conferences; "That, after "Francis should have discharged the million of "crowns, according to the late treaty, he should "annually pay Henry, during his life, a pension "of one hundred thousand livres Tournois (6): "that, in case the Dauphin should become King of "England by his marriage with Princess Mary, "the pension should be continued to Mary and "her heirs for ever: that the differences between "the Kings of England and Scotland should be "refered to the arbitration of Louisa of Savoy, "the King of France's mother, and the cardinal of "York." The two Kings parted not 'till the twenty-fourth of June, after passing about three weeks together in continual diversions.

Treaty between them. June 6.

Henry, on his return to Calais, thought fit, before he repassed into England, to repay the visit received from the Emperor at Canterbury. In order thereto, on the tenth of July, he repaired to Graveling, and returned the same day to Calais. On the morrow, the Emperor, with his aunt lady Margaret, governess of the Netherlands, came to see Henry at Calais, and continued with him three days. These mutual visits made Francis extremely jealous, and not without reason. Probably, in these conferences were laid the first foundations of the alliance afterwards concluded between Charles and Henry. In a few days after, Henry returned to England.

It was not without reason that cardinal Wolsey's favor and amity were sought for by the greatest Potentates. He absolutely governed his master, who, in the present situation of his affairs, could make the ballance incline to which side he pleased. The senate of Venice, foreseeing that a war would soon break out in Italy, indeavored to anticipate Wolsey's friendship by expressing their great esteem for that minister. In Rymer's collection, is extant a letter, from their Doge to the cardinal, to congratulate him on the interview of the two Kings, as a work of his consummate wisdom (7).

But this was only words; whereas his Holiness, who found he should quickly want the cardinal, thought he must gain him by something more substantial. (5) The King caused a building 328 foot square to be erected, from which a private gallery reached to the castle of Guisnes. The parts of this great building were artificially framed in England, and afterwards taken asunder and brought home. The model whereof, lord Herbert says, was at Greenwich in his time. The two Kings met on the 7th of June, in the vale of Andren, and alighting, walked hand in hand to a tent of cloth of gold. On the 9th they came and viewed the camp or place of exercise, 300 yards long, and 106 broad, with scaffolds on the sides for the beholders. There were also set up two artificial trees, with the arms of the two Kings and their assistants, on which were affixed the articles of the justs, &c. June 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, the two Kings, with seven assistants each, incountered all comers, and came off with applause. June 16th passed in feasting and dancing with the Queens and other ladies. June 17th, being Sunday, and the 18th, being foul weather, they reposed. The 19th they continued their courses. On the 20th the tournay began, where our King particularly got that honor, that a brave French nobleman with whom he fought, presented him with his horse as a gage of his being overcome. On the 21st the sport was so rough, that four of the assistants were hurt. On the 22d the barriers began. The 23d, our King, with his sister Queen Mary, went in masquing habits, to see the French Queen at Ardres, Francis likewise going to the English Queen. (7) In this letter, the Doge compliments him in the strongest terms, and constantly stiles him Dominatio vestra Reverendissima, and in one place, Majestatis ejus pars altera. But, it seems, the university of Oxford was wont to outdo the Doge, and not scruple to bestow absolutely on the cardinal the title of Majesty, as appears from several letters to him from the university. But that appellation, seemingly, was not then appropriated to Kings. See Fiddes, p. 178.

judice to the benefices he had or ſhould have for the future. We are not to queſtion but this was done with the conſent of Charles, who indeavored by degrees to gain ſo powerful a miniſter, whoſe credit was very neceſſary in the preſent ſituation of his affairs. He had left Spain full of troubles, occaſioned by the greedineſs of his Flemings, who only ſought to inrich themſelves at the Spaniards expenſe. This had even obliged him to depart with ſome precipitation, for fear of being imbroiled in affairs which might have obſtructed his voyage to receive the Imperial crown. He had left in Spain for governors, Adrian Florent, biſhop of Tortoſa, and the conſtable of Caſtile: but he was no ſooner departed than diverſe of the nobility, and ſome cities of Caſtile joined in a league for defenſe of their liberties, and expulſion of all Netherlanders. This league was followed by a bare-faced rebellion, which exceedingly imbaraſſed the two governors: nevertheleſs, having drawn together a body of forces, conſiſting partly of the gariſons left in Navarre, they formed a good army, and at length reduced the male-contents to obedience.

Troubles in Spain.

The Emperor crowned.

While this was tranſacted in Spain, the Emperor was preparing for his coronation, which was ſolemniſed the twenty-firſt of October (1).

Luther's defection made then great noiſe in Germany. Pope Leo ſtrove to excite every Prince of the Empire againſt the ſaid doctor, who had boldly appealed to a general council, notwithſtanding the bull of Pope Pius II. At length, after fruitleſs trials to gain him by promiſes, or intimidate him by menaces, he publiſhed a bull of excommunication againſt him and his followers. But Luther, regardleſs of theſe thunders, in very harſh terms renewed his appeal to a council. His Sanctity, highly inſenſed that a ſingle monk ſhould thus dare to brave him, requeſted the Elector of Saxony, then at Cologn, either to diſpatch or ſend him to Rome. The elector refuſing, the Pope's nuncio ordered Luther's books to be burned at Cologn; to retaliate which, Luther cauſed the Canonical decretals (2) to be alſo publicly burned at Wirtemberg, and publiſhed a manifeſto in juſtification of his procedure. He found himſelf ſupported by the Elector his Sovereign, who earneſtly deſired a reformation in the church.

Mean while, the duke of Wirtemberg, who, at the inſtance of Francis I, had forſaken the league of Swabia, was expeled his dominions, and the Emperor purchaſed them. As the King of France was not then in condition to protect him, he was forced to ſubmit to the Emperor's terms, without the leaſt proſpect of re-eſtabliſhment.

The duke of Wirtemberg loſes his dominions.

The combuſtions ſtill continued among the Scots, who were divided into two factions, whereof Andrew Hamilton, and George Douglaſs (3) were the heads. During the year 1520, the Hamiltonians found means to conſtrain Archibald Douglas earl of Angus, one of thoſe left by the regent to govern in his abſenſe, to relinquiſh his poſt; after which they would likewiſe have deprived him of life: but, with only eighty followers, in the ſtreets of Edinburg, he worſted upwards of a thouſand enemies, and drove them from the city. All this ſerved only to exaſperate more and more the factions againſt each other, ſo that at length Douglas received into his party all the friends of the two Humes, beheaded by the regent, in order, with their aſſiſtance, to make head againſt his adverſaries. Theſe were the wretched effects occaſioned by that unſeaſonable abſenſe of the regent, whoſe return to Scotland the King of England prevented. Mean while, the truce between the two kingdoms was farther prolonged to the ninth of April in the inſuing year, by the King of France's mediation, and the Scotiſh council poſitively promiſed to ſend King Henry a very honorable embaſſy, to deſire a peace (4).

Troubles in Scotland. Buchanan.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1520.

Rym, Fœd. Vol. XIII. p. 727 — 737.

The ſituation wherein affairs were at the beginning of 1521, promiſed not a long continuance of Europe's tranquillity. Four Potentates ingroſſed in a manner the whole, and had even over the dominions they were not poſſeſſed of a no ſmall influence. They were all four young, able and ambitious enough to form vaſt projects, which could not be executed without inflaming all Europe.

AN' 1521. Characters and diſpoſitions of the principal European Sovereigns.

Francis I, ſilently devoured with invidious jealouſy of Charles V, ſought only ſome proper opportunity to expreſs his reluctance at beholding him on the Imperial throne, and meditated laying hold on the pretext of recovering Naples for himſelf, and Navarre for Henry d'Albret: but the real deſign of his attacking the Emperor was founded on another ſtill more powerful motive, namely, policy, which called for his ultimate efforts to humble this formidable rival, otherwiſe France might be in the utmoſt danger. To execute this grand project required his being ſolely intent on his own affairs, together with the greateſt œconomy, in order to ſupport the vaſt expenſes of his projected undertaking; but, unhappily for him, he was too much addicted to pleaſures, and very frequently applied to other uſes the money deſigned for the war. Moreover, he was too eaſily governed by his miniſters, and ſtill more by the ducheſs of Angoulême his mother, whoſe intereſts were often contrary to his. However, he fancied his affairs in ſuch a poſture as promiſed a happy ſucceſs of his enterpriſe. Spain was diſaffected and agitated with inteſtine broils, which probably would greatly imbaraſs the Emperor. On the other hand, the Turks menaced Hungary, which Charles could not abandon without indangering his Auſtrian dominions. In the next place, Francis flattered himſelf with having in the King of England a faithful friend who would not forſake him, and who ſeemed to be almoſt equally concerned to prevent the too exorbitant growth of the houſe of Auſtria. Laſtly, he imagined to have reaſon to expect that the Pope, with whom he was in treaty for the conqueſt of Naples, inſtead of helping to increaſe the Emperor's power, would employ his beſt efforts towards humbling a neighbor who could not but be a terror to him. This confidence was alſo farther fortified by King Francis's alliances with the Venetians and Swiſſers, who, joining with the Pope and King of England, would of courſe render him ſuperior to his enemy, whoſe kingdoms, remote from each other, were leſs capable of giving mutual aſſiſtance. Thus Francis, flattered by theſe appearances, formed extraordinary projects, ſuiting his natural ambition and immature years, having then barely attained the age of twenty-ſeven.

idea. His childhood and juvenile years paſſed under the tutelage of the Emperor Maximilian his grandfather, or of Margaret of Auſtria his aunt, and ſince he had aſſumed the adminiſtration of the Netherlands, his governor Chievres did all in name of the Prince. His firſt proceedings, after the death of King Ferdinand, begot no great opinion of him; for he had ſcarce ſet foot in Spain, before the country was all in commotion. His advancement to the Imperial diadem was perhaps owing to the little eſteem the world had for him: nevertheleſs he then actually was the moſt potent Sovereign in Europe. Beſide the Imperial dignity, he poſſeſſed all Spain, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the whole Netherlands, the archduchy of Auſtria, and many other provinces and lordſhips in Germany: ſo, with his own forces alone, he was well able to make head againſt Francis I, in conjunction with all his allies. Henry VIII was the ſole Potentate who had at firſt imbaraſſed him, by reaſon of his union with France: but he had luckily withdrawn that thorn from his ſide, by means of cardinal Wolſey. With this he began, as I may ſay, to diſcover his ability, which 'till then had been as it were concealed. After that, he diligently applied himſelf to gain the Pope, and ſucceeded to his wiſh. Thus, at the time I am now ſpeaking of, he was become very formidable, not only by his forces, but alſo by the proofs he had given of his capacity. On his being raiſed to the Imperial throne, he rightly judged he ſhould, in Francis I, find a rival who would ſpare nothing to make him feel the effect of his envy: and therefore, he thought early of means to ſcreen himſelf from his attempts, not only by a juſt defenſe, but even by attacking him firſt. He had two plauſible reaſons: one was, that the crown of France with-held from him the duchy of Burgundy, ſince the death of his great grandfather Charles, the laſt duke of Burgundy: the other concerned the duchy of Milan, whereof Francis ought to have received the inveſtiture from the Emperor, ſince it was a fief of the Empire, and yet had not once even vouchſafed to aſk it. He believed moreover to have cauſe of complaint for Francis's extorting from him the treaty of Noyon, as was before obſerved.

In vain therefore do the hiſtorians on both ſides ſtrive to caſt the blame of the rupture on one or other of the two Monarchs. It is certain, both thought at the ſame time of making war, and took meaſures beforehand to execute their deſigns, tho' each privately indeavored to ingage his antagoniſt to take ſome ſtep which might occaſion his being deemed the aggreſſor. So, as the begining of a rupture is not to be judged of by the firſt act of hoſtility, but rather by the cauſe, we cannot well err in affirming Charles V and Francis I to be equally authors of a war which ſet all Europe in a flame. Charles was but twenty-one years of age, but of a very different character from that of his competitor. Francis was too much inamored with pleaſure, whereas Charles was extremely attentive to buſineſs, having been thereto inured from his very childhood. Francis was of a free and open temper; whereas Charles was abundantly more reſerved. Charles maturely deliberated on whatever he had to ſay or do, and ſcrupled not making uſe of artifice and evaſion to accompliſh his purpoſes; framing his conduct by that of his two grandfathers, Maximilian and Ferdinand.

Of Leo X. Guicciard.

Leo X had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his lot, could he have reſolved to live in quiet. He was abſolutely maſter of the whole Eccleſiaſtical ſtate, to which he had lately added all La Romagna, Modena, Reggio, and the duchy of Urbino. His own, the church's, and all Italy's grand intereſt was therefore, to omit nothing which might contribute towards keeping the ballance even between the Emperor and King of France, and to manage ſo that neither of theſe two Monarchs ſhould become too powerful in Italy. This was very practicable, ſince, as his dominions lay between thoſe appertaining to theſe two Princes in Italy, they neceſſarily wanted him, in order to invade either Naples or Milan: wherefore, by keeping a ſtrict neutrality, he would probably have freed Italy from a war, and preſerved the Pontifical power in its full luſter: but he was of too active a ſpirit to remain in peace. As he had a great opinion of his own abilities, he ventured to ingage in all kinds of affairs, how difficult ſoever they appeared, becauſe, let what would be the event, he hoped to get clear by ſome artifice: beſide, he had this in common with all the Popes his predeceſſors, that the reſpect for his character removed his fear of being reduced to extremities, in caſe his undertakings were not crowned with ſucceſs. As to the reſt, he was intirely given to pleaſure, ſpending moſt of his time with muſicians and buffoons, and in ſome ſtill leſs innocent diverſions. This, added to his natural profuſeneſs, threw him into ſuch exceſſive expenſes, that he was indigent amidſt his immenſe revenues, and inceſſantly ſtudying methods how he might procure money. Hence alone proceeded his unwearied zeal to form a league againſt the Turks, becauſe it furniſhed him with a pretext to levy tenths upon the clergy, and ſell his indulgences to the great ſcandal of all Chriſtendom (1).

Had this Pontif been of a narrower or more contracted genius, he would doubtleſs have maintained the tranquillity of Italy: but as he knew himſelf capable of forming and executing great projects, he was deſirous of rendering his pontificate illuſtrious by ſome ſignal actions. Unfortunately for him and his ſucceſſors, he reſolved to drive the French, Spaniards and Germans from Italy, a ſcheme which may well be deemed extravagant. To accompliſh it, he was neceſſarily to uſe the one to cruſh the others, and by thus making the ballance incline all to one ſide he could not but give maſters to himſelf and all Italy, which he would have avoided by ſtanding neuter. But what chiefly ingaged him in this project, was his great deſire to ſeize the duchy of Ferrara, and recover Parma and Plaſenza, which he could not hope to effect while the French were poſſeſſed of the Milaneſe. On the other hand, he was ſomewhat uneaſy with reſpect to Florence: he could not but be apprehenſive that Francis would think of reſtoring the Florentines to their ancient liberty. He reſolved therefore to begin with the French; but took care not to diſcover his deſigns: on the contrary, he continued private negociations with the King of France as well as with the Emperor, and put both equally in hopes of his friendſhip. Nevertheleſs, as his intent was not always to remain in this medium, he got levied in Swiſſerland a body of forces ſix thouſand ſtrong, and ſent for them into the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate, having demanded a paſſage thro' the Milaneſe, under color of providing for the defenſe of his own territory. Of Henry VIII.

Henry VIII was then more advantageouſly ſituated than had ever been any preceding King of England. He was at peace with all Europe except Scotland, which would moſt gladly have been left in quiet. Tho' he had already conſumed all the treaſures found in the King his father's coffers, he was however aſſured of being always ſupplied, ſince he was in a good underſtanding with his parliament, and had the art of managing the two houſes with a very ſingular addreſs. Thus being able to raiſe numerous armies, and at liberty to turn them which way he pleaſed, it was doubtleſs in his power to render himſelf umpire of Europe. For that reaſon Charles and Francis, with equal ardor, courted his friendſhip, being conſcious he could invincibly obſtruct their deſigns, and cauſe the ballance to lean to the ſide he ſhould vouchſafe to favor. It was his intereſt to keep always in this ſituation, 'till obliged to interpoſe in their differences, to hinder the one from riſing to the other's prejudice: and indeed this was his aim and intention; but, unfortunately for him, his weakneſs for his prime miniſter Wolſey ſurpaſſed all comprehenſion. This favorite had over him ſuch unaccountable aſcendency, that he inclined him which way he pleaſed, but ever under the ſpecious color of carrying his glory to a great height, tho' in reality he had in view only his own intereſts. We have already ſeen ſenſible proofs of his great influence over his maſter, in what paſſed during and after the late war with France. He had perſuaded him to deliver to the Emperor Maximilian the city of Terouenne, which might have been of great ſervice to him, and to keep Tournay, which was of little or no advantage. Afterwards, when he was in poſſeſſion of the biſhoprick of Tournay, he had artfully perſuaded him, that keeping that place would be an everlaſting monument of his glory: but when he found himſelf likely to loſe the adminiſtration of that See, and had ample amends offered him, he found other reaſons to convince him, that he ought to part with a place which was not to him any way beneficial. We ſhall preſently ſee, that he led him alſo to make a very falſe ſtep in eſpouſing Charles's cauſe againſt Francis, whereas his true intereſt was to keep the ballance even between theſe two Potentates. All this was done for the ſake of cardinal Wolſey, who, ambitiouſly aſpiring to the Papacy, thought to ſucceed by the Emperor's means. The penſion procured him by Charles on the biſhoprick of Palencia in Caſtile, and the adminiſtration of the ſee of Badajos, at a time when he had not yet received any public ſervice from him, are inconteſtable proofs that the cardinal had ingaged with him, as being ſure of governing his maſter as he pleaſed. All this gives no very advantageous idea of Henry's penetration.

Such were the characters, intereſts and deſigns of the four chief Potentates concerned in the new war whereof I am on the point of treating. The King of Scotland was yet too young to be reckoned among the directors of the affairs of Europe. The Venetians ſought only to live in peace, being, as I may ſay, quite exhauſted by the preceding troubles: nevertheleſs, they could not avoid entering into this war alſo. As for the Swiſſers, they were ſatisfied with their penſions from France, and generally inclined to obſerve the articles of their alliance with that crown: but they were not intirely ſecure from the ſecret practiſes continued by the Pope's and Emperor's agents with ſome of their magiſtrates, to attempt prevailing on them not to ſide with France.

Francis I invades Navarre. Du Bellai. Mezerai.

Francis I, having formed a ſcheme of attacking Charles V, without incurring blame as author of the rupture, reſolved to begin with what could not be imputed to him as a premeditated deſign to quarrel. By the treaty of Noyon, the Emperor was bound to reſign Navarre to Henry d'Albret within four months, in default whereof, Francis was free to aſſiſt d'Albret to recover his kingdom. The affairs of Spain being exceſſively imbroiled ſince Charles departed thence, Francis believed it a fair opportunity to invade Navarre. He was the more inclined to this undertaking, as the two regents of Spain had been conſtrained to draw troops from Pampluna and other places of that kingdom, to reinforce the army which was to act againſt thoſe of the above-mentioned league. He ſent therefore into Navarre, in the begining of March, an army under command of Leſparre of the houſe of Foix, elder brother of Lautrec and Leſcun. This general, finding the kingdom without troops, and in a manner deſerted, became maſter of it in the ſpace of a fortnight. Had he ſtoped there, perhaps Navarre would have been ſtill at this day annexed in deed, as it is in name only, to the crown of France, ſince the Spaniards were then utterly unable to expel Henry d'Albret, from whom the Gallic Monarchs of the Bourbon family are lineally deſcended. But the thirſt of acquiring renown, or procuring his Sovereign's advantage, carried Leſparre to enter the province of Guipuſcoa, and beſiege Logrono. The regents of Spain had no thoughts of recovering Navarre: but when they beheld the French invading Spain itſelf, they aſſembled forces to ſtop their progreſs. Even the male-contents, lately vanquiſhed, accepting a general amneſty, led all their troops to the regents. Leſparre, ſeeing an army much ſtronger than his own coming againſt him, would have retired; but was ſo cloſely purſued, that he was obliged to come to a battle, wherein he was defeated and taken priſoner. The loſs of this battle occaſioned the loſs of Navarre, which the Spaniards recovered in leſs time than the French had conquered it. Thus the King of France had the mortification to loſe his army to no purpoſe, and flagrantly diſcover how he ſtood affected towards the Emperor.

Francis ſtirs up Robert de la Marc againſt the Emperor. Du Bellay. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

The ſame inſtant he was invading Navarre, he raiſed Charles another enemy from a different quarter; namely, Robert de la Marc, Prince of Sedan and Sovereign of Bouillon, who, believing he had cauſe to complain of the Emperor for a denial of juſtice to the young Princes of Chimay (1), whoſe guardian he was, implored the King of France's protection: very probably, Francis had offered it before it was requeſted. However, Robert de la Marc, ſeeing himſelf ſupported by King Francis, was ſo bold as to ſend a defiance to the Emperor, who was then at the diet of Worms. Shortly after, count de Fleuranges, De la Marc's eldeſt ſon, put himſelf at the head of four or five thouſand men (2) levied in France, and beſieged Vireton, a town in Luxemburg appertaining to the Emperor.

The Emperor calls on the King of England to aid him againſt Francis. Herbert.

Then it was that Charles, who had with reluctance agreed to the league of London, thought proper however to make uſe of it, in ſummoning the King of England to aſſiſt him, as obliged by that treaty, ſince it was evident the King of France had raiſed him this enemy. Henry, prepoſſeſſed by the cardinal, was glad of a pretenſe to caſt the blame of this rupture on the French King: however, not to deviate from the articles of the league, he diſpatched away an embaſſador to require him to forbear all hoſtility againſt the Emperor, not only in Luxemburg but alſo in Navarre. Francis replied: He was not author of the war between Robert de la Marc and the Emperor, and all he could do was to forbid his ſubjects to ſerve or aſſiſt De la

HENRY VIII. AN' 1521.

Marc. As to Navarre, it would have been needleſs to make any reply on that head, it being now out of his power to re-enter it. He performed his promiſe with regard to the war of Luxemburg, and Fleuranges diſbanded his army. Francis took care not openly to ſupport the duke of Bouillon, for fear of furniſhing Henry, who had offered his mediation, with a pretext to declare for the Emperor. I ſhall purſue this affair, after having touched on thoſe of Italy, which are of no leſs importance.

Who makes De la Marc lay down his arms. March 22.

In the begining of this, or perhaps before the end of laſt year, Leo X concluded, with the French embaſſador reſiding at Rome, a treaty whereby he joined in a league with Francis for the conqueſt of Naples. The treaty ran; That all that part of the kingdom of Naples ſituate between the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate and La Garigliana ſhould remain to the Pontif; and the reſidue ſhould be for Henry, King Francis's ſecond ſon; but, during his minority, the kingdom ſhould be governed by the Pope's legate, who ſhould reſide at the city of Naples. Whatſoever views Leo might have in making this treaty, it may be almoſt affirmed that he acted inſincerely, becauſe it muſt have been very diſadvantageous to him for the ſame Prince to hold Milan and Naples. He was too politic, and too much accuſtomed to crooked and fallacious dealings to be thought to proceed fairly on this occaſion. What may moſt probably be conjectured is, that his intention was to deal by Francis I, as Ferdinand King of Aragon had done by Lewis XII, when he made much the ſame partition with that Prince. At leaſt Francis, who had frequently experienced what Pope Leo was capable of, could never believe he really intended to aſſiſt him in that conqueſt: wherefore he delayed ratifying the treaty, to gain time to deliberate maturely on the affair.

Leo X joins with France for the conqueſt of Naples. Guicciard. Mezerai.

Francis puts off the ratification.

Leo X, perceiving the time allotted for the treaty's ratification expired, ſuſpected King Francis of projecting with the Emperor ſome accommodation detrimental to the Holy See. Thoſe who deal not with ſincerity are very apt to judge others to be like themſelves. However, the King of France's affected delays afforded Leo a motive or pretenſe to conclude with Charles another treaty, to expel the French from the Milaneſe, and reſtore the Sforza family. As he at once carried on ſecret negociations both with the Emperor and King of France, it would be ſomewhat difficult to penetrate his real deſign, were there not a notable difference between the two laſt-mentioned treaties. That with the French embaſſador, concerned a chimerical project, the execution whereof, in the preſent juncture of affairs, was in a manner utterly impracticable, nay, and actually repugnant to his true intereſt; whereas the other was to his advantage, and agreeably to the projects he had formed: ſo, very probably, the firſt was made only to procure better terms from the Emperor; beſide, his conſtant cuſtom had been to keep, as we ſay, two ſtrings to his bow, which he conſidered as the grand myſtery of politics. His treaty with the Emperor was no leſs advantageous than that he would have made with the King of France: the chief articles were theſe.

Pope Leo leagues with the Emperor. Mezerai. Guicciard.

Articles of the treaty of league.

"That the Pope and Emperor ſhould join their "forces to expel the French from the Milaneſe, "and reſtore Franceſco Sforza."----That Prince at was then Trent, having retired thither a little before his brother Maximilian was diſpoſſeſſed of his dominions.

"That Parma and Plaſenza ſhould be reſtored "to the church.

"That the inhabitants of the Milaneſe ſhould "provide themſelves with ſalt only at Cervia, a "town in the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

"That the Emperor ſhould aſſiſt Leo to re- "duce Ferrara.

"That the ſum Charles was to pay his Sanctity, "for the kingdom of Naples, ſhould be aug- "mented.

"That the Emperor ſhould protect the Medicis "family.

"That he ſhould aſſign cardinal di Medicis a "yearly penſion, of ten thouſand ducats, on the "archbiſhoprick of Toledo.

"That Aleſſandro di Medicis, natural ſon of "Lorenzo late duke of Urbino, ſhould have, in "the kingdom of Naples, lands to the annual va- "lue of ten thouſand ducats."

This treaty was kept ſo private, that it came not to Francis's knowledge 'till the two allies were actually on the point of invading the Milaneſe. Mean while they concerted proper meaſures to accompliſh their deſigns. Pope Leo, who had already in his ſervice ſix thouſand Swiſſers, took care to augment his forces on diverſe pretenſes. Charles ordered the viceroy of Naples to keep the troops of that kingdom ready to march on the firſt notice, and at the ſame time cauſed levies to be made in Germany, to reinforce his army in Italy. Proſpero Colonna was declared general of the league.

They prepare for war. Guicciard.

While Francis continued in a fatal ſecurity, leaving the Milaneſe deſtitute of troops, never imagining he ſhould be attacked in Italy, as judging himſelf ſecure of his Holineſs, the two new allies were contriving to ſeize at once Milan, Genoua, and Como, before they proclaimed war againſt him. For the firſt of theſe projects they imployed Hieronimo Morone, ſenator of Milan, who, being ſuſpected by the French, was baniſhed the city. Morone having aſſembled a great number of exiles (1) in the neighborhood of Milan; Leſcun, who commanded in abſenſe of his brother Lautrec the governor, ſallied from Milan with ſome troops, and purſued the exiles to Reggio, a town of the Pope's, whither they had retired, and even ſummoned the governor to ſurrender thoſe fugitives; who excuſing himſelf, Leſcun withdrew and poſted himſelf about ten miles from Reggio, within the Pope's territories, and there lay ten or twelve days incamped. Thereupon Leo, who only wanted ſome plauſible pretext to declare againſt France, called a conſiſtory, greatly aggravated Leſcun's inſult, and declared that, by way of retaliation, he would forthwith join the Emperor. But he had already done ſo, and the affair of Reggio was a mere pretenſe to delude the cardinals.

Attempts on Genoua, Milan, and Como. Guicciard.

While Leſcun was at Reggio, Adorno, a Genoueſe exile, attempted to poſſeſs himſelf of that city with ſome gallies wherewith Leo and the viceroy of Naples had ſupplied him; but could not ſucceed. A few days after, Leſcun diſcovered a plot to ſurpriſe Como, and was fully informed that the Pope and Emperor were the authors: it is therefore evident that, in caſe they had ſucceeded in their deſigns, they would not in the leaſt have ſcrupled paſſing for the aggreſſors.

Francis orders a levy of Swiſſers, and ſends Lautrec to Milan. Guicciard.

Leſcun, no longer doubting a deſign to invade the Milaneſe, therewith acquainted Francis, and at the ſame time ſent for the four thouſand Swiſſers intended for Milan, who were ready to march. That Prince, amazed at the danger the duchy was in, ordered a ſpeedy levy of twenty thouſand Swiſſers, and ſent Lautrec to Milan, promiſing he ſhould be well ſupported and ſupplied: but this ingagement was but very indifferently executed.

Mean while, Proſpero Colonna, having aſſem-bled at Reggio the confederate army, beſieged Parma, into which Leſcun had already thrown ſome troops: but before he could carry the place, Lautrec, having received the ſupplies he expected from Swiſſerland, conſtrained him to raiſe the ſiege, and purſued him even beyond the borders of the Milaneſe. As he imagined Parma to be out of danger, he had drawn out Leſcun, with the gariſon, to ſtrengthen his army: but no ſooner was Leſcun out of the city, than the inhabitants declared for his Holineſs, and erected the Church's colors on the walls.

But this was not the only misfortune whereto Lautrec was to be expoſed during the campain. Preſently after, he was deſerted by the twenty thouſand Swiſſers he had lately received, and obliged to retire to Milan, whither, alſo in his turn, Proſpero Colonna purſued him with all poſſible diligence. Hereupon Lautrec, deſpairing of defending Milan, quited the town, after ſupplying the caſtle with ammunition, and withdrew to Como, where the four thouſand Swiſſers he ſtill had forſook him and returned home, becauſe he had no money to pay them. So Colonna, taking poſſeſſion of Milan, marched thence to make other conqueſts, which Lautrec could not oppoſe. In a word, Francis loſt the whole duchy of Milan, ſome few places only excepted.

Lautrec deſerted by the Swiſſers, is cloſely purſued by Colonna. Guicciard.

Lautrec quits Milan, and Colonna takes it.

In all appearance, Lautrec would not long have been able to ſupport himſelf in Italy, had not the Pontif's death, on the firſt of December, afforded him ſome reſpite. Leo X is ſaid to have died with joy, at hearing the league's good ſucceſs: tho' ſome affirm his death was haſtened by poiſon (1). However this be, the news of Pope Leo's demiſe was no ſooner ſpread, but the troops he maintained diſbanded themſelves. Of the twelve thouſand Swiſſers he had in the allies army, only fifteen hundred remained, and the Florentines retired home. Thus, in a very few days, Proſpero Colonna found himſelf in as bad a ſituation as Lautrec. The college of cardinals, at a loſs what courſe to take, gave no orders, but defered all farther proceedings 'till the election of a new Pontif. Mean while, the duke of Ferrara recovered ſome of his towns in La Romagna, and Franceſco Maria della Rovere repoſſeſſed himſelf of the duchy of Urbino. Had Lautrec been then ſupplied with the men and money promiſed him, he would doubtleſs have expeled the Imperialiſts from Milan. But Francis I, intirely neglecting the affairs of Italy, thought only of defending himſelf in Flanders and Picardy, where he was vigorouſly attacked: nevertheleſs, he ſtill held in Italy, Genoua, Cremono, the caſtles of Milan and Novara, with ſome no very momentous fortreſſes on the lake Major, or Gorda.

While all this paſſed in Italy, the war at length commenced in the Netherlands in a manner very diſadvantageous to France. The troops raiſed by Robert de la Marc, to beſiege Vireton, being diſbanded, Francis believed he had thorougly ſatisfied Charles and Henry. It was indeed ſufficient to take from the King of England all pretext of declaring againſt him, ſince, by the treaty of League, in caſe one of the allies was invaded, the reſt were not to declare againſt the aggreſſor, 'till, being ſummoned to deſiſt from the war, he ſhould have refuſed. Francis was ſummoned, and had deſiſted, conſequently Henry had no cauſe to complain: but it was otherwiſe with the Emperor, who was not contented with ſo ſlight a ſatisfaction. He forbore however to complain of the King of France, but was reſolved to be revenged on Robert de la Marc, who had the preſumption to ſend him a defiance: beſide, he conſidered, if Francis undertook to defend that Prince, as it was very likely, he would incur the blame of the rupture, and this was what the Emperor and cardinal Wolſey chiefly deſired, in order to make uſe of that inducement to perſuade Henry to declare againſt France. So Charles, having prepared an army, gave the command to Henry count of Naſſau, who, entering the territories of Robert de la Marc, took and razed ſeveral places. Francis was patient, chuſing rather to forſake his ally than give the King of England a pretext to arm againſt him. Then Robert, finding himſelf without refuge, made his ſubmiſſion to the Emperor, who granted him a truce for ſix weeks. Mean while, tho' Charles had to deal only with a feeble Prince, unable to reſiſt him, and on whom he had taken ſufficient vengeance, he continued to reinforce his army. Francis, ſeeing ſo many troops in the neighborhood of Champagne, eaſily perceived they were not ſolely deſigned againſt Robert de la Marc, and that he might be taken unprovided except he prepared for his defenſe. Mean while, he repreſented to the King of England, that he could not avoid taking arms, in order to reſiſt the Emperor, who was preparing to attack him. Henry anſwered, he would ſide with neither; but, as a common friend, offered to be their umpire: adding, if they would both ſend their plenipotentiaries to Calais, the begining of Auguſt, cardinal Wolſey ſhould be there, to act in his name as mediator. Charles readily accepted ſo advantageous a propoſal, ſince he and the cardinal underſtood each other. As for Francis, he durſt not reject it, tho' he had no reaſon to be pleaſed with the King of England; but as yet he knew not that Wolſey was wholly devoted to the Emperor. It was therefore agreed, that the plenipotentiaries of the two Monarchs, the Pope's nuncio, and the cardinal mediator, ſhould meet the fourth of Auguſt at Calais.

Mean while, baron de Liques (2), having levied a body of forces at his own charge, as he affirmed, ſurpriſed Mortagne and St. Amand, in the Tournaiſis, on pretenſe of ſome claim of his family. The Emperor affected to conſider this as a private quarrel wherein he had no concern, tho' Liques's army was compoſed of his ſubjects. His aim was to oblige Francis to take ſome ſtep which might give occaſion to tax him with being the aggreſſor. Herein he only imitated that Prince who had attacked him under the name of Robert de la Marc. But, ſome time after, the governor of Flanders beſieging Tournay in form, it was not poſſible to put ſo favorable a conſtruction on that ſiege, eſpecially as what paſſed then in Italy, left the Emperor no room any longer to diſſemble. It is certain, Francis had been ſurpriſed, as well in Italy as in Champagne and Flanders. He undoubtedly had deſigned to attack the Emperor, but did not expect to be firſt attacked: and for this reaſon he wanted time to prepare his army. Mean while, the Imperialiſts took and razed the town of Ardres.

great ſeal (1). It appears, in Rymer's collection, that he was furniſhed with diverſe royal commiſſions, to be uſed as he ſhould think proper. By the firſt, he was conſtituted the King's lieutenant-general to adjuſt, as mediator, the differences between the Emperor and King of France. By a ſecond, he was impowered to treat and conclude with Francis I a renewal of the alliance: but, probably, this was merely to perſuade the French embaſſadors of Henry's impartiality and pretended deſign to join with him of the two Monarchs who ſhould appear to be unjuſtly attacked. By a third, he had power to conclude a league between England and the Emperor, the Pope, the King of France, or any other Potentate whatever. Thus Henry, without having yet examined on which ſide the blame lay, left it to his lieutenant to ingage him in which party he pleaſed: but, to all appearance, his reſolution was already taken, and the congreſs of Calais was only to ſhow he would not determine 'till after a ſtrict ſcrutiny, and to make the blame of this rupture to be thrown on the King of France. The whole procedure of the cardinal mediator diſcovered his meaning not to be procuring a peace between the two contending Potentates, but only to find the King his maſter a pretext to declare for the Emperor.

The Emperor's army takes Mouzon, and ravages Campagne. Bellay. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

While theſe affairs were negociating at Calais, the Imperialiſts beſieged and carried Mouzon in Champagne. This done, they ravaged the country, and plundered the little town of Aubanton, where the count of Naſſau ſuffered his ſoldiers to commit grievous outrages; after which he laid ſiege to Mezieres. Francis, wanting time to aſſemble his army, could not be ready 'till the cloſe of September: which however was ſoon enough to throw ſuccors into Mezieres, and thereby force the count of Naſſau to raiſe the ſiege. Count de St. Pol recovered Mouzon ſoon after, and the count of Naſſau retired into the earldom of Namur. Champagne being thus freed, Francis ordered his army to march into Flanders, where the Imperialiſts ſtill continued the ſiege of Tournay. When his troops were drawn together, he aſſaulted Bapaume, Landrecy, Bouchain, and carried them. Having afterwards intelligence that Charles, who had headed the Imperial army, was retiring towards Valenciennes, he reſolved to advance and attack him; but, merely thro' his own fault, he miſſed the opportunity. It is affirmed that, had he uſed the expedition as he might, and ought to have done, he would infallibly have defeated the Emperor, who, giving all over for loſt, was retired with a hundred horſe only, quiting his army, not to be a ſpectator of their deſtruction. On this occaſion, King Francis gave great cauſe of diſguſt to the duke of Bourbon, conſtable of France, by ſtationing the duke of Alenſon at the head of the vanguard, tho' that poſt, when the King was in the army, properly belonged to the conſtable. Francis is ſaid to have given the conſtable this mortification purely to oblige his mother, the ducheſs of Angoulême, who hated him: but he had afterwards too much reaſon to repent his complaiſance.

When the breach was made, he ordered the town to be furiouſly ſtormed, but was however bravely repulſed: but the gariſon, little able to withſtand a ſecond aſſault, ſurrendered by capitulation. HENRY VIII. AN' 1519.

While the war was vigorouſly proſecuted in Italy, Champagne, Flanders, Picardy, and Navarre, cardinal Wolſey was buſy at Calais in treating with the plenipotentiaries of Charles and Francis. This congreſs laſted ten weeks, and the parties could not be brought to agree. Very apparently, the mediator, inſtead of cloſing, helped rather to widen the breach. Long was it debated to know which of them had begun the war. This was the chief point, with reſpect to Wolſey, who intended to throw the blame on the King of France. Afterwards, when the differences themſelves came to be conſidered, the propoſals of the Emperor's plenipotentiaries evidently ſhewed a pacification to be ſtill very remote. They demanded reſtitution of the duchy of Burgundy, and abolition of the homage due to the crown of France for Flanders and Artois: the only reaſon they alledged to ſupport their laſt pretenſion was, that it was unbecoming for an Emperor to do homage to a King. Theſe two propoſitions were of ſuch a nature, that Francis would ſcarcely have accepted them, even after the loſs of many battles. On the other hand, the French embaſſadors, having notice of what paſſed in Italy, earneſtly demanded reſtitution of Milan, and that the Emperor ſhould withdraw his troops from before Tournay. They moreover inſiſted on the reſtitution of Navarre, whereto Charles was bound by the treaty of Noyon. Had the Emperor been apprehenſive of Henry's joining with the King of France, he might have granted part of theſe demands without being obliged to diſmember his dominions. But Francis could not reſign Burgundy, without opening a paſſage for the enemy into the heart of his kingdom, nor honorably forgo the homage of Flanders and Artois: but, as the Emperor was ſecure of the King of England, he perſiſted in his demands, without the leaſt abatement.

Account of the Calais congreſs. Hall. Herbert.

After the mediator had long feigned to indeavor only to procure a peace, he declared, he ſaw no proſpect of ſucceſs. He then preſented to the plenipotentiaries a treaty to ſign, containing articles of ſmall moment, viz. "That the French and Flemings ſhould have liberty to fiſh for Herrings, 'till the end of January: that the two contending Monarchs ſhould injoin their ſubjects not to purſue any veſſel into the ports or harbors appertaining to the King of England, nor commit any hoſtilities within the territories of the ſaid King, during the war: that the Pope's nuncio, and the plenipotentiaries at Calais might freely retire with all their train, without receiving any injury from the troops of the two competitors: that the King of England, and the cardinal legate his lieutenant, ſhould be the conſervators of theſe articles, to be ratified within ten days." We have here a very ſenſible proof of Wolſey's inſolence, who, in a treaty drawn by himſelf, preſumed thus to ſet himſelf on a level with his Sovereign, by being jointly with King Henry declared conſervator. Theſe conventions were ratified by the two Monarchs the 2d and 11th of October, and there appears not in Rymer, the leaſt trace of any other treaty made at Calais at or near that juncture.

to Francis I, during the congreſs of Calais, they labored ſo effectually, that at length it was agreed, the Emperor ſhould raiſe the ſiege of Tournay, and withdraw his troops from the Milaneſe; alſo that Francis ſhould retire into France with his army, and their differences be refered to the King of England's arbitration. He adds that, after theſe conventions, each thought the peace concluded, but that, on the Emperor's receiving news of Fontarabia's being taken, he demanded, before the treaty was ratified, the reſtitution of that place, and, on Francis's refuſal, the treaty remained unexecuted: but, very probably, this illuſtrious author, who was better acquainted with the particulars of the war than with thoſe of the negociations, was miſinformed. Firſt, becauſe Rymer's collection of public acts mentions not this pretended treaty, tho' we ſee there another of much leſs conſequence concluded at the ſame time. Secondly, we find not in the ſaid collection, any embaſſy from the King of England, either to Francis or Charles V, during the time which muſt have preceded this ſame treaty. Thirdly, there is no probability that the Emperor would have withdrawn his troops from the Milaneſe, that is, would have reſtored Milan to France, and loſt the hopes of acquiring Tournay, now reduced to extremities, for the bare advantage of ſeeing Francis retire home. Finally, it might readily have been comprehended that Henry was very far from the thoughts of conſtraining the Emperor to yield to theſe terms; and it will ſtill more manifeſtly appear by the ſequel. Add to all theſe conſiderations that, ſeeing what regard both Charles and Francis had for cardinal Wolſey, it is not likely they ſhould conclude a treaty without his participation, and by the miniſtry of other embaſſadors, while he was at Calais to do the office of mediator. Poſſibly, theſe propoſals were made to Francis, and he was ſo blind as to imagine they would take place, becauſe he was yet ignorant of the ſecret ingagements of the King of England and his miniſter with the Emperor, and becauſe ſuch a report was ſpread in the court of France. However this be, after the reduction of Fontarabia, the war was proſecuted unintermittingly, and with the utmoſt inveteracy. Francis I, became maſter of Heſdin about the begining of November, and Tournay ſurrendered to the Emperor by capitulation.

Wolſey goes to the Emperor at Bruges. Hall. Stow. Herbert.

Mean while cardinal Wolſey ſtill continued at Calais, under color of ſearching for ſome farther expedient to procure a pacification between the two Monarchs. He often diſpatched couriers to both, with propoſals which he knew they would not accept. At length, feigning himſelf deſirous of gaining time, he went perſonally to the Emperor at Bruges (1), where he was received with as much reſpect as if he had been King of England (2). There he concluded with the Pope and Emperor a league againſt France, by virtue of the powers he had brought with him. By this treaty, his Sanctity ingaged to thunder the church's cenſures againſt King Francis. Henry was to invade him with an army forty thouſand ſtrong. The Emperor and Henry obliged themſelves to break all their ingagements with him. Moreover, Henry promiſed to give the Emperor in marriage Princeſs Mary, already affianced to the Dauphin. Theſe were the chief articles agreed on by the Emperor and cardinal, the 24th of November 1521, which were to be ratified and put into form of treaty within three months; but they ingaged to be ſecret till the time of performance. Thus was Henry perſuaded by his miniſter to oppreſs his ally the King of France, by whom he had not been any way injured. The only thing he could complain of was, that Francis had lately permited the duke of Albany to return into Scotland, doubtleſs becauſe he perceived the cardinal was hatching againſt him ſome miſchief. It is in vain to inquire, what intereſt Henry had to declare againſt France, and cauſe the ballance to incline to the Emperor's ſide: no other can be found but the cardinal's, who wanted to be Pope at Francis's coſt. The death of Leo X, haſtened by poiſon, as ſeveral affirm, and happening during theſe tranſactions, has made ſome ſuſpect that Wolſey was concerned in it, and the more becauſe he aſpired to be ſucceſſor to a Pope much younger than himſelf; but no proof was ever produced. Certainly Henry would have acquired more glory in continuing umpire of the peace between the two contending Monarchs, and procuring tranquillity to all Europe, than by the conqueſts wherewith he was flattered by his miniſter.

Henry's falſe politics. Hall. Herbert.

Wolſey had already puſhed his fortune to ſuch a height, that it ſeemed difficult to make thereto any addition; nevertheleſs, all was too little to ſatiate his ambition and avarice. His legateſhip had, at the begining of this year, been prolonged for two years; but he deemed himſelf too ſuperior to all other legates not to have a different commiſſion from theirs. In April, he procured from Leo X a bull, impowering him to make fifty knights, fifty count palatines, as many acolyths (3) and chaplains, forty apoſtolic notaries, who ſhould have the ſame privileges as thoſe made by the Pope; to legitimate baſtards, give degrees in arts, law, phyſic, and divinity, and grant all ſorts of diſpenſations: in ſhort, not ſatisfied with the vaſt wealth he poſſeſſed, or with the means he had to increaſe it inceſſantly, he cauſed alſo the rich abbey of St. Albans to be given to him this year in commendam.

Diſgrace and death of the duke of Buckingham. Herbert. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

It is no wonder if, being arrived to ſo elevated a degree of grandure and opulency, his pride increaſed proportionably. Tho' the King's blindneſs for him was inconceivable, it was not ſo with the courtiers, who ſaw but too plainly how groſly he miſled his maſter, who placed in him ſuch confidence: yet none durſt take notice of it, ſo was his haughty and revengeful diſpoſition dreaded. The duke of Buckingham, ſon of the duke of the ſame name, who, in the reign of Richard III, loſt his head on the ſcaffold for attempting to procure the crown for Henry VII, ſadly experienced how dangerous it was to diſcover peoples ſentiments of that proud prelate. He happened one day to ſay, in the hearing of one who betrayed him (4) that, "in "caſe the King died iſſueleſs, he thought he had "a right to the crown, and if ever he aſcended "the throne, his firſt care ſhould be to puniſh the "cardinal according to his deſerts." HENRY VIII. AN' 1521.

Edward III. Doctor Morton, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, preſſed the duke his father to indeavor to ſeize the crown; but the duke choſe rather to act for the earl of Richmond than for himſelf, as was ſhewn in the reign of Richard III. What the ſon had ſaid, concerning his title, was therefore rather imprudent than criminal, ſince he pretended not to the crown except King Henry died without heirs. Indeed, his title might be ill-grounded; but he had done nothing to ſupport it. His crime then conſiſted only in what he had ſaid againſt the cardinal, who, for that reaſon, reſolved to diſpatch him. To that purpoſe, he gained ſome of his domeſtics, and, by their means, learned that he had conſulted a certain monk (1) who pretended to fore-tell things to come, and had confered with him ſeveral times ſince April 1512. Probably, the duke, fond of this title, had inquired of the monk, whether the King would die iſſueleſs: and that was ſufficient to give the cardinal occaſion to miſconſtrue all his proceedings. When he believed he had ſufficient evidence againſt him, he began with depriving him of his two principal ſupports; namely, the earl of Northumberland his father-in-law, whom he ſent to the tower on ſome pretenſe (2), and the earl of Surrey (3) his ſon-in-law, on whom he confered the government of Ireland, to remove him from London. Preſently after the duke was apprehended and accuſed of high-treaſon. The ſubſtance of his impeachment was, that he had ſeveral times conſulted that monk concerning the ſucceſſion to the crown, and affected to make himſelf popular. The duke confeſſed he had talked ſometimes with the monk; but denied it to be with the intent he was charged with. Nevertheleſs he was condemned to die as a traitor, which he could not bear to hear when the ſentence was pronounced (4). "My lord of Norfolk (cried he) you "have ſaid as a traitor ſhould be ſaid unto; but I "was never one. My lords (continued he, addreſſing himſelf to the peers his judges) I nothing "malign for what you have done to me, but the "eternal God forgive you my death, and I do. I "ſhall never ſue to the King for life; howbeit he "is a gracious Prince, and more grace may come "from him than I deſire. My lords, and all my "fellows, I deſire you to pray for me." When he ſaid he would not ſue to the King for life, his meaning was, he thought it would be fruitleſs, knowing he fell a victim to Wolſey, whoſe ſway over the King was abſolute. Indeed, the miniſter had ſo ordered it that, tho' all the peers of the realm had a right to aſſiſt at the trial, there were preſent only one duke, one marquis, ſeven earls, and twelve barons (5); and probably he had ſecured the majority. All the favor this unhappy nobleman received, was to be beheaded, inſtead of dying the death of a traitor (6). This execution was attended with loud murmurs among the people, and ſatyrical libels againſt Wolſey wherein, among other things, was ſaid, "That it was not ſtrange the ſon of a butcher "ſhould delight in ſheding blood:" but this was all the revenge was taken for that injuſtice; this cardinal was too deeply rooted in his Sovereign's eſteem to dread or regard theſe murmurs, which beſide never reached the King's ears, all who approached him being either ſpies or creatures of the cardinal.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1521.

Henry was then wholly intent on one affair, namely, the war he had reſolved to make upon France, as if his glory and grandure had depended on the ruin of that kingdom, whereas his true intereſt was to ſupport France againſt the Emperor, who was grown but too powerful. He was already formidable to all Europe, even without the aſſiſtance of England; how much more ſo by his union with that kingdom? This was owing to the ambition of cardinal Wolſey, whoſe counſels to his maſter were always ſelfiſh. To all appearance, France was on the point of being reduced to a moſt wretched condition, it being ſcarcely poſſible for her to reſiſt ſuch potent enemies, who were to invade her from ſeveral quarters. Francis imagined however he had ſtill one refuge by means of the Scots, who could make a conſiderable diverſion in England. The congreſs of Calais having plainly diſcovered Henry's partiality to the Emperor, he made no doubt of its being the introduction to a rupture. In this belief, tho' he had ingaged to detain the duke of Albany in France, he thought proper to keep him no longer, not thinking himſelf bound to perform a promiſe the motive whereof was now no more, namely, the mutual friendſhip between him and Henry. He therefore ſuffered the duke of Albany to return into Scotland, or rather ſent him back, in hopes he would imploy part of the Engliſh forces on the borders of the two kingdoms. He very juſtly expected this ſervice from a Prince who was devoted to him, and looked on his ſettlement in France as much more ſolid than that in Scotland, where his regency was to laſt but few years. The duke departed for Scotland, and arriving, on the thirtieth of October 1521, after a four years abſenſe, reſumed the regency. As he intended to ſerve France to the utmoſt of his power, his firſt care was to oblige the earl of Angus, the Queen's conſort, to quit the realm, deeming him one of the King of England's principal adherents; nevertheleſs the earl took refuge in France.

While all the Chriſtian Potentates were buſied in their temporal concerns, the reformation made great progreſs in Germany, by means of Luther's writings, which were read with great eagerneſs. Luther was ſatisfied at firſt with attacking the ſale of indulgences, then the indulgences themſelves, and the Pope's power to grant them. This naturally led him to examine the grounds of the Papal authority; and, being perſuaded there was nothing to ſupport it in Scripture, he wrote on that ſubject without any regard to the Roman Pontif: in his writings he likewiſe attacked the celibacy of prieſts, monaſtic vows, and private maſſes. Tho' at the time I am now ſpeaking of, namely, the begining of the year 1521, he had preached and written againſt the Pope only three years, he had gained abundance of followers, and ſtill more enemies, not only by his novel opinions, but alſo by his ſharp and ſatyrical ſtile, wherein he threw off all ceremony with regard to the church of Rome. The book which made moſt noiſe, was intitled, "Concerning the "Babyloniſh Captivity." Therein the Popes were not ſpared.

In the ſeveral anſwers which appeared, as well againſt this as the other books of Luther, the decretals of the Popes, and the works of Thomas Aquinas were urged in favor of the Pontifical authority. This gave him occaſion, in his replies, to ridicule thoſe who, in defenſe of the Papal power, alledged the deciſions of the Popes themſelves, and the teſtimony of Thomas Aquinas, who was canonized for carrying the Pope's authority as high as poſſible. Beſide, he expreſſed not any extraordinary regard for that author's writings; which, very probably, was what chiefly inſenſed Henry VIII againſt him. As Henry had much ſtudied the works of Thomas Aquinas, and from thence properly had acquired all his theological knowledge, he could not bear to ſee his favorite author thus contemned (1). He thought himſelf therefore a match for Luther, and able to confute his writings: but, as Leo X had by a bull expreſly prohibited the reading Luther's works, and as an anſwer neceſſarily ſuppoſed the peruſal, cardinal Wolſey applied to the Pope for a power to permit ſuch to read them as deſired it with intent to confute them. This was granted him by a brief dated the ſeventeenth of April 1521, the Pope little dreaming what ſort of doctor it was who was about ſupporting his cauſe.

Henry VIII's book againſt Luther, Herbert. Hall. preſented to the Pope;

In September Henry finiſhed his book againſt Luther, intitled, "Concerning the ſeven Sacra-"ments." He defended indulgences, Papal authority, the number of ſacraments, and other articles combated by Luther, proceeding on Thomas Aquinas's principles as on truths not conteſtable. Moſt probably, he was aſſiſted by cardinal Wolſey in compoſing this work, which was preſented to the Pope in full conſiſtory (2). Leo X, who was ſtill living, received it with great joy, and ſpake of it in the higheſt ſtrains of adulation, making no ſcruple to compare it to the works of St. Auguſtine and St. Jerom. This is no wonder: a book compoſed by a potent Monarch, in defenſe of the Papal authority, could not be too much eſteemed by a Pope. A few days after, Leo aſſembled the cardinals, to conſult with them after what manner he ſhould requite the King of England's ſervice to the church. After a long debate, they reſolved to honor that Prince with the glorious title of Defender of the Faith (3). In conſequence of this reſolution, the Pope ordered a bull to be drawn, confering that title on Henry, and all the Kings of England his ſucceſſors. I ſhall not repeat here the magnificent eulogies beſtowed on Henry by his Holineſs in this bull, and in a letter of thanks for his book. It may be eaſily imagined he ſpared not the moſt extravagant expreſſions to flatter a Prince, who was ſo fond of being flattered, and of whom he ſtood in need, his nuncio being then at Calais negociating, with cardinal Wolſey, a league againſt France (4).

Henry VIII. An' 1521.

P. 758.

Of this league, which was really concluded at Bruges, I have already made mention. Henry founded his joining with the Emperor on Francis's having been the aggreſſor, by incouraging Robert de la Marc to take arms: but beſide that Francis denied his being concerned in that affair, and had even obliged De la Marc to deſiſt, it was evident the Emperor had prevented him, by joining in a league with the Pope, tho' their league was not ſo ſoon made public. The ſecret attempts on Como, Milan, Genoua, and the open war in the Milaneſe, by which the King of France loſt that duchy, were clear evidences that the league was concluded before De la Marc's attempt. Henry pretended alſo to have againſt Francis another cauſe of complaint, which however had no better foundation; viz. his having, contrary to his promiſe, ſuffered the duke of Albany to return into Scotland: but, if it is conſidered that the duke arrived not in his own country 'till the thirtieth of October, and that the league of Bruges was ſigned the twenty-fourth of November, it will be eaſy to perceive the league was already reſolved before Henry could have intelligence of the duke of Albany's being arrived in Scotland. But tho', on the firſt notice, he had taken a haſty reſolution to join with the Pope and Emperor; was that a juſt cauſe to proceed to a war which, in all appearance, would prove France's utter deſtruction? The truth is, theſe were only pretenſes to cover the injuſtice of a war undertaken by Henry for the cardinal's intereſt, and perhaps without knowing himſelf the real motives of that miniſter's procedure.

The pretended reaſon of this laſt charge was, that the Queen-dowager, being deſirous to have her marriage with the earl of Angus annulled, the duke of Albany had ſeconded her ſuit at the court of Rome (5). Henry finds means to avoid a war with Scotland. Buchanan. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

Henry could not expect any other anſwer, ſince he was conſcious to himſelf, that his accuſations againſt the regent of Scotland were only affected pretexts to complain indirectly of the King of France. Nevertheleſs, he ordered lord Dacres to march into Scotland with five hundred men, and proclaim on the borders, " That if the Scots made " not peace with him by a certain limited day, it " ſhould be to their peril:" but he ſupported this bravado but very indifferently. His ſole aim was to furniſh his party in Scotland with a pretenſe to refuſe ſerving the regent, in caſe he attempted to make a diverſion in England in favor of France; nor was he therein diſappointed. In October following, the regent of Scotland, raiſing forces to make an inroad into England, was no ſooner come to the borders, but many of the lords refuſed to advance any farther, alledging; " They were un- " willing to ingage the kingdom in a needleſs war " with England." The oppoſition the duke of Albany found in his army convincing him, he ſhould not be able to effect any thing conſiderable, he propoſed a truce, which the Engliſh gladly accepted; Henry's view being only to terrify the Scots with a dread of the ſucceſs of a war with England during their King's minority. So, the duke of Albany, finding it out of his power to ſerve France as he deſired, returned about the end of October to Paris, in order to take freſh meaſures with King Francis. Thus Henry attained his ends, in avoiding a rupture with Scotland, as a war with that kingdom could not but extremely incommode him, his then circumſtances conſidered.

The regent returns to France.

Mean while, Francis I, having had ſome intelligence of what paſſed at Bruges between the Emperor and cardinal Wolſey, and deſiring to convince Henry how directly contrary to the league of London his proceedings were, ſent him letters patent, inſerting the article of the treaty whereby they were ingaged mutually to aſſiſt each other. Then he recited what injuries Charles had done him, as well in Italy, as in Champagne and Flanders, and ſummoned him to perform the treaty he had ſolemnly ſworn. Henry anſwered by a herald whom he ſent to proclaim war againſt him (1), alledging, he was obliged to it by the ſame treaty of London, becauſe Francis had firſt attacked the Emperor, and had moreover falſified his promiſe with reſpect to the duke of Albany (2). Thus war was once more declared between France and England, on very frivolous, not to ſay unjuſt occaſions: but Wolſey had the art of perſuading the King his maſter to whatever he pleaſed.

Henry proclaims war. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Pol. Virg.

Henry having, without cauſe, proclaimed war againſt France, durſt not call a parliament to demand a ſubſidy: for he could not alledge either a juſt cauſe, or any real neceſſity for undertaking a war deſtructive to the Engliſh merchants; nevertheleſs money muſt be raiſed, and it was the buſineſs of Wolſey, who had imbarked him in the war, to find means. The expedient he thought moſt proper was, to order the ſheriffs to ſend a liſt of the names of all above ſixteen years old, with exact accounts of what each perſon was worth in land, ſtock, moveables, and money. This was ſuch a ſurvey as was formerly taken in the reign of William the Conqueror, and had given the nation ſuch great cauſe of complaint (3). This was followed by a general loan of the tenth on his lay-ſubjects, and a fourth of the clergy, according to the true value of their eſtates, beſide twenty thouſand pounds which the King borrowed of the city of London in particular: thus one injuſtice commonly draws on another. This war was manifeſtly unjuſt, and became ſtill more ſo by the means imployed to maintain it: theſe kinds of involuntary loans, to which certain Kings of England have ſometimes forced their ſubjects, being a manifeſt violation of the peoples privileges, and tend directly to arbitrary power. If the King may oblige his ſubjects to furniſh him with money, when he ſhall think neceſſary, tho' it be by way of benevolence or loan, it may be aſſured he will very ſeldom, or perhaps never think himſelf obliged to call a parliament. It is true, Henry was neither the firſt nor laſt who uſed this extraordinary method to raiſe money. But, tho' he was ſo lucky as not to receive any prejudice by it, ſome of his ſucceſſors, who were pleaſed to imitate him, were not ſo fortunate.

Remark on involuntary loans.

Murmurs againſt the cardinal.

This general loan made a great noiſe throughout the realm. Every one openly exclaimed againſt the cardinal, who was the author: but he little regarded the peoples clamors, becauſe he was ſupported by the King. However, tho' at firſt he had given orders to exact loans with the ſame rigor as if they had been a tax impoſed by parliament, he met with ſo many obſtacles that he grew apprehenſive of raiſing in the kingdom commotions not to be appeaſed at his pleaſure: wherefore much greater moderation was uſed in levying the tax than at firſt was intended. This occaſioned ſuch a great drawback in the cardinal's calculation, that Henry was finally obliged to have recourſe to the uſual method of a parliament to maintain the war, as we ſhall ſee preſently. Thoſe who moſt ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this levy were the London merchants. They were required to declare, upon oath, the real value of their effects: but they firmly refuſed it, alledging; it was not poſſible for them to give any exact eſtimate of their ſubſtance, part whereof was in the hands of their correſpondents in foreign countries. At length, the King agreed to content himſelf with what they thought fit to give him, according to their own calculation.

The London merchants oppoſe the tax.

Wolſey diſappointed of his hopes of the Papacy.

Cardinal Wolſey's concern at not ſucceeding in this affair, according to his wiſh, was not comparable to his trouble at being diſappointed in another which touched him abundantly nearer, and for which he had ſpared neither labor, aſſiduity nor expenſe: I mean his advancement to the Pontifical dignity, whereof he deemed himſelf very ſecure. Leo X dying the begining of December laſt year, when his obſequies were over, the cardinals entered the conclave, where they were not a little imbaraſſed concerning the election of a new Pontif. Cardinal Julio di Medicis aſpired to the Papacy, and had for him a good number of votes: but the Emperor's party, and ſome cardinals gained by Wolſey, openly oppoſed his ſaid eminency's election. Mean while, as it is required to have two thirds of the voices to be choſen Pope, if cardinal Di Medicis had not ſufficient to do his own buſineſs, he had however enough to exclude any other: and this long detained the cardinals in the conclave. Tho' the Emperor had aſſured Wolſey of his whole intereſt, he deſigned not to perform his promiſe. His intention was to procure the Pontificate for his quondam preceptor, Adrian Florent biſhop of Tortoſa, native of Utrecht, as reckoning he would be intirely devoted to him when in St. Peter's chair: but this affair was managed ſo artfully, and withal ſo privately, that the cardinals of his party, without diſcovering their intent, were ſatisfied with breaking the meaſures of Julio di Medicis, 'till ſome opportunity to carry their point ſhould offer.

Management of the conclave. Guicciard. Pol. Virg.

Herbert. Stow. Hollingſh.

Mean while, Wolſey left no ſtone unturned. As he grounded his whole hope on the Emperor's intereſt, he wrote to remind him of his ingagement, repreſenting the advantages he would reap by having a ſovereign Pontif wholly at his devotion. He alſo, at the ſame time, ordered Richard Pace, then at Venice, inſtantly to repair to Rome, and do him all poſſible ſervice. The Emperor was extremely perplexed in relation to Wolſey. He had ingaged to imploy the utmoſt extent of his credit in that cardinal's behalf, tho' nothing was more remote from his intentions. It was his intereſt to have a Pontif at his devotion: but he knew Wolſey too well to imagine ſuch a Pope would be guided by his counſels. It was therefore requiſite for Charles, in order not to loſe Wolſey's friendſhip, to get Adrian elected without his appearing to be therein any way concerned. As he had gained that miniſter to his intereſt ſolely by the promiſe of procuring him the Papacy, he could not doubt that, if he found himſelf deceived, he would turn his maſter againſt him. On theſe conſiderations, Charles concealed his deſigns, and was, in the conclave, ſo faithfully ſerved, that they could not be diſcovered; neither had Adrian ever one vote in the daily ſcrutinies. Mean while, he held Wolſey in hopes, and threw on the faction of cardinal Di Medicis thoſe obſtacles which occurred in the performance of his promiſe. Finally, when thoſe who were in Charles's ſecret, and managed his affairs in the conclave, were ſecure of a ſufficient number of votes, one day, as the cardinals were met to make a ſcrutiny, ſome one propoſed cardinal Adrian, biſhop of Tortoſa, then in Spain. He expatiated on that prelate's extraordinary qualifications, and the advantages which would accrue to the church by his promotion: whereupon they who were of the party ſucceſſively voted for Adrian, as if they had been inſpired, and perhaps without being acquainted with each other's deſign, ſo dexterouſly had the buſineſs been managed: the reſt, who were not in the ſecret, ſeeing two thirds of the ſuffrages for Adrian, voted the ſame way, leſt a fruitleſs oppoſition might turn to their prejudice. Thus the election was made with unanimous concurrence, and paſſed for a miraculous inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt. It is not probable Wolſey was ſuch a dupe as to believe the Emperor not concerned in Adrian's election, ſince the whole was ſo very apparently manifeſt. The new Pontif, who aſſumed he name of Adrian VI, had been, as was obſerved, Charles's tutor, and on his recommendation was made cardinal, and was then actually regent in Spain. Beſide, there is no likelihood that the cardinals would have thought of chuſing a Barbarian (for that is the honorable appellation the Italians beſtow on all ſuch as are not of their nation) had not the election been managed by the Emperor. However this be, Wolſey expreſſed not the leaſt reſentment; whether he waited for opportunity to take open vengeance, or thought it convenient to keep fair with the Emperor againſt another vacancy; it being likely one would happen ſpeedily, the new Pope being aged and very infirm. Adrian VI was elected in January 1522, but it was mid-ſummer before he reached Rome.

This viſit was requiſite, as well to confirm with that Prince the articles agreed on at Bruges, as to try to preſerve cardinal Wolſey's friendſhip, without which he could not expect to preſerve the King's. He landed, the twenty-ſixth of May, at Dover, where Wolſey waited on him with a magnificent train, and the King

The preamble of this treaty ran, "That the "Emperor and King of France had refered their "differences to the arbitration of the King of England, who had ſent the cardinal of York to Calais to decide them: that, in theſe conferences, it "was long debated, to know which of the two "Monarchs had been the aggreſſor, and, after mature deliberation, the cardinal had declared, it "was the King of France, as well by means of "of Robert de la Marc, as by invading Navarre: "that therefore the King of England was, by the "treaty of London, obliged to aſſiſt the Prince "attacked againſt the aggreſſor. That moreover, "he had himſelf cauſe to complain of the King of "France, for breach of promiſe, in ſending back "the duke of Albany into Scotland, and for diſ"continuing the payments of the ſums due to him." On all theſe accounts, Charles and Henry, deemed themſelves free and clear from all ingagements with the King of France, and determined to contract a ſtrict alliance, and ſeal it with a marriage between the Emperor and Princeſs Mary, Henry's daughter, on the following conditions. Of theſe terms I ſhall recite ſuch only as may be of ſervice to the ſequel of the hiſtory: thoſe concerning the marriage were to the following purport: viz.

Articles of the treaty.

"That the Emperor ſhould eſpouſe Mary, "daughter to Henry, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould be "twelve years old.

"That her dowry ſhould be four hundred thou"ſand crowns, from which ſhould be deducted "what the Emperor Maximilian had borrowed of "the King of England (3).

"That, in caſe the marriage ſhould not be ac"compliſhed thro' any default on the Emperor's "ſide, he obliged himſelf to pay four hundred "thouſand crowns to the King of England, who "bound himſelf in the ſame ſum to the Emperor, "in caſe the marriage was thro' his means fruſtrated."

The terms of the league were;

"That, before the end of May 1524, the Em"peror ſhould enter France on the ſide of Spain, "and the King of England in Picardy, each with "an army of at leaſt thirty thouſand (4) foot, and "ten thouſand horſe.

"That they ſhould not conclude either peace or "truce without a mutual conſent.

"That if any places ſhould be conquered upon "France, they ſhould be reſtored to him of the "two allies who thereto had a right; and to pre"vent all diſputes, each ſhould declare his preten"ſions before the firſt of May, 1524.

"That if the King of England intended to ſub"due Scotland, or reduce Ireland to intire obedi"ence, or the Emperor to recover Gueldres or "Friſeland; if the Scots invaded England, or "the duke of Gueldres made war upon the Em"peror; in all theſe caſes the two Monarchs ſhould "be bound to aſſiſt each other.

"That they ſubmited to the ſpiritual juriſdiction "of the cardinal of York as legate, and required "him to pronounce the ſentence of excommunica"tion againſt him of the two who ſhould firſt vio"late the treaty.

"That the treaty ſhould be kept private, ſo that "the common enemy might not thereof have any "knowledge.

"That the Pope ſhould be intreated to enter in"to the league as a principal contractor, and re"puted as ſuch, provided he accepted it within "three months.

"That the Venetians ſhould be likewiſe admit"ed, provided they renounced their alliance with "France.

"That the two Monarchs ſhould uſe their ut"moſt indeavors to perſuade the Swiſſers to for"ſake the French, or at leaſt to be neutral."

The ſame day the treaty was ſigned, the Emperor ſigned alſo letters patent, promiſing to pay Henry whatever was due to him from Francis, in caſe Francis, on account of the preſent league, ſhould refuſe to continue the payments whereto he was ingaged.

The Emperor's bounty to Wolſey.

But cardinal Wolſey had not delayed doing his own buſineſs 'till the King's was finiſhed, for, on the eighth of June, the Emperor, by letters patent, ingaged to pay him the penſion of twelve thouſand livres (5), which the King of France gave him for the biſhoprick of Tournay. Some days after, he obliged himſelf to allow him annually two thouſand five hundred ducats, 'till the like penſion was aſſigned him on the vacant churches in Spain, in lieu of that he received from the See of Badajos, which the Emperor deſired to diſcharge. But Charles's bounties to cardinal Wolſey were amply recompenſed, by a large ſum lent him by the King before his departure.

Affairs of Italy. Guicciard. Mezerai. Herbert.

I must now briefly relate the success of the wars which were carrying on in diverse quarters. The death of Leo X had reduced the confederates affairs in Italy to a very bad posture. The troops of the Church and of Florence had relinquished the army, immediately after the news of Leo's decease: also, Prospero Colonna, receiving no more supplies of money either from Rome or the Emperor, was obliged to disband most of his remaining forces, and to retain only such as were absolutely necessary for the defense of Milan. Mean while, the Emperor ordered a levy of six thousand Landsquenets (2), which Francesco Sforza and Ieronimo Adorno, a Genoese, were to lead into Italy. Very soon after, Lautrec received a re-inforcement of sixteen thousand Swissers, which rendered him superior to the allies, and yet he could not prevent the Landsquenets from joining the Imperial army. His sole resourse was to attempt bringing the Imperialists to a battle, and for that purpose he besieged Pavia; but Prospero Colonna found means to throw succors into the place without runing any hazard. Lautrec, thereupon despairing of success, raised the siege, and incamped at Monza, while Colonna, who was under apprehensions for Milan, posted himself at Bicocca, a country seat with a large park which might easily be fortified, being surrounded with a deep ditch. Here Colonna having so intrenched himself that it would have been great rashness to attack him, Lautrec had very little stomach to fall upon the Imperialists in that post; but he could not possibly evade it: his Swissers would have money, and he had none to give them; Louisa of Savoy, the King's mother, having applied to other uses the four hundred thousand crowns designed for the army in Italy. Mean while, the Swissers pressed their general either to give them money, or lead them to battle, else they were resolved to return home. This put him at length upon assaulting the camp of Bicocca, where he was repulsed with great loss (3); after which, the Swissers quiting him, he was constrained to repass the mountains, not being in a condition to face the Imperialists. Presently after Colonna became master of Genoua. This rich city, being taken by a surprise, while a capitulation was negociating, was miserably sacked. In short, Francis had nothing left in Italy, but the castles of Milan and Cremona, and even these were very straitly blocaded.

In other parts, where the war was prosecuted during this campain, France was more prosperous. After admiral Bonnivet had taken Fontarabia, the Spaniards invested that place, and pushed the siege without being able to accomplish their enterprise. At length, marshal de Chabanes, being sent into Bearn to take command of the French army in the room of marshal de Chatillon who was dead, raised the siege, and left for governor of Fontarabia one Frauget, who afterwards very badly performed his duty.

The Spaniards raise the siege of Fontarabia. Mezerai.

In Picardy and Champagne, the Imperialists and English having joined their forces, did nothing worthy notice. The two armies, commanded by count de Bure for the Emperor, and by the earl of Surrey for the King of England (4), were so superior to those of France, that the duke of Vendôme, who commanded in Picardy, was not able to make head against them; wherefore, having furnished the towns with ammunition, he contented himself with annoying them with a small flying army which incessantly accompanied them, either in flank or rear. In September the two generals besieged Hesdin, but, after having been five or six weeks before the town, were forced to retire. Thence they marched to Dourlens, and finding the place deserted, and the gates taken down, set fire to it. Then intending to approach Corbie in October, the bad weather, and the care the French had taken for that place's defense, hindered their undertaking the siege. After that, the Imperialists retired into Artois, and the English returned home (5).

Henry VIII. An' 1522.

Thus, all the efforts of the Emperor and King of England would have done Francis no great mischief this campain, had not he himself been the cause of his ill success in Italy, by neglecting to supply the Swissers with money. Indeed, had not Lautrec been constrained to attack the Imperialists at Bicocca, probably he would have been master of Milan before the end of the campain. Charles V then perceived, that, to gain any considerable advantage upon France, much greater efforts were to be used, and for that reason continued to caress cardinal Wolsey, in order to secure the King his master's assistance. In Rymer is extant a letter of his to the cardinal, full of obliging expressions, plainly denoting his want of him. "I return you "thanks (said he to him) for the good affection "you have always shewn me, desiring you to con- "tinue it, as I firmly believe you will, for you are "sensible that I place my whole confidence in you." Again, "I intreat you to give the same credit to "my said embassadors as to myself, and shew "yourself, on this occasion, as I take you to be, "my good and faithful friend, for I shall have a "grateful remembrance of it."

An' 1523.

The extraordinary method used by the cardinal to raise money having been very disagreeable to the English, he judged it more advisable for the future to proceed in the usual way; and therefore the King assembled a parliament the fifteenth of April 1523. The convocation meeting at the same time, as usual, the cardinal resolved to establish a good precedent in the King's favor, by exacting from the clergy a considerable subsidy. His character of legate gave him such interest with that body, that he was almost sure of obtaining whatever he was pleased to demand: but in order to have the fewer difficulties to incounter, he removed, on diverse pretexts, some of those from whom he feared to meet opposition, and gained others by promises or menaces. Matters being thus ordered, he demanded of the clergy a subsidy of one half of their annual revenues, payable in five years. Richard Fox bishop of Winchester, John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and a proctor of the inferior clergy, one Philips, would have opposed this exaction; but his eminence treated them so as discouraged the rest from supporting them: so the subsidy was granted, tho' the ecclesiastics privately murmured, that the Pope's legate, who ought to maintain their rights, was the first who violated them.

feſt the neceſſity of the war King Henry was entering on, by aggravating the pretended injuries he had indured from the King of France. He concluded with demanding a ſubſidy of the fifth part of the goods of every lay-ſubject, to be paid in four years. This demand cauſed warm debates among the commons. Several repreſented that, were the realm actually invaded, the King could ſcarce require ſuch a ſubſidy, much leſs for a war wantonly undertaken, and rather for the Emperor's than England's intereſt. However, as the court-party were very numerous in the houſe, it was reſolved to grant the King a ſubſidy, which was but one half of what he demanded. Wolſey, who was uſed to be complied with, was extremely offended at this oppoſition of the commons. He went again to the houſe and told them; "He deſired to reaſon with "thoſe who oppoſed his demands." But the commons replied, by their ſpeaker*; "That it was "the order of that houſe to hear, and not to reaſon "but among themſelves." At this reply the cardinal withdrew, extremely mortified, perceiving he could only prejudice the King's affairs in attempting to treat the commons with the ſame arrogance he treated the reſt of mankind. However his motion was not quite without effect, ſince there was ſome addition made to the ſubſidy (1).

Beſide this affair, for which properly the parliament was called, nothing remarkable paſſed in this meeting, except an act of attainder againſt the late duke of Buckingham, who had been condemned by a ſentence of his peers. As the public was thoroughly ſatisfied that this ſentence had been procured by indirect and irregular methods, and openly accuſed Wolſey of having ſacrificed that noble peer to his revenge, he had intereſt enough to obtain this act, in order to divert thoſe odious imputations: tho' at the ſame time the parliament ſufficiently evidenced the ſaid act to have been paſſed merely thro' condeſcenſion, ſince, by another, Henry Stafford ſon of the deceaſed was reſtored to his eſtate and honors (2). A ſtatute was alſo made this parliament, impowering the King to repeal all attainders of high-treaſon, by his letters patent, under the great ſeal (3).

Act of attainder againſt the duke of Buckingham. Herbert.

The King has power to repeal attainders. Herbert.

Theſe were the firſt attempts made in this reign to render the King maſter of the parliament's debates. Cardinal Wolſey was the firſt author, and, unfortunately for the ſubjects, the King too well improved his miniſter's inſtructions. Such favorites as this have but too much cauſe to dread the parliament, and therefore ſtrive to the utmoſt of their power to leſſen its authority, by inlarging that of the Sovereign who ſupports them: but all to very little purpoſe; very few fail at laſt of falling into the hands of that authority they have indeavored to deſtroy. Wolſey is one of thoſe who have the moſt openly abuſed their favor, not only againſt the nation's, but alſo the King's intereſt, which was much leſs dear to him than his own. He was never ſatiated either with wealth or dignities. The twenty-fourth of March, this year, he procured for himſelf the biſhoprick of Durham, one of the richeſt in the kingdom, in lieu of Bath and Wells, which he willingly reſigned in exchange. Two months after, Adrian VI prolonged his legateſhip for five years, after the expiration of the term granted by Leo X. Thus eſtates and honors were inceſſantly heaped upon him, tho' all without any poſſibility of ſatisfying his voracioufneſs. Indeed, he carried his deſires much higher, ſince he ſtill aſpired to the Papacy, Adrian's age and infirmities giving occaſion to think his Pontificate could not be of any long continuance. He ſtill expected to be raiſed to that high dignity by the Emperor's means, and therefore forgot nothing to preſerve his favor. To this doubtleſs muſt be aſcribed the honorable reception given this year to Chriſtiern King of Denmark and Sweden, who had eſpouſed the Emperor's ſiſter. This Prince having, by his cruelties, rendered himſelf odious to his ſubjects, and for that reaſon been expeled his dominions, arrived in England about mid-ſummer with his Queen, and was received as a King unjuſtly oppreſſed, and not like one who had by his barbarities drawn his misfortunes upon himſelf. Henry was not contented to do him all poſſible honor, but moreover renewed with him the treaty of alliance between England and Denmark, as if that Prince had ſtill been in poſſeſſion of his dominions.

Such fruit proceeded from the ſelfiſh counſels of cardinal Wolſey, who never regarded either honor or juſtice in gratifying his paſſions. He expected all things from the Emperor, and therefore imployed his utmoſt efforts to increaſe that Monarch's power, that he might be better able to perform his promiſe. It was not the cardinal's fault that France was not utterly ruined: at leaſt he, this year, in conjunction with the Emperor, formed projects tending to the intire diſſolution of that ancient monarchy.

Tho', by the treaty of Bruges, ratified by the Emperor and Henry at Windſor, they were not to enter France 'till 1524, a certain occaſion which offered making them take other meaſures, they reſolved to anticipate their expedition, and invade King Francis from three different quarters. Charles was to have a powerful army on the frontiers of Spain, to re-poſſeſs himſelf of Fontarabia and Bayona. Henry was to imploy his forces in Picardy, jointly with thoſe of the Netherlands, and conſtable de Bourbon, who had ſuffered himſelf to be corrupted by the Emperor (or, poſſibly, it was his own voluntary offer) was to make an inroad into Burgundy. As moſt of the inſuing years events turn upon that Prince's diſguſt, it will not be amiſs ſuccinctly to touch on the reaſons.

Project againſt France founded on the conſtable of Bourbon's rebellion. P. Daniel. Herbert. Stow.

The duke of Bourbon, Prince of the blood royal of France, had received the conſtable's ſword ever ſince the firſt year of Francis I. He had all the qualifications requiſite for that elevated dignity: nay, perhaps he had too much merit, ſince, if we may believe Mezerai, Louiſa of Savoy, mother to Francis, wiſhed to have him for her huſband; but, as he feigned not to underſtand her meaning, he made her his irreconcileable enemy. But afterwards, by the liberal motion of ſome, particularly of ſir John Huſe a knight of Lincolnſhire, thoſe of fifty pounds a year and upwards were induced to give one ſhilling more for three years to come, which at length being continued to the fourth year, and extended to thoſe who were worth five pounds in goods, was all could be obtained. time, time, he perpetually received mortifications from the King, over whom the ducheſs his mother had by far too much aſcendency. The firſt affront mentioned in hiſtory, was when, in 1521, the King commanding the army in perſon, gave the conduct of the van to the duke of Alenſon, contrary to the prerogative annexed to the office of conſtable. But this was nothing in compariſon of another, which however is related in the hiſtory of France only on uncertain reports. The King, telling the conſtable, he ſhould be glad to marry him to the ducheſs his mother, received a reply ſo injurious to the ducheſs (1), that Francis ſtruck him on the face. This fact is not perhaps ſufficiently atteſted; however, it is certain the ducheſs's affection for the conſtable turned to hatred. From thenceforwards he was looked on with a very evil eye at court, and no more truſted with the command of the King's armies. This was ſufficient to give him great diſguſt: but his female adverſary, not being ſatisfied with theſe mortifications, which ſeemed to her too ſlight a revenge for her contemned love, commenced againſt him a ſuit for his whole eſtate. The cauſe was naturally to be tried by the parliament of Paris; but the ducheſs put it into the hands of the chancellor and ſome other commiſſioners, her creatures, which convinced the conſtable that his ruin was determined: ſo, perceiving no way to avoid ſo fatal a blow, his deſpair cauſed him to throw himſelf into the Emperor's arms. A certain Flemiſh nobleman was the manager of this negociation, wherein the King of England interpoſed, as being equally concerned with the Emperor to create troubles in France. It is difficult to know preciſely when this negociation began; but, in Rymer's collection of public acts, we find the treaty was advanced the ſeventeenth of May 1523. We ſee there Henry's commiſſion to Richard Sampſon and Richard Jerningham, to treat with the duke of Bourbon (2) in order to draw him into the league. This commiſſion impowered the envoys alſo to receive of the ſame Prince a promiſe or ingagement to acknowledge Henry for King of France, to do him homage and ſwear fealty to him. It cannot be hence infered that the conſtable entered into any ſuch ingagement, but only that Henry intended to draw him into it. However this be, by the treaty made by Bourbon with the two Monarchs, he was, after the conqueſt of France, to have for his part Provence, to be erected into a Kingdom, and was to marry Leonora the Emperor's ſiſter, widow of Don Manoel King of Portugal (3). The duke was to bring into the field a good army compoſed of his friends and vaſſals, to whom the Emperor promiſed to join ſeven or eight thouſand men. This army was to act in the heart of France, while the Emperor and Henry invaded Bearn and Picardy.

Mean while Francis I, ignorant of the deſigns of his adverſaries, was wholly buſied in preparing to recover the duchy of Milan, where he intended to command his army in perſon. He haſtened his preparations the more, becauſe the Venetians were ſtrongly ſollicited to join with his enemies, on pretenſe that he amuſed them with the vain hopes of ſoon ſeeing him in Italy with a powerful army: but, notwithſtanding all his diligence, he could not poſſibly fend off that blow. The Venetians, ſeeing no French army arrive, and dreading to be expoſed to the Emperor's indignation, entered at laſt into the league againſt France, about the end of July.

The Venetians declare againſt him.

On the other hand, Pope Adrian VI, labored with all his power to procure a truce between the Chriſtian Princes, fancying, after that, there would be no difficulty to unite them together in a war againſt the Turks. But as his genius was mean, and very different from that of Leo X, and Julius II his predeceſſors, inſtead of making the Princes ſubſervient to his deſigns, he was himſelf, without knowing it, inſtrumental to thoſe of others. The Emperor let him know, that he heartily deſired the truce in queſtion, but intimated the neceſſity of its being of ſome conſiderable length, that the parties might reap the intended advantage. He thereby laid an invincible obſtacle in the way, becauſe the King of France, being lately diſpoſſeſſed of the duchy of Milan, would never hearken to a long truce, which would afford his enemies time to ſecure their conqueſt. That Monarch's oppoſition gave the Emperor and King of England occaſion to ingage the Pope to proceed farther, by hinting to him, that, after the example of ſome of his predeceſſors, he ſhould exert his apoſtolic power, which no Chriſtian Prince ſhould preſume directly to oppoſe. Pleaſed with theſe hopes, Adrian publiſhed a bull, dated the thirtieth of April, injoining, by virtue of that power commited to him by God, a three years truce between all Chriſtian Princes, under pain of excommunication and interdict againſt thoſe who ſhould refuſe to obſerve it. But the King of France, diſregarding ſuch a truce, continued his preparations for the Milan expedition, and ordered his troops to march towards Italy. It was hereupon inſinuated to Adrian, that Francis alone, by his obſtinacy and diſobedience, prevented the Chriſtians from uniting their forces againſt the Infidels. By theſe ſecret practiſes, the good Pontif was gradually brought to conclude a league againſt France with the Emperor, the King of England, Ferdinand archduke of Auſtria the Emperor's brother, the duke of Milan, the Genoueſes and the Florentines. This league was ſigned the third of Auguſt, a few days after the Venetians had deſerted France.

Italy, by this league, ſeemed effectually ſecured from all invaſions: and in reality Proſpero Colonna, who commanded in Milan, ſo little expected to be attacked, that he quite neglected taking the meaſures neceſſary for defenſe of that duchy. Mean while, Francis purſued his project, and the more, as he heard there were no preparations at Milan. The Emperor ſeemed wholly to neglect the defenſe of that ſtate, on purpoſe to draw Francis into Italy, reckoning that his abſenſe would promote the duke of Bourbon's deſigns: nay, it is ſaid, that to induce Francis to abſent himſelf from his kingdom, Henry had cauſed him to be privately told, there was no danger from him that year in Picardy.

Francis is induced by the affected negligence of his enemies to paſs into Italy.

Affairs being in this ſituation, Francis departed for Lyons, in order to paſs into Italy. Mean while, the Emperor was preparing forces in Spain to beſiege Fontarabia and Bayona: but this army was levied very deliberately, becauſe it was not to act 'till Francis was ingaged in the Milan war. On the other ſide, count de Bure, his general in Flanders, remained quiet, waiting to join the Engliſh, who, the better to deceive the King of France, were not to land at Calais before the cloſe of September. Finally, the Emperor ordered eight thouſand Landſquenets to march in ſmall diviſions into Franche Comté, who were to join the duke of Bourbon as ſoon as he was ready. On that Prince's revolt it was that the confederates grounded all their hopes, imagining that Francis being in Italy, France thus unexpectedly invaded in ſo many places at once, would make no great reſiſtance: and theſe hopes ſeeemed to have the better foundation, as Francis not having the leaſt intelligence of the duke of Bourbon's projects, had no troops at all in Burgundy, few in Guienne and Bearn, and Picardy in but a defenſeleſs condition.

The conſtable feigns ſickneſs at Moulins.

Mean while, the conſtable, to avoid being obliged to attend Francis, pretended to be ſick at Moulins: but while that Monarch was on the road to Lyons, two of the conſtable's domeſtics gave him information that their maſter held private correſpondence with the Emperor. Surpriſed at the news, he turned out of his way and went to Moulins, where he told the duke, who ſtill feigned himſelf indiſpoſed, what had been to him diſcovered. Bourbon frankly acknowledged, that the Emperor had founded him by count de Rœux, but affirmed that he had refuſed liſtening to his propoſals: that he deſigned therewith to acquaint his Majeſty, but being prevented by his illneſs from coming to court, he could not venture to truſt any with the ſecret. Whether Francis gave credit to the conſtable's aſſertions, or thought he could not with ſafety arreſt him in his own territories, he was contented with ordering him ſpeedily to follow him to Lyons. Bourbon did in reality ſet out as if he intended to follow the King, being carried in a litter, on pretenſe of his indiſpoſition, and traveling by very eaſy journies: but on notice that two of his confidents were arreſted at court, he privately withdrew from his attendants, and, taking with him only Pomperan, one of his gentlemen, he eſcaped through by-ways, and got ſafe into Germany *.

The conſtable's flight convincing Francis that ſome grand conſpiracy was hatching in France, to be executed during his abſenſe, he relinquiſhed his deſign of going to Italy, and contented himſelf with ſending his army (1) under command of admiral Bonnivet, who paſſed the Alps about the end of Auguſt or begining of September. Near the ſame time, Charles aſſembled his army in Spain, the Landſquenets arrived in Franche Comté, and the Engliſh landed at Calais, to act in Picardy in conjunction with the Flemings. It will be abſolutely neceſſary, briefly to recount what paſſed during this campain in thoſe four different quarters.

The caſtle of Milan, where Lautrec had left a gariſon, ſurrendered the fourteenth of April. So the French had no place of importance in the Milaneſe, except the caſtle of Cremona, which alſo was ſo cloſely blocked up that there was no likelihood of its holding out much longer. On the other hand, as France could expect no farther aſſiſtance from the Venetians, and as all the reſt of Italy was joined in a league againſt her, Proſpero Colonna who commanded in Milan, doubted not of Francis's deſiſting from his deſign of carrying war into the Milaneſe. For that reaſon, he had neglected repairing the fortifications of the capital city; which were in a very indifferent condition, the ramparts being fallen down in ſeveral places. However, on intelligence that admiral Bonnivet was on the point of paſſing the Alps, he drew together all his forces to try to defend the paſſage of the Teſin: but he came too late; the French made ſuch ſpeed, that he was conſtrained, in the utmoſt diſorder, to haſten away to Milan: nay, he had even determined on abandoning that capital, had not the enemy, by a moſt unaccountable negligence, afforded him ſome days time to repair the works. He had only fifteen thouſand men, with which he could not expect to defend, againſt an army more than forty thouſand ſtrong, ſo ſpacious a city, which alſo was open in ſeveral places. However, as long experience had taught him, that enemies are not always to be ſuppoſed to do what is moſt for their advantage, he never ceaſed repairing the places which moſt wanted it, deeming he could but withdraw at laſt in caſe the French were as expeditious as they ought to have been. Had Bonnivet marched directly to Milan, he would have found the gates open: but, after taking Novara and Vigerano, and paſſing the Teſin without oppoſition, he prepoſterouſly imagined a few days more or leſs would not be of much conſequence: ſo, having loſt to no purpoſe four or five days, he gave the Emperor's general time to put Milan in a poſture of defenſe. At length, when too late, approaching the city, he found it, by the good management of Colonna, in a condition of bidding defiance to all inſults: whereupon he reſolved to incamp at Chiaravalla, in hopes of being able to cut off all acceſs of proviſions to Milan, and of having by that means the whole Imperial army at his mercy; but, ſo ill did he take his meaſures that, after perſiſting in his deſign 'till the end of November, he was himſelf obliged to remove from Milan for want of proviſions. All he did during that time was to relieve the caſtle of Cremona, reduced to the laſt extremities (2). Such was the ſucceſs of Bonnivet's campain, which might have been more glorious for him, and more advantageous for the King his Sovereign, had he taken juſter meaſures, and improved his ſuperiority. Colonna died ſoon after, and Lanoy, viceroy of Naples, ſucceeded him in his poſt of general. The ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, that nothing remarkable paſſed in thoſe parts 'till the year's end, when Bourbon arrived and took command of the Imperial army, not without great diſguſt of Lanoy, who unwillingly reſigned his poſt to a foreigner.

The confederates, as I hinted, were determined on not invading France 'till September, becauſe it might be preſumed Francis would then be imployed in Italy. For this reaſon, it was the begining of that month before the Emperor aſſembled his army in Spain. Lautrec, who commanded in Guienne, hearing the Spaniards were drawing together, haſtened to the frontiers to provide for the defenſe of Bayona and Fontarabia, which were moſt expoſed. Frauget, a commander of good note, was governor of Fontarabia, having been left there the laſt year by marſhal de Chabanes. Lautrec, relying on Frauget's bravery and experience, left him in the ſame poſt, after having re-inforced the gariſon, and laid in ſome ammunition; after which he queſtioned not the place would be able to maintain a long ſiege: theſe precautions being taken, with regard to Fontarabia, he repaired to Bayona. He was no ſooner arrived, than the Spaniſh army appeared before the walls, ſupported by a fleet, which threw the inhabitants into great conſternation, the town being weak towards the ſea: but Lautrec ſo managed that the Spaniards were diſappointed, tho' they had expected to carry the place without oppoſition. Perceiving therefore that the ſiege would imploy them too long, they ſuddenly raiſed it, and inveſted Fontarabia, which in a few days was baſely ſurrendered by Frauget. He was like to have loſt his head for a fault of that conſequence: but tho' he preſerved his life, he ſaved not his honor, being ſhamefully degraded.

Tho' this project ſeemed to be fruſtrated by Bourbon's flight, De Furſtemberg however entered Champagne with his army. He immediately reduced Coiffy and Monteclair, ſmall places which made no great reſiſtance: but the duke of Guiſe, who commanded in that province, knowing that De Furſtemberg had no cavalry, aſſembled all the nobility of thoſe quarters, and, forming ſome ſquadrons, warmly purſued the Germans. De Furſtemberg, finding himſelf not very ſtrong, and in the heart of an enemy's country, and withal not having any cavalry to oppoſe Guiſe's, determined on retiring to Lorrain. He could not however make his retreat without receiving a terrible check near Neufchâtel, where the duke of Guiſe defeated the beſt part of his troops.

Campain in Picardy, where the Imperialiſts and Engliſh make no great progreſs. Du Bellay. P. Daniel. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

While the war was proſecuted in Italy, Bearn and Champagne, Henry imbarked his army under conduct of the duke of Suffolk (1) who, landing at Calais, joined count de Bure, the twentieth of September. Theſe two bodies compoſed an army of between twenty-five and thirty thouſand foot, and about ſix thouſand horſe. The duke de la Trimouille, who commanded in that country, was ſo inferior in number of troops, that he durſt not keep the field: all he could do, was to throw ſuccors into the places moſt expoſed, and ſpeedily inform the King of what paſſed in thoſe parts. Francis I, being then at Lyons, was extremely imbaraſſed to withſtand ſo many unexpected invaſions. It is reported that, deceived by falſe advices from England, he had been in hopes Picardy for this year would be unmoleſted, and yet he ſaw it was there his enemies intended to make their greateſt effort. In this perplexity, he inſtantly diſpatched the duke of Vendoſme, with all the troops he could aſſemble, both to defend Picardy and quiet Paris, which he doubted not was in no ſmall alarm. Indeed, the duke of Suffolk and count de Bure, paſſing by Terouenne, Heſdin and Dourlens, had taken Roye and Montidier, and were advanced as far as Corbie: but the news of Vendoſme's march, rendering them more circumſpect, they thought proper to proceed no farther, and the rather becauſe the weather began to be very incommodious, and they were apprehenſive of being ſhut in between Vendoſme and La Trimouille; which conſiderations induced them to think of retreating. In their return, they became maſters of Buchain, whoſe governor brought them the keys, tho' they had no thoughts of attacking the place. Then leaving a gariſon of Engliſh in Buchain, they retired into Artois: but the French preſently after recovered that town. Thus the progreſs of the confederate army was not ſo great as Francis had at firſt cauſe to apprehend. Indeed, had the army taken the field ſooner, he would have been greatly imbaraſſed: but, as I obſerved, the hopes Charles and the King of England had conceived of Bourbon's ſchemes, was the reaſon why they opened not the campain in any place 'till towards the cloſe of September.

Death of Adrian VI. Guicciard.

When Adrian VI acceded to the league, he had no deſign to ruin France, in order to force Francis to a war againſt the Turks, but he had been told, it would be a certain means to oblige that Prince to conſent to the truce: mean while, without Adrian's having thereof any knowledge, the Emperor and Henry had combined to invade France, and divide it between them. Probably, had he ſurvived the end of this year, he would have ſeen that their deſigns correſponded not with his; but he died about ſix weeks after ſigning the league againſt France. He was a good man, of a character very different from thoſe of his predeceſſors. Inſtead of thinking to inlarge the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate by unjuſt confiſcations, he had given the duke of Urbino the inveſtiture of his duchy. He had done the like by the duke of Ferrara, knowing that the former Popes had quarreled with thoſe Princes purely to gratify their deſire of inriching their own relations. He would have even reſtored Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, had he not been prevented by the clamors of his council, who could not comprehend that juſtice ought to be the foundation of policy. He thought likewiſe of reforming the Roman court, but death ſuffered him not to execute that worthy deſign. Such a procedure, ſo very remote from that of thoſe who immediately preceded him in the Potificate, who had inured their courtiers and people of Italy to ſee Popes purſuing the looſe maxims of temporal Princes, occaſioned its being ſaid of him; "That he was indeed a "very honeſt man, and a good Chriſtian, but a "very indifferent Pope." Accordingly the Italian writers ſpeak of Adrian VI in terms not importing for him any extraordinary eſteem.

Julio di Medicis prime miniſter to Adrian VI.

The begining of this year, cardinal Julio di Medicis who, on Leo X's deceaſe, had retired to Florence, returned to Rome, where he had a good reception. In a ſhort time, he ſo far ingratiated himſelf with Pope Adrian, that he ſupplanted the cardinal of Volterra, his ſaid Sanctity's prime miniſter, and got him ſhut up in caſtle St. Angelo. From thence forward he had the ſole management of the Pontif's affairs, gaining more and more his eſteem by acting the devout, and expreſſing a great zeal to unite all Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turk. By this artifice he led him to publiſh the bull for a triennial truce, and at length to ſign the league againſt France. A miniſter of this ſtamp was doubtleſs too politic for ſuch a Pope. Adrian VI died the fourteenth of September, juſt as the allies began to put themſelves in motion. Had he ſurvived, he would undoubtedly have been convinced, that nothing could poſſibly be leſs proper to procure that union he ſo ardently deſired among the Chriſtian Princes, than that league wherein he had ſo inconſiderately ingaged.

Next day he again wrote, intreating his recommendation to the Emperor, by a letter under his own hand. He flattered himſelf that Charles would have a grateful ſenſe of his late ſervice, in cauſing the King his maſter to declare againſt France, and would now at leaſt keep his word with him, ſince he had no preceptor to be elected, as in the former conclave: but, if the Italian hiſtorians are to be credited, Charles little thought of procuring him the Papacy, and much leſs the conclave, who met preſently after Adrian's deceaſe. Of the thirty-nine cardinals there aſſembled, Julio di Medicis had fifteen or ſixteen at his devotion, beſide three who had promiſed not to be againſt him if he was like to ſucceed in the conclave; ſo that he had only ſeven or eight to gain, in order to have two thirds of the voices: but this was no eaſy matter. Cardinal Colonna, his competitor, was at the head of a much more numerous party, who would have infallibly carried it, if the cardinals of that faction could have as readily united in chuſing a Pope, as in preventing the election of Julio: this made the conclave hold fifty days. As for Wolſey, if he had any cardinals for him, they could not be many, ſince he had againſt him the French party, and the Emperor's adherents were the ſame with thoſe of Julio di Medicis. In ſhort, Colonna's faction not agreeing on the choice of a Pontif, becauſe their chief would have one elected diſagreeable to his friends, his indignation at their obſtinacy induced him to be reconciled with cardinal di Medicis. Guicciardini ſays, Julio gave him a promiſe, under his hand, to make him his vice-chancellor, and preſent him with his palace, one of the moſt magnificent in Rome. Howſoever this was, Colonna giving him ſeven or eight votes which were at his diſpoſal, there was no farther obſtacle to his election. It being reported in the conclave, that cardinal di Medicis would be elected the next ſcrutiny, moſt of the cardinals ſtayed not 'till day appeared, but went and made their court to the perſon who was ſoon to be their maſter. Their example drew in the reſt who, finding it not in their power to hinder the election, were willing alſo to ſhew they freely concurred: ſo, that very night, between the eighteenth and nineteenth of November, all the cardinals went and paid obeiſance to the new Pope, and next morning his election was confirmed by a ſolemn ſcrutiny, wherein he had all the voices. Thus it is that the Holy Ghoſt influenced the cardinals in the choice of a Pontif, who, contrary to their intention, was to be the cauſe of the Roman church's receiving the deepeſt wound ſhe had ever met with. The new Pope aſſumed the name of Clement VII, on account of St. Clement's day, which was to be very ſhortly ſolemniſed. He was natural ſon of Juliano di Medicis, Leo X's uncle: but this defect in birth, tho' contrary to the canons, was not conſidered. Leo X, who made him cardinal in the begining of his Pontificate, took care to have it legally atteſted, that Juliano promiſed his mother marriage; ſo, taking for granted that a bare promiſe was equivalent to real matrimony, he declared Julio legitimate. Alexander VI took the ſame courſe, when he made Cæſar Borgia his baſtard ſon cardinal: he produced witneſſes who depoſed, that Cæſar was born of a married woman; whence it was infered the child was to be deemed the huſband's ſon. In this manner did the vicars of Jeſus Chriſt abuſe laws divine and human to gratify their paſſions.

Wolſey conceals his diſguſt.

The news of Clement's election was a great mortification to Wolſey, who, ſince the promotion of Adrian VI, had expected to be Pope on the firſt vacancy. He muſt have been extremely incenſed with the Emperor, who had twice deceived him; wherefore it may be affirmed that, conſidering his vindictive temper, he reſolved from that moment to be revenged: but as he could not execute this reſolution without his maſter's aſſiſtance, he was to take care that he acted not from a motive of revenge; otherwiſe he would have run the hazard of being diſappointed. He concealed therefore, under the maſk of a feigned moderation, the reſentment he harbored in his breaſt, and contented himſelf with telling the King, that ſeveral had voted for him in the conclave, but his abſenſe had turned to his prejudice, and the ſituation of the affairs of Italy cauſed the cardinals to chuſe Julio di Medicis. A few days after, the King's embaſſador at Rome had orders to notify to the new Pope the King's and Wolſey's joy at his promotion. At the ſame time, Wolſey deſired the continuance of his legateſhip, affirming, that, by reaſon of the King's prerogative, it was not worth to him a thouſand ducats annually. Clement VII was abſolutely in the Emperor's intereſt, and knowing of what conſequence the King of England's aid was at the preſent juncture of affairs in Europe, gladly imbraced this opportunity to gratify cardinal Wolſey, and make him his friend, by whoſe means he might gain the favor of his royal maſter: in this diſpoſition he granted the cardinal more than he deſired. By a bull of the ninth of January 1524, he gave him the legatine power for life. This is the firſt, and perhaps the only inſtance of a perpetual legateſhip.

Clement grants it for life. Herbert. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 18.

Wolſey was now raiſed to the higheſt point of grandure a ſubject can aſpire to. He was archbiſhop of York, biſhop of Durham, abbot of St. Albans, cardinal, legate a latere for life, lord chancellor of England, prime miniſter and favorite, careſſed by the Emperor, reſpected by the Pope, regarded by all the Princes of Europe, with almoſt abſolute power in England, where nothing material was tranſacted, either in ſpirituals or temporals, but by his ſole direction. It is eaſy to comprehend ſo many advantages were but too capable of rendering him proud and inſolent. He looked on the King's ſubjects as ſlaves, and, unfortunately for them, gradually inſpired his Sovereign with the ſame principles, and inſinuated to him, that he ought to conſider parliaments only as inſtruments to execute his will. Theſe inſinuations were but too effectual, as will appear in the ſequel. In order to render him independent of the parliament, he perſuaded Henry to exact from his ſubjects (1) at once, the ſubſidy given by parliament, and payable in four years. Every one aſcribed to the cardinal this illegal procedure, which eſtabliſhed a very dangerous precedent: but he little regarded popular complaints, ſince he was ſecure of the King's countenance, and the protection of the Roman court.

He cauſes the ſubſidy payable in four years to be paid at once. Herbert. Hall. Stow.

He alſo, this very year, undertook a thing he would never have ventured on, had he not been fully ſatisfied that the Pope could not be without King Henry's aſſiſtance: and that was, to cauſe ſeveral religious houſes to be ſuppreſſed, to appropriate the revenues to two colleges, which he intended to found at Oxford and Ipſwich. Had the Pope reaped any advantage, his conſent would not have been very ſtrange: but that he ſhould agree to the ſuppreſſion of ſeveral monaſteries, to gratify a private man, is what could ſcarcely be expected, and perhaps had never happened; and conſequently the Pontif would never have concurred, had not ſatiſfying the paſſion of this ambitious miniſter been abſolutely neceſſary to his deſigns. The cardinal's project was to found a magnificent college, at Oxford, by the name of Cardinal-college, which was to conſiſt of one hundred eighty-ſix perſons, with ſalaries. The other college was to be founded at Ipſwich, the place of his birth, but only for Grammar, and to qualify young ſtudents for his college at Oxford: but as theſe projects were not accompliſhed this year, I ſhall ſpeak of them on another occaſion, and cloſe the year 1523 with a brief account of what paſſed in Scotland, where affairs were no more undiſturbed than elſewhere.

on the frontiers. On the other hand, the King of Scotland's minority frequently tempted him to poſſeſs himſelf of that kingdom, after the example of Edward III his predeceſſor, who diſpoſſeſſed the King his nephew at a like juncture. The factions in Scotland increaſing his hopes, he never ceaſed to foment them by means of his adherents, who were very numerous, becauſe he had wherewithal to give penſions. He uſed for pretext, his being by nature obliged to be mindful of what concerned the King his nephew, who was not of age to diſtinguiſh what was advantageous from what was prejudicial. Wherefore, as a moſt affectionate uncle, he did his indeavor to remove the duke of Albany, under color of the Scotiſh crown's manifeſt danger of being ſeized by that Prince. He knew he ſhould never accompliſh his deſigns ſo long as Scotland was guarded by ſuch an Argus. The Queen his ſiſter had made him very uneaſy in joining with the regent, becauſe he was thereby deprived of all pretext of alledging the King to be in danger: nor indeed was it likely, as the Scotiſh parliament wiſely intimated in their anſwer, that the Queen ſhould join with the regent to deſtroy the King her ſon. Henry however, to give ſome color to this accuſation, was pleaſed to ſuppoſe that the Queen his ſiſter deſigned to marry the duke of Albany: but at length finding this ſuppoſition not to have the expected effect, he had recourſe to another expedient, which was to gain his ſiſter, by promiſing to procure her the regency. That done, he preſſed yet more earneſtly the parliament of Scotland to remove the duke of Albany, and confer the regency on the Queen: but, to render his inſtances more effectual, he reſolved to imploy his beſt indeavors to prevent the duke's return to Scotland. To that end, he ſent out a fleet to intercept him in his paſſage (1). At the ſame time he ordered the earl of Surrey to march into Scotland (2), to ſhew the Scots what they were to expect in caſe they did not give him ſpeedy ſatisfaction. The Scots, being without a leader, and unprepared againſt this invaſion, ſuſtained great damages during the campain. The earl of Surrey took Jedworth, and carried fire and ſword into the country, without meeting any oppoſition. Mean while, Henry's adherents ceaſed not to cry, that a peace muſt be made with England, ſince it was the ſole means could ſave Scotland from utter deſtruction. Henry ſupported them, by offering to the King his nephew his only daughter Mary in marriage, and magnifying the advantages the Scots would receive from this alliance: but withal he required of them, that they ſhould break all their ingagements with France. It was however very unlikely, he ſhould ſeriouſly think of giving his daughter to the Scotiſh King, ſince ſhe was affianced to the Emperor, and he himſelf in ſtrict union with that Monarch: beſide, ſuch a marriage would have been of no advantage to himſelf or the nation. To this the oppoſite party replied, "The King of England fought "to diſingage Scotland from France, only the "more eaſily to ruin the kingdom, and that to "make alliance with England by abandoning "France was the ready way to become ſlaves to "the Engliſh; That this was not the firſt time "the Kings of England, by ſuch marriages, had "attempted to poſſeſs themſelves of Scotland, and "the worſt was to be feared from neighbors who "had ever aſpired to the dominion of all Great-"Britain. Finally, that deſtroying with fire and "ſword a country whoſe friendſhip was courted, "was a ſtrange way of ſeeking alliances and pro-"poſing marriages." Theſe reaſons failed not being replied to by the adverſe party; but it all tended only ſo to augment diſorder and confuſion among the Scots, that it was quite impracticable to bring them to any reſolution. However Henry, who only deſigned to terrify the Scots, by making them feel the force of his arms, ordered the earl of Surrey to quit their country and return to England: but he had ſcarce ſent his men into winter quarters, when the Scots made inroads on the Engliſh borders, which obliged him to march a ſecond time into Scotland, where he made himſelf maſter of Jedburrough.

The Engliſh army retire. Buchanan.

Mean time, the duke of Albany, underſtanding what paſſed in Scotland, ardently longed to be there, by his preſenſe to appeaſe the troubles cauſed by the King of England's partiſans, and to ſtrengthen the French faction, which was in danger of being cruſhed by the adverſe party. Francis I, had granted him a ſuccor of three thouſand foot and two hundred men at arms, to inable him to make a diverſion upon Henry from that quarter: but there was no poſſibility of tranſporting theſe troops into Scotland, while the Engliſh fleet kept the ſea to interrupt their paſſage. He muſt therefore have recourſe to ſtratagem. For that purpoſe, he feigned to deſiſt from his deſign of paſſing over to Scotland, and ſent his troops into quarters remote from the coaſt, with orders to be in a readineſs on the ſhorteſt warning. The tranſport-veſſels were alſo ſent away to certain ports, whence they were ordered to ſail to the appointed rendezvous the moment they heard from the duke. This politic procedure deceived the Engliſh admiral, who being, by his ſpies informed, that the duke of Albany was returned to court, and had diſmiſſed his troops and ſhipping, concluded there was nothing more to apprehend this year, and ſo returned with the fleet into England. Of this he had no ſooner got notice, but he re-aſſembled his forces and tranſports, and imbarking, about the middle of September, arrived in Scotland the twenty-fourth, the ſame day the earl of Surrey entered Jedburrough.

The regent's arrival revived the ſpirits of the whole French party, who began to be greatly diſmayed, and drew from the King of England ſeveral perſons who had only favored him thro' fear. Some time after, the regent ſummoned the nobility to Edinburg, and indeavored to convince them, that the kingdom would be in great danger, except the King of England's deſigns were timely and vigorouſly oppoſed: but his eloquence ſufficed not to create a change of opinion in thoſe who prefered Henry's penſions to all the arguments could be alledged. However he got together a body of forces, and advanced towards the borders, where he arrived the twenty-ſecond of October: but when he would have purſued his march into England, he met with the ſame obſtacles which made him ſtop ſhort the preceding year, viz. the officers of Henry's faction refuſed to follow him, maintaining, it was manifeſtly againſt the intereſt of Scotland to provoke the Engliſh, and therefore it was ſufficient to remain on the defenſive: adding, that if the deſign was to ſerve France, it could not be done better than by keeping an army on the frontiers, which would oblige the Engliſh to have the like in thoſe parts: but, in the preſent circumſtances of Scotland, it was too much to hazard a battle, the loſs whereof would

In ſhort, the regent, perceiving it was in vain to attempt perſuading them to follow him, ordered Werk caſtle to be aſſaulted by the French troops; but they were vigorouſly repulſed. Mean while, on notice of the earl of Surrey's approach at the head of a numerous army, he judged it not proper to expect him, but choſe to retire. In reality, it would have been too hazardous to give battle with an army wherein the Engliſh had ſo many favorers. The ſeaſon being no longer proper for one or other to keep the field, the earl of Surrey, content with having put a ſtop to the Scots progreſs, diſmiſſed his troops into winter quarters, and the regent followed his example.

While the flames of war were kindled in almoſt all parts of Europe, the reformation gained ground very conſiderably in Germany, and began even to ſpread in Swiſſerland, France, and England. In the begining of this year, the canton of Zurich, moved by the preaching of Zuinglius, renounced diverſe articles of religion they had hitherto profeſſed, tho' Zuinglius and Luther differed about the Euchariſt (1). Many likewiſe in France and England began to diſlike a religion ſeemingly founded more on the Pope than on Jeſus Chriſt. Adrian VI, hearing of the daily progreſs of Luther's doctrine in Germany, diſpatched a nuncio to the diet of Nuremburg, to exhort the German Princes to deſtroy Luther and his followers. He confeſſed, however, in a letter to them on the ſame ſubject, that many abuſes and diſorders were introduced into the church, throwing the blame on thoſe who had governed it before him: but, to reform all at once, he ſaid, would be the way to ſpoil all, and therefore it was neceſſary to proceed in this reformation by degrees. Luther having got a copy of this letter, publiſhed it in the German tongue, with annotations of his own, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, "That "the DEGREES his Sanctity ſpoke of were ſo large, "that there was a hundred years interval between "each of them." On the other hand, the diet, taking advantage of Adrian's frank confeſſion, demanded a free council in Germany, where every one ſhould be obliged upon oath to utter his real ſentiments, and that thoſe numberleſs abuſes, under which Germany had ſo long groaned, ſhould be reformed.

Progreſs of the reformation. Sleidan.

Mean while, Luther ſtill continued to write in defenſe of his doctrine. Among other things, he publiſhed a reply to the King of England's book, wherein he uſed very little ceremony. This procedure of his induced Henry to complain of him to the Princes of the houſe of Saxony: and, at the ſame time, he exhorted them to hinder the publication of Luther's German Bible, leſt the tranſlation ſhould contain what might prejudice the truth: but his letter had no great effect.

An' 1524. The progreſs of the reformation was not yet conſiderable enough to be much regarded by the chief Sovereigns of Europe, whoſe thoughts were wholly intent on war. Clement VII refuſed to renew the league, tho' himſelf had ingaged his predeceſſor in it, and declared he would obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. This declaration at firſt greatly perplexed Bourbon, ſince, as the Emperor had not provided for the payment of his troops, it was not poſſible for the duke to ſatisfy them, the Pope and Florentines having diſcontinued their uſual ſubſidies. He however found means to draw ſome money from the inhabitants of Milan, and at length prevailed on Pope Clement to ſupply twenty thouſand ducats, and oblige the Florentines to furniſh him with fifty thouſand, on condition of ſecreſy.

Affairs of Italy. Guicciard. Capella. P. Daniel.

Some time after, the duke of Bourbon receiving a ſupply of ſix thouſand Landſquenets, and the Venetian army, under the duke of Urbino's conduct joining him, he took the field thirty-five thouſand ſtrong. Mean while, Bonnivet was greatly imbaraſſed. He had ſcarce twenty thouſand men, having loſt the reſt of his army, by death or deſertion, during the laſt campain: yet what was ſtill worſe on his ſide, he had no money to pay his troops; but that was a defect equally common to both parties. It is true, he expected ten thouſand Swiſſers, and five thouſand Griſons, but foreſaw they would be of little ſervice, becauſe he had not wherewithal to content them at their arrival: and this made him reſolve to go in queſt of the Imperialiſts and give them battle; but, as they were informed of his condition, they determined, tho' ſuperior in number, to avoid it, in expectation of diſperſing his army without ingaging: and, in effect, the five thouſand Griſons, who were coming to join the admiral, and were advanced as far as Bergamo, not receiving the payment promiſed, inſtantly returned. As for the ten thouſand Swiſſers, they arrived indeed at Jurea, and even advanced to the banks of the Sleſia; but it was not poſſible to prevail on them to purſue their march, for want of money to anſwer their expectations. Mean while, the Imperialiſts poſſeſſed themſelves of ſeveral ſmall towns, which very much annoyed the French camp, and at laſt obliged the admiral to retire to Novara: and while this paſſed, the caſtle of Cremona, thitherto held by the French, ſurrendered to the Imperialiſts.

Henry VIII. An' 1524.

Bonnivet, finding the Griſons were returned; that the Swiſſers would not ſtir without being ſecure of their pay, and that his men deſerted in great numbers, reſolved at length on repaſſing the Alps. No ſooner had the duke of Bourbon notice of his march, but he purſued him expeditiouſly, to attempt forcing him to a battle: there were, even between the two armies, ſeveral ſharp ſkirmiſhes, in one of which fell that gallant officer captain Bayard; but notwithſtanding the purſuers vigorous efforts, Bonnivet retreated in good order. When the French had repaſſed the mountains, the places they ſtill held in the Milaneſe ſurrendered, by capitulation, to the Imperialiſts.

The French loſe the Milaneſe.

The French were no ſooner out of Italy, but the Emperor and King of England began to project how they ſhould invade Francis in his own kingdom. They had expected great matters from the duke of Bourbon's revolt, but hitherto it was not poſſible to make any uſe of it, becauſe their ſcheme had too ſoon taken vent. The affairs of Italy having proſpered beyond expectation, they reſolved to make uſe of the duke of Bourbon to carry war into France; concluding that, if he could gain any conſiderable advantage, he would excite a rebellion in ſome part of the kingdom. The duke himſelf fed them with theſe hopes, becauſe that was what alone made him conſiderable. He would gladly have acted in ſome quarter not too remote from his own eſtates, whence he expected great ſupplies: but it was judged properer that he ſhould enter Provence with an army, by reaſon he could eaſily be aſſiſted by the Spaniſh fleet, which lay at Genoua; whereas, by ingaging in any of the inland provinces the fleet would be of no ſervice. (1) Their differences about Conſubſtantiation much hindered the progreſs of the reformation. And not being able to be compoſed, Zuinglius's party were called Sacramentarians, and Luther's, Ubiquitarians. Calvin ſucceeded Zuinglius, who by his doctrines of predeſtination, &c. ſo widened the breach between the Lutherans and Calviniſts, that they became irreconcilable: inſomuch that the Lutherans at Leipſick, where they are very rigid, have ſet up, in their great church, the picture of Ignatius Loyala, Calvin and the Devil in one frame, with this inſcription, "The three great enemies of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion."

Henry readily promiſed to find the duke a hundred (1) thouſand crowns monthly, on condition that, after the firſt month, he ſhould be free to diſcontinue the payment, provided he himſelf acted in Picardy, at the head of a royal army, from the firſt of July, to the end of December.

Tho' the Emperor had put Bourbon in hopes of lending him his whole army in Italy for the Provence expedition, he could not however diſpenſe with leaving a good part at Milan, and other places of that duchy, under command of Lanoy, viceroy of Naples. On the other hand, the Venetians withdrew their troops, as having, by their private treaty, ingaged only to defend the Milaneſe. For theſe reaſons, June the twenty-fourth, the duke of Bourbon began his march much weaker than he expected (2), and entered Provence the ſecond of July. He preſently became maſter of Aix and ſome other places, and finally ſat down before Marſeilles, the reduction whereof was the chief end of his expedition; but, a few days before, Renzo di Ceri, a noted Italian captain in the French ſervice, had entered with a ſtrong gariſon. This gave Bourbon to underſtand, that he ſhould meet with more reſiſtance than he had imagined; nevertheleſs he opened the ſiege.

Mean while Francis I, having intelligence of Bourbon's march, ordered his forces to be got together, and ſome troops ſent to Avignon, for fear of its being ſeized by the enemy. There he had determined to aſſemble his army, and repaired thither to command in perſon. It is needleſs to expatiate either on the ſiege of Marſeilles, or of the King's extreme diligence in aſſembling his troops: it ſuffices to ſay in a word, that the very day he departed Avignon, in order to fight the Imperialiſts, namely, the tenth of September, the duke raiſed the ſiege of Marſeilles, and retired into Italy. While Francis was at Avignon, he received the news of his Queen's death, who died at Blois, in July.

and compels Bourbon to retire into Italy. Du Bellai. P. Daniel.

The duke of Bourbon's retreat intirely changed the face of affairs. King Francis, who had been in danger of loſing Provence, ſaw himſelf at the head of an army upwards of forty thouſand ſtrong, ready to be imployed in any momentous enterpriſe. So, perceiving that the Imperialiſts took a great compaſs to retire into Italy, he determined on improving that advantage, and the ſuperiority of his army, to recover the Milaneſe. Being thus reſolved, he began his march, and did his utmoſt to reach Milan before them. On the other hand, the duke of Bourbon, having notice that Francis was taking the ſhorteſt cut to Milan, uſed incredible diligence not to be out-marched, being convinced that thereon would abſolutely depend the duchy's preſervation. Thus the two armies, marching by different routs, arrived the ſame day, one at Albe, the other at Vercelli. A few days after, Bourbon joined the viceroy of Naples at Pavia.

Francis marches another way into Italy. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

The two armies arrived on the ſame day.

While the Imperial army was in Provence, the Engliſh court became differently diſpoſed from what it thitherto had been, and ſeemed bent on purſuing new maxims. Henry made no diverſion in Picardy, tho' he had advanced only a month's pay of the ſubſidy he was to allow the duke of Bourbon. This was ſufficient to raiſe in the Emperor ſuſpicions, which were confirmed by Henry's unſeaſonable call for the monies lent him at his departure from England (3). He could not believe that Henry, inſtead of performing his own ingagements, would demand his money at ſo improper a juncture, except he actually ſought occaſion of quarrel. His uneaſineſs ſtill increaſed, on advice from his embaſſador in England, that a perſon was come from France to London, from the ducheſs of Angoulême regent of that kingdom, and had long and frequent conferences with cardinal Wolſey. All this, added to the revengeful diſpoſition of that prelate, whom he had vainly amuſed with hopes of the Papacy, made him juſtly apprehenſive that the King of England meditated abandoning him and joining with his enemy. However, in the preſent ſituation of affairs, there was no other meaſure to take, ſince all depended on the ſucceſs of the war which was going to be renewed in Italy, where his generals were not a little imbaraſſed.

As ſoon as Bourbon and the viceroy of Naples were joined, they conſulted on what was to be done at ſo ill a juncture. At firſt they reſolved to leave ſtrong gariſons in Pavia and Alexandria, and take refuge in Milan: but the peſtilence having made lamentable ravages in that city, all there was in confuſion, and money and proviſions ſo ſcarce, that they were forced to deſiſt from their deſign and abandon Milan. So, having well ſtored Pavia and Alexandria, they withdrew to Soncino, whither they were alſo accompanied by Franceſco Sforza.

Mean while, Francis I, continuing his march towards Milan, and hearing the Imperialiſts were retired, cauſed his troops to enter the city, and ordered the caſtle to be inveſted. If, inſtead of going to Milan, he had marched directly to the Imperial army, little able to withſtand him, he muſt infallibly have diſperſed it: but admiral Bonnivet's unlucky counſels led him not only to Milan (which muſt, of courſe, have been his, had he defeated or routed the Imperialiſts) but alſo to reſolve on beſieging Pavia. When he appeared before that place, the generals of the Imperialiſts began to take courage, in expectation that the length of the ſiege and the winter-ſeaſon would afford them time to take ſome meaſures. Mean while they ſpeedily ſent for a ſupply of ten thouſand Germans. The Pope, Venetians and Florentines failing them all at once, on the French King's coming into Italy, their only refuge was the length of the ſiege of Pavia, which began in November.

Preſently after, Francis detached five or ſix thouſand men, under conduct of the duke of Albany (who had left Scotland early in the ſpring) with orders to march towards Naples. Renzo di Ceri, who defended Marſeilles, having received that Monarch's orders to imbark ten thouſand men on the gallies, and join the duke of Albany, who expected him in Tuſcany, in his way poſſeſſed himſelf of Savona. This ſucceſs, which ſeemed very advantageous for Francis, turned really to his great detriment, as it put him on ſending a freſh detachment to Savona, under conduct of the marquis of Saluzzo, to take againſt Genoua what advantages ſhould offer. The two detachments for Naples and Savona, ſo weakened the French army, that the Imperialiſts no longer dreaded taking the field, in order to protract the ſiege of Pavia 'till the arrival of the German ſuccors, which the duke of Bourbon was gone to haſten: and in effect, within a few days Piſcara became maſter of Caſſano, a poſt very convenient for his purpoſe. With this event ended the year 1524: but, before I proceed to the next, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what had paſſed this year in Scotland.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert. Hall.

The duke of Albany returning to France, in May, the dowager Queen, and earl of Arran of the houſe of Hamilton, counſeled the young King, who was between thirteen and fourteen years old, to aſſume the reins of government. This their counſel was very intereſted, but James was yet too young to diſtinguiſh. He followed it, and, ſummoning the ſtates, declared the authority of the regent was ended, and for the future all orders were to be received from the King himſelf. After that, the Queen and Arran acted all in the King's name. This change met not with a general approbation. The earls of Lenox and Argyle, vexed at heart to ſee Arran in poſſeſſion of the government, under color of the King's anticipated majority, ſent for the earl of Angus from France, to ſupport themſelves by his intereſt, becauſe he was irreconcileably at variance with the Queen his conſort. On the ſaid earl's arrival, they combined with him, and on pretenſe of freeing their Sovereign from the pretended captivity wherein he was ſaid to be held by the Queen and earl of Arran, levied troops and took Sterling; which done, they marched to Edinburgh, where the King was. At their approach, the Queen and Arran conveyed young James into the caſtle; but, as they had not taken care to lay in proviſions they, in few days were conſtrained to deliver him up to the three earls, who aſſumed the title of regents. Thus was James again put in guardianſhip under theſe three regents, who agreed to divide the admimiſtration among themſelves and rule alternately, four months each. HENRY VIII. AN' 1524.

As England was very quiet during the whole year 1524, the affairs of that kingdom will not long detain me. I ſhall only obſerve, that Clement VII, finding himſelf in a very indifferent ſituation between the Emperor and King of France, ſhewed great regard for the court of England, for whoſe aſſiſtance he preſumed he might have occaſion. To that end, he confirmed King Henry's title of " Defender of the Faith," confered on him by Leo X, and, to pleaſe Wolſey, ſuppreſſed St. Frideſwid's priory in Oxford, on the ground whereof the cardinal purpoſed to build his college, and appropriated the revenues to that new foundation. But as this was not ſufficient for the maintenance of the college, his ſaid eminence procured powers to viſit all the religious houſes, notwithſtanding their immunities, and particularly thoſe of the Franciſcans, who pretended exemption. This was to make a regular liſt of ſuch as might be ſuppreſſed, in order to transfer the revenues to his colleges. The bull which gave him theſe powers bears date Auguſt 21. On the eleventh of September following, his Sanctity granted him another bull, impowering him to ſuppreſs what monaſteries he pleaſed, to the yearly value of three thouſand ducats, for the ſame uſe.

Francis I, ſtill perſiſted in this ſiege, tho' without making much progreſs, becauſe of the rigor of the ſeaſon, and the Imperial army which, being poſted at Caſſano, exceedingly annoyed his convoys. Beſide, he had made three detachments, one to beſiege the caſtle of Milan, another for Naples, and a third for Savona. On the other hand, towards the cloſe of January, the duke of Bourbon came from Germany, with a ſupply of ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, which made the Imperial army two and twenty thouſand ſtrong. As the generals wanted money, and for that reaſon were not ſure of hindering the army from diſbanding, they reſolved to attempt the relief of Pavia. To that end, they began to march (February 3) towards the town, reſolving to improve what opportunities ſhould offer: but, as the beſiegers camp was ſtrongly intrenched, they waited three weeks before they executed ſo dangerous a reſolution, which might be attended with terrible conſequences. Mean while, the Griſons recalled their ſix thouſand men in the French ſervice, and theſe troops departing, notwithſtanding all the King's efforts to detain them, the duke of Bourbon judged he ought not any longer defer attacking the enemy's incampment. This reſolution was executed the eve of St. Matthias, with a ſucceſs very fatal to Francis, ſince his army was routed, and himſelf unfortunately taken priſoner (2).

Charles's moderation at the news of the victory of Pavia. Guicciard.

The ſucceſs of this battle filled all Europe with dread and conſternation. Charles V was now without a rival, and in condition to over-run Italy with his victorious army, while his ally, the King of England, had it in his power to give France a mortal wound on the ſide of Picardy. Conſequently, the balance of Europe no longer exiſting, moſt of the Potentates had great reaſon to apprehend falling at laſt into ſlavery. The Venetians alone perfectly knowing the danger, propoſed to the Pope a league againſt the Emperor, not queſtioning the King of England would alſo join in it, becauſe it was his real intereſt. This league, added to the forces France could ſtill bring into the field, and the ſupplies which might be received from the Swiſſers by paying them liberally, would have been ſufficient to bridle the Emperor, could it have been ſpeedily concluded. But the Pope, prefering his own intereſt to that of Europe in general, haſtened his treaty with the viceroy of Naples, who acted in the Emperor's name. Among other conceſſions which, by this treaty, Charles was to make Franceſco Sforza, he was to give him the inveſtiture of Milan. There were alſo three ſeparate articles concerning the Pope in particular; namely, 1. That the inhabitants of the Milaneſe ſhould furniſh themſelves with ſalt from the Pope's territories. 2. That the Emperor ſhould compel the duke of Ferrara to reſtore to the church the town of Reggio, ſeized immediately after Leo X's deceaſe. 3. That the Pope ſhould have the diſpoſal of all benefices in the kingdom of Naples. By this treaty, which was of no force 'till ratified by Charles, the politic viceroy found means to annihilate, or at leaſt to defer the project of league againſt the Emperor, propoſed by the Venetians, and to render the other powers jealous of the Pontif. This was the greateſt ſervice he could poſſibly do his maſter on this occaſion.

Mean while the Emperor's generals were greatly imbaraſſed after ſo glorious a victory, for want of money to pay their troops. They had indeed received a hundred thouſand ducats from Florence, but that not ſufficing to diſcharge the army's arrears and ſupport it afterwards, they were forced to diſband moſt of the troops when, by the treaty with Clement, they were ſure of having no league to apprehend. Beſide Triulzi, who had been beſieging Milan caſtle, had now repaſſed the Alps, and the duke of Albany thought only of retiring into France with his army. This diſbanding of troops would have been of very happy conſequence to the Emperor, whoſe intereſt it was to prevent, by his moderation, the meaſures which the alarmed ſtates of Italy might take againſt him, had but his generals proceeded accordingly: but proſperity cauſing them to be wanting in policy, they treated the ſtates of Italy, and eſpecially the Venetians, with a haughtineſs which gave them occaſion to think their liberty in danger, and made them reſolve to uſe all poſſible indeavors to avoid the menaced bondage.

The Emperor could better diſſemble his ſentiments. He received the news of this grand Pavian victory, and the French King's captivity, with great moderation, forbidding any demonſtrations of joy, and ſaying, "Chriſtians ought to "rejoice only for victories over Infidels." He ſeemed to ſympathiſe with Francis's misfortune, and, as I may ſay, to put himſelf in his place, by acknowledging it to be merely the effect of chance, and no Prince, how brave ſoever, could ſuppoſe himſelf exempt from a like accident. Preſently after he called his council, to debate what was to be done with his priſoner. His confeſſor, who ſpoke firſt, was for releaſing him without terms: he repreſented to him, "That, by ſuch a generous "action, he would not only acquire immortal fame, "but alſo make the King of France his real friend, "who, not to be out-done in generoſity, would "doubtleſs ſtrive to expreſs his gratitude: that, "with his help, he would give law to Germany "and Italy, without being obliged to demand the "aſſiſtance of other inferior Princes." But the duke of Alva anſwered all theſe arguments, and concluded it moſt adviſeable to reap from this victory all the advantages it could naturally procure; and the Emperor imbraced his opinion. This plainly ſhews, that his moderation was but a diſguiſe to keep the Princes of Europe from being alarmed, and concerting meaſures to oppoſe the execution of his ambitious deſigns.

He debates about what is to be done with his priſoner. His confeſſor's advice. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

The duke of Alva's opinion, which is followed.

To perſevere this diſguiſe, he ſent count de Beaurain into Italy with certain terms, on which he was willing to releaſe his priſoner. He was well aſſured that Francis would not accept them: but it was his intereſt to make the world believe it was not owing to him that the French King injoyed not his liberty: wherefore, it was every where induſtriouſly reported, that the Emperor had ſent the King very reaſonable conditions; but particular care was taken not to make them public. Among other matters, he demanded for himſelf the duchy of Burgundy (1). Moreover, he inſiſted on annexing to the duke of Bourbon's eſtates, the provinces of Provence and Dauphiné, and erect for that Prince the whole into a kingdom independent of the Gallic crown. Laſtly, he demanded that Francis ſhould give the King of England intire ſatisfaction with regard to what was his due. The firſt of theſe conditions, in juſtice and equity, contained nothing ſtrange: King Lewis XI took poſſeſſion of the duchy of Burgundy, after the laſt duke's deceaſe, under color of a title which was conteſted, and of which however he made himſelf judge; wherefore could not be ill taken that Charles ſhould demand reſtitution of what was wreſted from Mary of Burgundy his grandmother, at leaſt, 'till the cauſe was legally decided. But what was ſurpriſingly hard and unreaſonable in the propoſals of this Emperor, was his deſire to eſtabliſh in the heart of France a regal ſtate independent of the crown, merely to gratify a rebellious ſubject, the prime author of the King's misfortune. But Charles, ſeemingly propoſed this article only to make the firſt paſs the better, or to give occaſion for a rupture. Francis rejected theſe terms with the utmoſt indignation (2), and ſwore, he would rather remain in bonds for life than accept them (3). But he offered, in his turn, conditions which he thought very advantageous to the conqueror, viz. "That he would eſpouſe Leonora "dowager Queen of Portugal, the Emperor's "ſiſter, and give the duke of Bourbon his own "ſiſter the ducheſs of Alenſon, who had lately "loſt the duke her huſband: that he would agree "to hold the duchy of Burgundy as the Queen "dowager's dowry, and leave it to their male "heirs: that he would reſtore to the duke of "Bourbon all his confiſcated eſtates: that he would "renounce all claim to Naples and Milan: that he "would ſatisfy the King of England concerning which Charles rejects.

Great conſternation in France. Guicciard.

It was not without reaſon that Charles perſiſted in his demands. It is eaſy to judge the conſternation of France after the recent loſs ſhe had ſuſtained. Her King was a priſoner, and almoſt all his generals taken or ſlain in the battle of Pavia: the kingdom, being exhauſted by continual wars under this and the former reigns, was deſtitute of men and money: the Swiſſers were diſheartned: the canton of Zurich, which had refuſed to ſupply Francis with troops for the war, was ſtill in the ſame diſpoſition from a principle of conſcience; Zuinglius, who had great intereſt in that canton, perſuaded the ſenate, that to barter the blood of their citizens for money, and ſerve the ambition of Princes, was a thing infamous: but even had all the cantons been equally inclined to furniſh troops, it was well known they would not do it without payment; and to procure the neceſſary monies was no eaſy matter. On the other hand, there was reaſon to fear the King of England would improve this opportunity to invade France thro' Picardy, while Charles attacked the provinces bordering on Spain. Laſtly, nothing was to be expected from Italy, ſince his Holineſs had made peace with the Emperor, there not being the leaſt probability that the Venetians would even think of alone maintaining a war for the ſake of France. Thus was ſeen on all ſides juſt cauſe of alarm. Certainly, had Charles and Henry renewed their league, and vigorouſly attacked France, that kingdom in its then infelicitous circumſtances muſt have been utterly ſubverted. But while the ducheſs regent, and all true Frenchmen labored under theſe apprehenſions, they beheld breaking out a ray of hope which ſupported their ſpirits ſo as to prevent them from ſinking intirely. The Pope and Emperor could not accommodate their differences, tho' outwardly they ſeemed diſpoſed to union. The Venetians were inclined to join in a league with the other ſtates to oppoſe the Emperor's progreſs. Finally; the King of England, inſtead of taking advantage of King Francis's misfortunes, generouſly took his part. On the other hand, Franceſco Sforza, ſeeing himſelf as it were the Emperor's ſlave, ſtrove to throw off this yoke, and, tho' he miſcarried, his attempt however produced a good effect, as it manifeſted to Charles the diſpoſition of thoſe Princes who entered into this combination, which it will be neceſſary to explain, in order to give a diſtinct idea of the affairs of thoſe times, wherein England was concerned. But we muſt firſt ſee what became of the royal captive.

Several things concur to revive the courage of the French. Guicciard.

King Francis conducted into Spain, Guicciard. P. Daniel.

This unhappy Prince was ſtrictly guarded in the caſtle of Pizzighitoni, 'till Eaſter, but with ſuch diſquiets on the part of the Imperialiſts, that, leſt attempts ſhould be made for his releaſe, they dared not remove their troops from that neighborhood. Lanoy, having at length intelligence, that the Venetian embaſſador at Rome held frequent conferences with his Holineſs, was apprehenſive of ſome project in agitation to reſcue the captive King; and therefore, without conſulting Bourbon, whom poſſibly he miſtruſted, he determined on conveying the royal priſoner into Spain: tho' that was not any of the eaſieſt enterpriſes, ſince he had no naval ſtrength, and the French gallies then at ſea. To remove this obſtacle, he inſinuated to King Francis, that the ſole means for his being ſoon at liberty, was to confer perſonally with the Emperor; who being, as was well known, a moſt gracious and generous Prince, and had expreſſed a concern for his misfortune, their interview could not but have a good effect, and greatly conduce to a ſpeedy and honorable pacification. Francis agreed to the propoſal; being full of hopes he ſhould do more with Charles, in two or three conferences, that could in many months be effected by his miniſters. Nay, he even lent his own gallies to the viceroy whereon to tranſport him to Spain, where he landed about Mid-June.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1525.

He had flattered himſelf, he ſhould meet with, in Spain, ſuch treatment as John King of France found in England; but, on his arrival at Madrid, he had the mortification to ſee himſelf inſtantly ſhut up in the caſtle; while Charles, far from confering with him, as he fondly expected, vouchſafed him not even one viſit: nay, all the favor he could obtain, was a paſs for his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Alenſon, who reached Madrid in September. By the ducheſs regent, her mother, ſhe was impowered to treat with the Emperor; but was at laſt forced to return juſt as ſhe came. At her coming to Madrid, ſhe found the King her brother ſo indiſpoſed that even his life was deſpaired of. It not being queſtioned but that mere grief, to find himſelf ſo apparently remote from his deliverance, had occaſioned his illneſs, Charles poſted away from Toledo to Madrid, to viſit and comfort him, as being terribly apprehenſive of loſing, by his priſoner's death, the advantages he expected from his captivity. He therefore, in the two viſits he made him, put him in hopes of a releaſe, which tho' done only in general terms, failed not producing the deſired effect, ſince the royal captive preſently mended: but when, on his perfect recovery, he would have recommenced the negociation, he found himſelf not ſo near his deliverance as he had imagined. Charles ſtill inſiſted on the reſtitution of Burgundy; and when Francis proffered to eſpouſe Princeſs Leonora, and to hold that duchy as her dowry, the Emperor, to excuſe himſelf, alledged his being ingaged to marry his ſiſter to the duke of Bourbon. It mortified Francis not a little to find the preference thus given to one of his own ſubjects: but what ſtung him ſtill more was his ſeeing this to be merely a pretext to delay concluding the treaty: and therefore, in the deſpair into which he was plunged by Charles's rigor, he delivered the ducheſs of Alenſon a writing, ſigned by himſelf, whereby he not only conſented, but even ordered, that the ſtates of France ſhould forthwith make ready and ſet the Gallic crown on the head of his ſon the Dauphin. This inſtrument is what they call in France, The Edict of Madrid. The parliament of Paris would not however record it, either on account of its repugnancy to the national conſtitution, or becauſe they looked on the ſaid edict as imperfect and of no authority, the King being under conſtraint. Very poſſibly, Francis deſigned thereby to make the Emperor comprehend, that, inſtead of having in his power a great Monarch, he ran the hazard of finding himſelf maſter of only a nominal King who had not a foot of dominion.

While Charles was amuſing his priſoner in Spain, he acted not a whit more ſincerely with Pope Clement, who was quite at a loſs what judgment to make of his ambiguous procedure. The Imperial conqueror had eagerly courted his friendſhip; but after having, by the viceroy of Naples, made with him a treaty, he long delayed confirming it, and at length ſent his ratification without including the three ſeparate articles. He acquainted him, That, as to the duke of Ferrara, he could not oblige him to yield up to the church the city of Reggio, which was a fief of the Empire. compel thoſe of the Milaneſe to purchaſe their ſalt from the Pope's ſubjects only, he ſaid, that matter alone concerned the duke of Milan; and, for his part, he could not undertake to promiſe for others. And concerning the Neapolitan benefices, he would not at all meddle with that article, without ſubjoining a reſtriction which rendered it wholly uſeleſs, viz. that conformity to what had been practiſed by former Kings of Naples ſhould be ſtrictly obſerved. Clement finding the Emperor abſolutely declined ratifying thoſe three articles, would not otherwiſe accept the ratification ſent him, and they both remained on the ſame footing as before the treaty: but Charles got what he wanted, ſince he had obſtructed the league which was projecting againſt him, in rendering Clement ſuſpected by the other Potentates.

A farther proof of Charles's inſincerity.

Alſo another particular occurred, which gave ſtill farther proof of this Emperor's inſincerity; viz: Having ſent to Franceſco Sforza the inveſtiture of Milan, he thought fit to clog it with the hard condition, that the ſaid Prince ſhould pay down twelve hundred thouſand ducats, in recompenſe for his charges in keeping for him that duchy. As it was manifeſt that Sforza could not poſſibly anſwer this demand, it was no leſs ſo that Charles only ſought a pretext to keep poſſeſſion of Milan. All this greatly alarmed Clement VII, who had alſo notice that he was not at all favored by the council of Spain: and in effect, certain of the Emperor's miniſters had counſeled that Monarch to chaſtiſe the Pontif for ſiding with France at ſo critical a juncture, and compel him to reſtore Modena to the duke of Ferrara, and Bologna to the Bentivoglii.

The Pope's alarm at his conduct.

The Venetians indeavor to form a league againſt Charles. Guicciard.

On the other hand, the Venetians, ſeeing there was no likelihood that the Emperor really intended to reſtore Sforza, could not but be alarmed at his keeping the duchy of Milan. Wherefore, they uſed their utmoſt indeavors to perſuade the Pope and the King of England to join with them and France againſt the Emperor, well knowing that otherwiſe all Italy would fall under the dominion of the houſe of Auſtria. In Rymer's collection is extant a letter of Andrea Gritti their Doge to cardinal Wolſey, dated March 31, which ſhews that thoſe able politicians had formed this project not long after the battle. The letter indeed is no other than the credentials of a certain embaſſador of theirs, who had orders to treat with King Henry on a buſineſs of the utmoſt importance: but, at ſuch a juncture, this important affair could be only the league they were projecting.

Vol. XIV. p. 36.

Pope Clement's irreſolution and perplexity.

Mean while, his Holineſs was ſtrangely imbaraſſed. By aiming at a too refined ſtrain of politics, he had taken ſo many wrong ſteps, that he was quite at a loſs to know on which ſide he ſhould turn himſelf; which is indeed but too frequently the caſe with thoſe who, leaving the great road, take by-paths. This Pontif could not reſolve either to be ſatisfied with the Emperor's offers, or enter into a league againſt him. In this uncertainty, he choſe to follow the example of Leo X and Julius II, his predeceſſors, that is, to treat with the Emperor and his adverſaries at one and the ſame time, in order, by the events, to conclude on what would turn moſt to his advantage. To this purpoſe, while he was treating at Rome with the Venetians, he diſpatched away to Spain cardinal Salviati, to negociate with Charles, ſending alſo with him the bull of diſpenſation deſired by that Monarch, to authoriſe his deſigned nuptials with his niece, Iſabella of Portugal: but this bull was not to touch the Emperor's hands 'till after the treaty was concluded.

Guicciard.

Sforza unworthily treated by the Imperialiſts. Ibid.

The affairs of Italy being in this ſituation, another accident happened, which plainly evidenced Charles's aim was only, by a feigned moderation, to amuſe all the other Potentates, while in reality he thought of nothing but how to extend his dominions. His league with Adrian VI, and the other Italian powers, was founded ſolely on Franceſco Sforza's reſtitution to the duchy of Milan. As this was the common intereſt of Italy, ſo was it likewiſe the only bond whereby Charles had found means to unite all thoſe powers againſt France, then poſſeſſed of the Milaneſe. That league had ſucceeded according to the allies wiſhes. The French were driven from Italy, and Sforza entered Milan: but tho' the Emperor had pretended to give that Prince the inveſtiture, he had not yet done it, becauſe Sforza was not able to pay down the twelve hundred thouſand ducats Charles ſo unreaſonably exacted. The ſaid duke was indeed flattered with hopes of obtaining terms more moderate, but that was only to amuſe him, and remove his as well as the Pope's and Venetians ſuſpicion, that Charles's deſign was either to keep the duchy for himſelf, or give it to his brother the archduke Ferdinand.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1525.

Charles lays a ſnare for Sforza in order to diſpoſſeſs him. Guicciard. P. Daniel.

What was then but a bare ſuſpicion, ſoon became a certainty. The duke of Bourbon repairing to Spain, there to attend certain concerns of his own, Don Ferdinand de Avalos, marquis of Peſcara, was, by the Emperor, commiſſioned to command in Italy. Shortly after, Peſcara affected to appear greatly diſſatisfied, and openly to exclaim againſt the Emperor's ingratitude. He carried his diſſimulation ſo far, that he at length inſpired Jeronimo Moroni, the duke of Milan's chancellor, with the aſſurance to ſound him to try if, by his means, the Spaniards might be expeled the Milaneſe. Peſcara liſtened to his inſinuations, and had ſeveral conferences with him, and managed ſo dexterouſly, that he ingaged Moroni to get the duke himſelf to diſcourſe with him on the buſineſs. Moroni's ſcheme was actually to cut off all the Spaniards in the duchy of Milan, and make Peſcara King of Naples. As this could not be effected without foreign aid, Peſcara propoſed to ingage in this combination Pope Clement, the regent of France, and the Venetians. Accordingly theſe three powers readily acceded, and promiſed their aſſiſtance. When matters were in good forwardneſs, Peſcara received the Emperor's orders intirely to ſtrip Sforza of his eſtates. He began with ſeizing Moroni, and then conſtrained the duke, little able to reſiſt, to reſign his capital city, together with what places he poſſeſſed. Only the caſtle of Milan Sforza would not deliver, which was therefore inſtantly beſieged. Thus had Charles a plauſible pretext to ſeize that duchy; nor could Clement or the Venetians complain of his puniſhing Sforza's treachery, ſince there were evident proofs that they themſelves were deeply concerned in the conſpiracy.

Peſcara, having deprived Sforza of all his poſſeſſions, beſieges the caſtle of Milan.

The artifice Charles had uſed to poſſeſs himſelf of the Milaneſe, ſerved only to confirm the Venetians in their reſolution, to hazard all to hinder that duchy's continuing ſubject to the Auſtrian family. Without offering to juſtify their conduct, they flatly told the Spaniſh embaſſador, who preſſed them to join with the Emperor, that Sforza's reſtoration was a preliminary from which they would never recede. Had Clement VII ſhewn a like reſolution, Charles would have been not a little imbaraſſed: but that Pontif, wanting to ſtretch his politics too far, ſuffered himſelf to be deceived, as he had been before. He had in Spain a legate, who was treating with the Emperor, while himſelf, at Rome, was negociating with the French and Venetian embaſſadors a league againſt that Monarch. He impatiently waited the ſucceſs of his legate's negociation, and, as the concluſion was long delayed, he appointed a day to ſign a league with France and Venice: but, in the interval, underſtanding that his treaty was concluded at Madrid, he would hear no more of the league. Soon after, the Emperor ſent him, by a courier, courier, the treaty concluded in Spain, which he found ſo equivocal and ambiguous that he refuſed to ratify it. The Spaniſh embaſſador, pretending to be himſelf ſurpriſed at the ambiguities of the treaty, ſtrenuouſly maintained they were undeſigned, and told the Pope, he might draw up the treaty as he pleaſed, and ingaged to have it ſigned by the Emperor within two months. This delay was only to hinder the Pope from entering into the league during that time, and Clement ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by the embaſſador's poſitive manner of ſpeaking. This was tranſacted in December 1525, and in the ſame month died Peſcara.

Henry thinks of ſiding with France. Guicciard. Hollingſh.

Having thus ſhewn the ſituation of affairs in Italy, we muſt ſee what paſſed at the Engliſh court, where the cabals came no way ſhort of thoſe at Rome and Venice, ſince it was then really debating to preſerve the balance of Europe, which leaned too much to one ſide. The equality between the two houſes of France and Auſtria was, properly, what made England conſiderable, and conſequently was an advantage not to be neglected: but there were other reaſons which incited Henry to forſake the Emperor, and join with France. Tho' the treaty of Bruges, or Windſor, ſeemed to have inſeparably united the Emperor and Henry, it is however certain they were far from being pleaſed with one another, becauſe each was deſirous to make their union ſubſervient to his reſpective concerns, without any regard to his ally. Probably cardinal Wolſey, who was very angry with the Emperor, did not a little contribute to diſpoſe his maſter to a rupture.

Charles and Henry diſſatisfied with each other.

Cauſes of their differing. Guicciard.

Princeſs Mary, Henry's daughter, was affianced to the Emperor, and yet the King her father had offered her to the King of Scotland. On the other hand, the Emperor had not ſcrupled concluding his own marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, as if he had not been ingaged to Mary; and hence theſe two Monarchs evidenced they had little regard for each other. Charles, hearing that Henry was treating of a match between his daughter and the King of Scotland, took that occaſion to throw on him the rupture of his marriage. In March he diſpatched over to England baron de Buren, and the preſident of the council of Mechlin, to require King Henry inſtantly to ſend him the Princeeſs, pay down the covenanted dowry, and, purſuant to their league, enter Picardy with a powerful army, as he ſhould have done the year before. It was eaſy for Henry to perceive, the Emperor ſought only to juſtify himſelf, without any intention to accompliſh his marriage with Mary, and this way of proceeding was not very proper to preſerve a good underſtanding. But on the other hand, Charles had no leſs cauſe to complain of him. Henry had promiſed to find a hundred thouſand crowns monthly for the duke of Bourbon's expedition into France, or to make a powerful diverſion in Picardy: but after ſeting the affair on foot by the firſt month's payment, he had there made a full ſtop, without the leaſt attempt againſt France: nay, he had demanded the monies owed him by Charles, when he was well aſſured of that Prince's diſability to comply with his demand. This procedure ſeemed to demonſtrate he only ſought a pretenſe. Moreover the Emperor was informed that, in October laſt, while Francis was marching into Italy, a perſon without character came to London, from the regent, and had ſeveral conferences with cardinal Wolſey: but then Charles had promiſed to invade France on the ſide of Spain, without having taken one ſtep in order thereto; and yet he thought very heinouſly of Henry's diſappointing him. Thus theſe two Monarchs, who were thought ſo ſtrictly united, and whoſe union made France and Italy tremble, were in reality very much eſtranged from each other, and juſt ready to quarrel. In all appearance, the conferences of the ſaid emiſſary from France with Wolſey had taken effect: beſide, that cardinal, who was exceſſively revengeful, muſt have been greatly rancored againſt the Emperor for deceiving him twice, after a poſitive promiſe to help him to the Papacy.

Wolſey contributes to the rupture.

It was early in March when Charles's two embaſſadors diſcharged their commiſſion: but before they had their anſwer, the news of the battle of Pavia, and King Francis's captivity, reached England, by a letter from the governeſs of Flanders, with another from Lanoy, written the very day this action happened. As the Engliſh court then ſtood diſpoſed, this news was by no means agreeable: nevertheleſs, as it was yet requiſite to diſſemble, Henry ordered a ſolemn maſs to be celebrated at St. Paul's, whereat he thought fit to aſſiſt perſonally (1), tho' without a Te Deum (2). His driſt was to make Charles's agents believe that the ſolemnity was on account of their maſter's victory; yet, at the ſame time, to ſhew ſome regard for France, by avoiding to expreſs any joy at her misfortune.

Henry expreſſes a regard for France. Herbert. Hall. Herbert.

A few days after, the council was aſſembled, to conſider what was to be done at this juncture. The queſtion was, whether this opportunity ſhould be imbraced to make conqueſts upon France, in proſecuting the King's title to that kingdom, or whether it was more expedient to aſſiſt and preſerve France intire, and oppoſe the Auſtrian family's growing power. As to the firſt point, it is moſt certain that if, on this occaſion, England had ſtrictly united with the Emperor, and made vigorous efforts on the ſide of Picardy, France, in her then circumſtances, muſt have have been loſt irrecoverably; for, inſtead of being able to withſtand the attacks of thoſe two potent adverſaries, it was not poſſible for her to reſiſt the Emperor without the King of England's aſſiſtance: but, on the other hand, it was conſidered, that France could not be ruined without rendering the Emperor too powerful: that he was already in poſſeſſion of Spain, and had alſo his eye upon Portugal, by marrying his niece Iſabella, as it was openly diſcourſed: that his late victory in Milan gave him ſuch a ſuperiority in Italy, that apparently the Pope and the Venetians would not be able to make head againſt him: that he poſſeſſed almoſt the whole Netherlands, with large and rich provinces in Germany; not to reckon the Imperial dignity, which was become as it were hereditary in his family: that if, by a powerful diverſion, opportunity was given him to conquer the French provinces bordering on Spain and Italy, the moſt King Henry could expect was, to ſhare France with him; but it was to be feared, that Charles would afterwards break with him, and be an enemy the more formidable, as there would be no proportion between their forces, nor any ſtate in Europe able to ſupport the weakeſt: that therefore, ſuppoſing the King of England had all the ſucceſs in France he could wiſh, in agrandiſing himſelf in that kingdom he would only be involved for the future in a moſt unequal war with the Emperor, who very probably would never be ſatisfied 'till he had diſpoſſeſſed the Engliſh of their conqueſts: that what had paſſed between Lewis XII and Ferdinand, in reſpect of the kingdom of Naples, was a clear evidence how difficult it is for ſuch partitions long to ſubſiſt: that, on all theſe accounts, it was much more for England's intereſt to make a vigorous effort to ſupport France, and inable her to be always a balance to the Auſtrian power: that the happineſs and glory of England conſiſted in the equality between the King of France and the Emperor, ſince thereby England was always in condition to remain arbiter of Europe, and make herſelf courted by both parties: that there was no other way to maintain a flouriſhing trade, wherein conſiſted all her ſtrength, and without which the Engliſh could never hope to render themſelves formidable: that if, on the contrary, it was reſolved to complete the deſtruction of France, and a war ſhould afterwards happen with the Emperor, of which there was great probability, at once would be loſt the trade with France, Spain, Italy, Flanders, and Germany, which would quickly reduce England to extreme poverty; or, at leaſt, that it would thereby be out of her power to keep up land and ſea forces ſufficient to balance the Emperor's power: in ſhort, if France came to be divided between Charles and Henry, Scotland would certainly join with the Emperor, and continue to annoy England by frequent diverſions, as was her conſtant practiſe, in favor of France. To theſe conſiderations was added another of ſtill greater weight, namely, That a league with the Emperor to conquer France, was not the ſame thing as one with the regent for defenſe of that kingdom: that in the firſt, the Emperor's ſole aim would be to make the Engliſh forces ſerve to inable him to puſh his conqueſts elſewhere; but, at the ſame time, he would oppoſe, either directly or indirectly, England's increaſe of power; this being the uſual policy of Princes when they joined with thoſe weaker than themſelves: that it could be the leſs doubted that Charles would purſue this maxim, as even before the battle of Pavia he had ſhewn that he conſidered the King of England only as his inſtrument to promote his deſigns in Italy; but if England joined with France, the two allies, having the ſame view, would, as is uſual in defenſive leagues, act unanimouſly: that, on the other hand, in the preſent juncture, France, not able to ſupport herſelf without England's aſſiſtance, would readily accept what terms ſhould be impoſed on her, which was an advantage more real and certain than any to be expected by attacking her; and finally, that nothing could acquire his Majeſty more glory than to relieve France in her deſperate condition, and free a captive Monarch; ſince by ſo doing he would truly gain the title of Arbiter and Deliverer of Europe, and make of the King of France a friend, who undoubtedly would bear in eternal remembrance ſo ſignal a benefaction.

Henry reſolves to ſupport France; and uſes for pretenſe the injuries done him by Charles.

Theſe were the true reaſons which induced Henry and his council to take part with France. They were perfectly agreeable to the King's and Wolſey's inclinations, and to the maxims they had already began to purſue. The only buſineſs was to ſeek a pretenſe to break with Charles, by throwing on him the blame of this rupture. This is the article whereto Sovereigns are extremely attentive. When they commence wars, how unjuſt ſoever, they would perſuade the world that they proceed wholly on the grounds of juſtice and equity, without the leaſt tincture of envy, jealouſy, ambition or avarice. The war Henry was meditating againſt Charles was, as we have ſeen, intirely founded on policy; and that alone would have been ſufficient to juſtify it: but he choſe rather to ground it on the pretended injuries done him by that Monarch. The reaſon of this conduct is evident: policy and equity are very rarely found to agree, and Henry, like moſt Princes, had rather be at leaſt thought a man of probity, than a deep politician. However this be, the reſolution being taken to ſupport France, Cuthbert Tunſtal biſhop of London, and Sir Robert Wingfield were ſent to Spain, to demand of the Emperor diverſe particulars which, it was well known, would not be granted. Firſt, "That, as "the war was made at a common charge, it was "reaſonable the King of England ſhould partake "the fruits of the victory at Pavia: that therefore, "purſuant to their alliance, it ſhould be ſtipulated "in the treaty with the captive King, that Henry "ſhould be reſtored to what appertained to him in "France. Secondly, that, in caſe this could not "be obtained by fair means, the Emperor, ac-"cording to the treaty, ſhould prepare to invade "France from Spain, while the Engliſh acted in "Picardy, and that the war ſhould not ceaſe 'till "the King of England recovered whatever was "rightfully his: that the Emperor ought to be "the more ready to aſſiſt the King of England in "obtaining his deſires, ſince, by his marriage with "the heireſs of England, all theſe acquiſitions "would finally devolve to him. Thirdly, that as "it was ſaid, in the treaty of Windſor, the two "allies ſhould mutually deliver all uſurpers upon "each other's right, Henry required, purſuant to "that article, that the King of France ſhould be "delivered to him the ſame day Princeſs Mary "was conſigned to the Emperor."

His demands on the Emperor.

Moſt of theſe demands were of ſuch a nature, that the Emperor eaſily perceived Henry ſought only a pretenſe to break with him. In reality, he could not receive Princeſs Mary, ſince he was determined on eſpouſing Iſabella of Portugal, and much leſs would he ſurrender the captive King, and thereby deprive himſelf of the advantage he expected from his victory. Having therefore framed his anſwer in general terms, denoting his unwillingneſs to grant what was demanded, he furniſhed Henry with the pretext he was ſeeking to join the regent of France. On divulging this reſolution, the Engliſh court took care to publiſh their reaſons for the rupture with Charles. The ſubſtance of theſe reaſons was; That the governeſs of the Netherlands, inſtead of providing her quota of forces for the war, had privately treated with France: that the Flemings had broken the treaty of commerce in ſeveral articles (1): that the Emperor had not diſcharged what he owed the King: that, in the terms on which he had offered to releaſe the King of France, he had very negligently, and in general terms only, mentioned Henry's right, as a thing of ſmall moment: that he was now treating of his marriage with the Princeſs of Portugal, in contempt of Princeſs Mary, to whom he was contracted: laſtly, that the Turks being about to invade Chriſtendom (2), it was neceſſary that all Chriſtian Princes ſhould join their forces againſt them, which could not be done without a general peace; but this could not be effected, while the Emperor remained in arms to agrandiſe himſelf at the expenſe of other Potentates. Theſe are the reaſons alledged in vindication of King Henry's conduct: but his real motive was the juſt jealouſy with which the Emperor's power inſpired England, and indeed all Europe; however, Henry thought not proper to declare war againſt the Emperor, being unwilling, by ſo raſh a ſtep, to prejudice his intended treaty with France. He contented himſelf with ordering his embaſſadors in Spain, to intercede, in his name, in behalf of the captive King, tho' he expected little from his interceſſion. Mean while, he acquainted the ducheſs regent of France, that if ſhe would ſend embaſſadors to negociate with him, there might follow a treaty advantageous to the King her ſon, and to both kingdoms. The regent immediately appointed Jean-Joachim de Paſſau, baron de Vaux (the ſame who had begun the negociation with cardinal Wolſey) and Jean Brinon preſident of Roan. Their commiſſion was dated at Lyons the ninth of June.

Embaſſy of France to London. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 37, 45. Hollingſh.

While the treaty between France and England was negociating at London, Henry, knowing how it would end, commited the care of raiſing money to Wolſey. The moſt natural way was applying to parliament: but Wolſey was too haughty to expoſe himſelf to a refuſal, or conteſt with the houſe of commons, as had been his caſe once before. Wherefore, concluding to make uſe of a method ſomewhat more expeditious and better ſuiting his genius, he iſſued out, in the King's name, commiſſions to levy, throughout the kingdom, the ſixth part of every lay-man's goods, and the fourth of the clergy's (1). No ſooner were theſe commiſſions publiſhed, but the nation was in a great ferment. This method of raiſing money was univerſally deemed a manifeſt breach of Magna Charta, and ſuch a conſequential incroachment that a general riſing ſeemed not very diſtant. The King, on notice thereof, inſtantly ſet forth a proclamation, diſavowing theſe commiſſions which had been publiſhed in his name, and declaring, that he would not exact from his good people any thing forcibly, nor demand of them a farthing but by way of benevolence, as practiſed in the reign of Edward IV. But this ſoon appeared to be a mere artifice to extort, under another name, what the people refuſed to give by violence; for the benevolence afterwards demanded by the King was almoſt equal to what was at firſt required authoritatively. The Londoners being taxed firſt, the magiſtrates excuſed themſelves, as benevolences were aboliſhed by Richard III. Againſt this Wolſey loudly exclaimed, as if it had been the moſt extravagant aſſertion in nature. He told them, Richard III was a tyrant and uſurper, and therefore laws made in his reign could not limit the Sovereign's power. But, as this argument had no great effect, he ſent for the city common council, one by one, to intimidate them, deſiring at any rate to compaſs his ends without being obliged to call a parliament. While he was thus imployed, the inhabitants of ſome counties, not far from London, took arms, and the inſurrection would very probably have become univerſal, had not a timely ſtop been put to thoſe dangerous commotions. The ſpeedy orders given to diſperſe the ſeditious ſucceeded as the court could wiſh: they who had taken arms, ſeeing themſelves not yet ſufficiently ſupported, ſubmited to the King's mercy, and ſome of the ring-leaders were impriſoned. Henry finding how the Engliſh ſtood affected, judged it neceſſary to give them ſome ſatisfaction, by ſhewing he was not concerned in the violent procedure of his miniſter: wherefore, in full council he declared, that his intention was not to puniſh any perſon for this rebellion. Wolſey, perceiving that his maſter threw all the blame on him, juſtified himſelf as beſt he could, without however charging the King; alledging, he had the judges opinion for what he had done. Were ſuch excuſes admited, it would be no longer neceſſary for a King of England to apply for ſubſidies to the parliament. The Judges being nominated by the King, his obtaining from them favorable deciſions would not be very difficult. But tho' there have been judges ſo daringly raſh, as to decide points of this conſequence, as in the reigns of Richard II, Charles I and James II, very few eſcaped the chaſtiſement their preſumption merited. The parliament never deſigned that the nation's privileges ſhould depend on the deciſion of the judges. The council, finding Henry not inclined to ſupport what the cardinal had done, and, on the other hand, not daring to attack Wolſey himſelf, thought fit, without naming any, to caſt the whole blame on thoſe who had given the King wrong information, and to releaſe the priſoners, after a ſevere reprimand. Purſuant to this reſolution, the priſoners being brought before the council, Wolſey ſharply rebuked them, agravating the heinouſneſs of their offenſe, and adding, that the King was pleaſed to grant them his pardon, provided they would find ſureties for their future good behavior: but anſwer being made him, they had no ſecurity to give; the cardinal and duke of Norfolk ſaid, they would be bound for them; whereupon they were diſcharged.

Henry having once diſcovered that he approved not all the cardinal's actions, people ventured more boldly to complain of his conduct. The truth is, he oppreſſed the nation, and more eſpecially the clergy, in no ordinary manner. The inſtrument of his oppreſſions was one Allen (2) his chaplain, who obſerved no meaſures, well knowing his maſter's protection would not fail him on occaſion. Mean while, how great ſoever the cardinal's power was, a private perſon ventured to commence a ſuit againſt Allen, and proſecuted him ſo vigorouſly, that at laſt the affair came to the ear of King Henry, who was informed at the ſame time of ſeveral other complaints of the people. He had hitherto fancied, there had never been in England ſo mild a government as his, being ignorant of the ill uſe Wolſey made of his authority. This information threw him into ſo terrible a rage, that his eminence was near being quite out of favor. It was not without the utmoſt ſubmiſſion that he appeaſed the King's anger, ſhewing him withal his laſt will, wherein he had made him his heir. This he did to intimate that he was laboring for him, and that whatever outrages he perpetrated were only to augment the inheritance which his Majeſty was one day to injoy. Nothing can better expreſs the King's ſentiments concerning Wolſey, than the letter he wrote that cardinal ſome time after his pardon; a fragment whereof, as inſerted by lord Herbert in his hiſtory, is as follows:

The cardinal removes from court thoſe whom he miſtruſts.

This letter ſhews the King was informed of ſeveral of Wolſey's miſdemeanors: but he did not yet thoroughly know him, his affection for him combating in his heart the heinouſneſs of his proceedings, and making him believe, that his faults were the pure effects of his great zeal for founding his college. Had he not been thus prepoſſeſſed in his favor, he might have been more fully informed: but it was very dangerous to ſpeak directly againſt a favorite to whom the King ſtill ſhewed ſuch deference. Mean while the cardinal, by this inſtance, finding what his enemies would be capable of doing againſt him if they had the King's ear, was very careful to remove from court all he ſuſpected: and, at the ſame time, he ſtrove to preſerve the King's love and eſteem by the utmoſt exceſs of complaiſance. He had now completed, near Hampton, a ſtately manſion, which ſurpaſſed in beauty all the royal palaces: but what had lately happened convincing him it might breed a jealouſy in the King, he made him a preſent of it (1), as if from the very firſt he had intended to build it for him. His meaning, by this preſent, was to inſinuate, that he heaped up riches purely for his ſake; and this inſinuation had its wiſhed effect. The King had the ſame confidence in him as before, which the popular murmurs ſeemed to have ſomewhat alienated. This year he obtained the King's letters patent for founding the college at Oxford.

Negociation with the French embaſſadors. Hall.

During theſe occurrences, the cardinal was buſied in treating with the French embaſſadors. Early in June the ducheſs regent had ſent full powers in general to her two agents: but in the courſe of the negociation they found they ſhould have occaſion for more particular powers, to ſettle the ſums due from the King of France to the King of England, and which, conſiſting of ſeveral articles, were to be reduced to one, according to Henry's intention. Theſe new powers were diſpatched the ſixteenth of Auguſt. On ſuch a very extraordinary occaſion, the French embaſſadors had properly nothing to do but to comply with the King of England's pleaſure: their aim being to diſingage him from the Emperor, and induce him to join the King their maſter, there was no diſputing on the terms. But it muſt be confeſſed that, on this occaſion, Henry's generoſity was very uncommon. Tho' he might have demanded towns, and even provinces, in return for the friendſhip he thought fit at that juncture to contract with King Francis, and for the charges he was about ingaging in, he contented himſelf with ſecuring, by new treaties, the ſums already his juſt due. Theſe treaties, being in a readineſs, were ſigned at Moore, a houſe of the King's *, on the thirtieth of Auguſt.

The firſt contained a defenſive league between France and England, againſt all powers, ſpiritual or temporal, which ſhould invade either of the two kingdoms. Hence the Emperor, who had lately re-conquered the duchy of Milan, was excluded. Moreover, Henry in-

He was conſtituted likewiſe lieutenant general beyond the Trent, and warden general of the marches of Scotland. After which he was bred up with Henry earl of Surrey at Windſor, from whence they went both together to ſtudy at Paris. Their friendſhip was indeared by the duke's marrying Mary the earl's ſiſter, daughter to Thomas duke of Norfolk, by whom he had no iſſue. He was very perſonable and of great expectation, and for abilities of mind and body one of the rareſt of his time. gaged to imploy his beſt indeavors to procure King Francis's releaſe.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 58.

The ſecond treaty concerned the payment of the ſums due to Henry from the King of France, namely, 1. By a treaty of the ſeventh of Auguſt 1515, one million of gold crowns. 2. By another of the twelfth of January 1518, for reſtitution of Tournay, five hundred thouſand gold crowns. 3. By another of the ſame date, twenty three thouſand livres Tournois. 4. By another of November the thirteenth 1520, four hundred ſixty two thouſand crowns. For all theſe ſums the regent bound herſelf in the King her ſon's name, to pay Henry two millions of gold crowns of thirty-five ſols Tournois each, which being reduced to crowns de ſoleil, of thirty eight ſols, or pennies Tournois each, amounted to the ſum of one million and eight hundred ninety-four thouſand, ſeven hundred thirty-ſix crowns, and thirty-two ſols Tournois. This debt was to be diſcharged at diverſe payments; viz. forty ſeven thouſand three hundred ſixty eight crowns, within forty days after date of the treaty; a like ſum on the firſt of the inſuing November, and as much every ſix months 'till the whole was paid. This made forty payments, and conſequently the whole muſt be twenty years in diſcharging.

It was, by the ſame treaty, farther agreed, that if Henry died before he had received the two millions, the arrears were to be paid to his heirs and ſucceſſors: but, in caſe he out-lived the payment of the whole, he ſhould, during his life, injoy a yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns to ceaſe at his death.

To ſecure the performance of the treaty, the regent was ſolemnly to ſwear to it in preſenſe of the Engliſh embaſſadors; and King Francis was to ratify and ſwear to it immediately on his return to France. Henry had moreover, for ſureties, cardinal de Bourbon, the dukes of Vendoſme and Longueville, counts de St. Paul, Maulevrier, Brienne; barons de Montmorency, Lautrec and Brezé; the cities of Paris, Lyons, Orleans, Toulouſe, Amiens, Bourdeaux and Rheims (1).

It muſt be obſerved that, in the ſum of two millions of crowns due to Henry, there was no deduction of what Francis had paid him from the year 1515 to their rupture. This was all the advantage Henry made, which was not exorbitant, conſidering how little punctual the King of France was in his payments.

By a third treaty, the regent ingaged to pay to Henry's ſiſter Mary, dowager Queen of France, all the arrears of her dowry at ſeveral payments, namely, five thouſand crowns within forty days after date of the treaty, and a like ſum every ſix months 'till the whole was diſcharged; ſhe moreover promiſed her the future injoyment of her whole dowry.

All theſe ſeveral treaties, which properly were only different articles of one and the ſame treaty, were ratified and ſworn by the ducheſs regent of France, and confirmed by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, and Bourdeaux. But, after having finiſhed the King his maſter's affairs, Wolſey forgot not himſelf. There is, in Rymer's collection of public acts, the regent's bond of the eighteenth of November, to pay his ſaid eminence the arrears of the penſion granted him in lieu of the biſhoprick of Tournay's adminiſtration, being four years and a half, amounting to twenty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred and ninety-three gold crowns, called de ſoleil (2). She alſo declared that, for ſeveral other weighty reaſons, there was due to the cardinal a hundred thouſand crowns of gold; theſe two ſums making together one hundred and twenty-one thouſand, eight hundred and ninety-eight crowns de ſoleil, were to be paid in ſeven years, by half-yearly equal payments.

The regent's grant to Wolſey. p. 100.

The defenſive league between France and England being thus concluded and ſigned, the regent began to be ſomewhat eaſier, and more in a condition to diſpute on the terms of the King her ſon's liberty: beſide, ſhe had reaſon to hope, the King of England's declarations would help to determine the Pope and Venetians, whoſe fears alone prevented their forming a league againſt the Emperor; and in effect it will, in the ſequel, appear that they altered their meaſures on hearing what ſteps the King of England had taken. Mean while the Emperor, receiving advice of the treaty of Moore, recalled his embaſſadors, who were ſtill in England, and Henry did the like by his in Spain. Soon after, Charles concluded his marriage with Iſabella of Portugal, by virtue of a diſpenſation brought him by cardinal Salviati, who delivered it on concluſion of the above-mentioned treaty.

While the affairs of Europe thus changed countenance, thro' the effects produced in diverſe quarters by the battle of Pavia and the French King's captivity, there was no other alteration in thoſe of Scotland, except that the earl of Angus, who was to hold the adminiſtration four months only, thought not fit to reſign when his time was expired. Whereupon the earl of Argyle withdrew greatly diſſatisfied, but the earl of Lenox, tho' likewiſe diſpleaſed, ſtill remained at court. Mean while, the Queen and the earl of Arran, who had been diſpoſſeſſed, were not unmindful of their affairs. The earl of Lenox's diſcontent giving them room to hold intelligence with him, they prevailed on him to undertake inſpiring the young King with a deſire to be freed from Angus: but as there needed the utmoſt precaution to deceive that earl's great vigilance, it was not 'till the ſucceeding year that the King found opportunity to attempt executing his deſign.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

Very early this year, the Scotiſh court had ſent to England a grand embaſſy, at the head whereof was the earl of Caſſils, to treat of their King's marriage with Princeſs Mary: but, as ſeveral difficulties occurred, the truce, which was to expire the twenty-ſixth of January, was prolonged to the twenty-third of March (3), to give the earl of Caſſils time to take a journey to Scotland for new inſtructions. Nevertheleſs, there was no poſſibility of bringing matters to any concluſion, becauſe, in all appearance, Henry had never deſigned to beſtow his only daughter and heir on the King of Scotland: nor in reality does there appear any great advantage he could propoſe to reap from this match;

Negociations at Rome, &c. Guicciard.

Before the treaty of Moore was concluded, Charles had a great advantage in his negociations at Rome and Madrid. By reſtoring Sforza to Milan, he was almoſt ſure the Pope and Venetians would abandon France, and by deſiſting from his demand of the duchy of Burgundy, he could be certain Francis would readily reſign Milan, and not much concern himſelf with Italy: but he could not determine on doing either, and that made the negociations ſo tedious. After the treaty of Moore was ſigned, the face of his affairs was changed. Pope Clement was become more reſolute, and finding himſelf deceived by Charles who, in a ſecond ratification of their treaty, left the reſtoration of Sforza in a ſtate of uncertainty, flatly aſſured him, that no peace was to be expected without reſtitution of the Milaneſe. The Emperor had alſo reaſon to fear, that King Francis, ſeeing ſuch probability of his being ſo well ſupported, would be ſtill leſs compliant with reſpect to Burgundy: wherefore, perceiving the ſmall proſpect he had of obſtructing a league which was on the point of uniting againſt him ſo many Potentates, he was ſtrangely imbaraſſed. He muſt neceſſarily reſolve, and that ſpeedily, either to maintain, without any ally, the impending war, or to make peace with France. Both were equally perplexing: in chuſing war, he knew not where to find money; and, in making with his priſoner a forced peace, he could not expect to reap from his victory the advantages he propoſed. Happily for him, Francis, weary of his captivity, freed him from his perplexity, by offering to reſign the duchy of Burgundy, which had hitherto been the main obſtacle to a pacification: that obtained, Charles readily and ſeriouſly treated with him; whereas before he had only amuſed him. Not long after, they concluded the famous treaty of Madrid. The main articles to which Francis ſubmited were theſe; excluſively of many others, the recital whereof would here be abſolutely impertinent.

Finally, he promiſed, on the word and honor of a Prince, to execute all theſe articles, or, in caſe of non-performance, to return priſoner into Spain.

State of the Emperor's affairs at concluſion of the Madrid-treaty.

Had Francis not been ſo haſty to offer the duchy of Burgundy, he would, probably, have ſaved himſelf many troubles, and avoided reproaches which greatly ſullied his reputation (3). When this treaty of Madrid was concluded, Charles was under very great perplexities. Beſide thoſe already mentioned, he was certain that ſuch of the Princes and Hanſe Towns of Germany, as had imbraced Luther's doctrine, began to take meaſures to ſecure themſelves from the calamities wherewith they were menaced. To this was likewiſe added the dread of the Turks invading Hungary, which nearly affected the Emperor, on account of that kingdom's vicinity to his Auſtrian dominions: therefore, in all probability, had not Francis been ſo impatient and precipitate, Charles would rather have relinquiſhed Burgundy, than at once have expoſed himſelf to ſo many enemies. Theſe were the real motives which induced him to haſten concluding the Madrid treaty, directly contrary to the inſtances and great oppoſition of diverſe of his council, who repreſented, "That, infallibly, the agreement made with "him would be violated." His chancellor even refuſed to ſign it: but as that Monarch firmly believed he had cogent reaſons to run that hazard, he determined abſolutely, being perſuaded of its being the ſole means to prevent the league he dreaded. Whatever might happen, he hoped to be free from all by reſtoring Sforza to Milan, which however he did not intend to do but at the laſt extremity: mean while, by inſiſting too ſtrenuouſly on that article, he rendered all his meaſures ineffectual; he loſt his priſoner, without obtaining Burgundy, or preventing the league; in ſhort, after ſuſtaining many attacks, he was, as will be ſeen, forced to part with the duchy of Milan. But where is the Prince, be his abilities ever ſo great, who can foreſee all the conſequences of his own politics? When Charles V ſigned the treaty of Madrid, he imagined himſelf doing what would redound abundantly to his advantage. In reality, Francis would have dearly purchaſed his liberty, if, when he ſigned the treaty, he had actually intended inviolable obſervance: but it is too notorious that, when he gave his word, he deſigned to break it, ſince he had no ſooner ſet foot in his own dominions, but he refuſed to ratify the treaty. This was ſo little expected by Charles that, immediately after concluſion of the peace, he wrote to the Pontif that, notwithſtanding his promiſe to reſtore Sforza to Milan, it was however on condition that Sforza cleared himſelf of the crime of felony and treaſon laid to his charge: adding that, ſince the Princes of Italy were deſirous he ſhould not give the duchy of Milan to the archduke Ferdinand his brother, he would preſent it to the duke of Bourbon, in caſe Sforza was found guilty. In this belief, he ſtill inſiſted on Sforza's reſtoration without terms, being willing, before he ingaged with the Emperor, to ſee what the King of France would do. Francis arrives in his own dominions. Hall. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 129. Guicciard. Herbert.

What theſe refined politicians had foreſeen, came to paſs. Francis no ſooner ſet foot on his own territory, but he mounted a Turkiſh horſe and rode full ſpeed to St. John de Luz, whence he next day poſted to Bayona. The ſeventeenth of March, he ſigned bonds to King Henry for the ſums in which his mother the regent had ingaged him. By the way, hiſtorians fix this Prince's deliverance on the eighteenth of March, and yet theſe bonds are dated at Bayona the ſeventeenth of the ſame month. When he came to Bayona, Lanoy, who accompanied him as embaſſador, prayed him to ratify the treaty of Madrid: but Francis told him, That, having exceeded in the treaty the power of a King of France, in giving to his Imperial Majeſty the duchy of Burgundy, he muſt proceed to the performance by fair means, and indeavor to obtain the conſent of the Burgundians, and his other ſubjects approbation: that however he deſigned to execute the treaty, but wanted a little time to prepare for it. This anſwer might have ſufficiently convinced Lanoy of that Prince's intentions. He followed him however to Bourdeaux, where Francis's firſt care was to ratify the treaty concluded at Moore with the King of England (1). From Bourdeaux he came to Cognac, where he made ſome ſtay, having ſtill in his train the viceroy of Naples, who preſſed him from time to time to ratify and execute the treaty of Madrid, or return to Spain, according to his oath. To this, by way of excuſe, Francis alledged three reaſons, wherewith his ſaid excellency was far from being ſatisfied. The firſt was; that it was not in his power to reſign Burgundy, becauſe the Kings of France, not being proprietors of their dominion, could not legally diſmember it (2). The ſecond; that he was conſtrained to ſign the treaty of Madrid. The third; that, by his coronation oath, he was bound not to alienate any part of his kingdom, and this previous obligation invalidated that which he had taken at Madrid. The embaſſador replied to the firſt; that tho' he might not alienate any of his provinces, that was not to be underſtood of dominions unjuſtly acquired by the crown of France, as was the duchy of Burgundy. To the ſecond he anſwered, that it was left to his choice, either to remain in the ſtate whereinto the chance of war and the Almighty's decree had thrown him, or to be freed by a treaty: that he had even ſollicited it, and it was difficult to conceive in what the compulſion he exclaimed againſt did conſiſt. To the third he replied; that when his Majeſty ſwore to the treaty of Madrid, he was not ignorant of his coronation oath, and, very ſeemingly, did not believe the ſecond contrary to the firſt; that if it was otherwiſe, there would be reaſon to ſuſpect he had intended to impoſe on the Emperor's eaſineſs. Without examining here either the King's reaſons, or the embaſſador's anſwers, it ſuffices to ſay in brief, that Francis was determined.

The Pope's and Venetian embaſſadors repair to King Francis at Cognac.

The Pope, Venetians and duke of Milan, evidently foreſeeing that Francis would ſcruple executing the treaty of Madrid, had diſpatched embaſſadors, who found him at Cognac. They were received with great civilities, and the King immediately entered into treaty with them concerning a league againſt the Emperor. The league was actually concluded at Cognac, the ſeventeenth of May, between the Pope, King of France, duke of Milan, and Venetians (3); but it was not publiſhed 'till a month after, Francis pretending he could not ratify it before he had ſeen the ratifications of the other allies. The viceroy of Naples, having thereof ſome notice, ſummoned King Francis, for the laſt time, to execute the treaty of Madrid. Whereupon Francis told him plainly, it was not in his power to reſign Burgundy, notwithſtanding he had promiſed it. But to ſhew how deſirous he was to continue in amity with the Emperor his maſter, he offered to give him two millions of gold crowns, as an equivalent for Burgundy, and punctually to perform the reſt of the treaty.

League at Cognac againſt the Emperor. Guicciard. P. Daniel. Herbert. Hall.

Lanoy calls on the King; who offers two millions in lieu of Burgundy.

Thus were Charles's meaſures intirely broken. He had the King of France no longer in his power, and yet, was not leſs obliged to ſuſtain the efforts of the league newly concluded againſt him; not to mention the King of England, who probably would one time or other act offenſively. His whole refuge conſiſted in having the King of France's two ſons in hoſtage: nevertheleſs his imbaraſſment was not capable of bringing him to compliance on this occaſion: no, he choſe to run all hazards rather than conſent to the leaſt alteration of the treaty of Madrid. His reſolution being notified to Francis, the league was publiſhed at Cognac the eleventh of June. Two things haſtened the concluſion of this league. The firſt; that the caſtle of Milan, beſieged by the Imperialiſts, being hard preſſed, wanted a ſpeedy relief, and the Pope and Venetians durſt not ſend their troops into the field before they were aſſured of the league with France. The ſecond; that the King of France, deſigning to offer the Emperor two millions of crowns in lieu of Burgundy, believed this offer would meet with a readier acceptance after the concluſion of the league. It is certain, this was his ſole aim; and, if his offer had been accepted, he would never have ratified the league of Cognac: nay, after the league was publiſhed, neither himſelf nor the King of England ever made any conſiderable effort againſt the Emperor, their intent being only to frighten him, and obtain reſtitution of the two hoſtages on reaſonable terms. Thus, for once, the Italians were over-reached by the French and Engliſh, which merits attention as a no ſmall novelty. Mean while Francis and Henry, to purſue their game, made a new treaty, promiſing never to make peace with the Emperor, except he would reſtore the hoſtages and pay Henry what he owed him: not that this treaty bound them to take arms to procure each other the ſatisfaction demanded.

plied the Imperialiſts want of ſtrength, by exciting the Colonna family to make war upon his Holineſs, while his troops were in the Milaneſe. This unexpected attack, which the Holy Father could aſcribe only to the ſollicitations of Charles or his miniſters, induced him to reſolve on ſending into the kingdom of Naples the army commanded by the duke of Urbino in the Milaneſe, and to that end he obtained the conſent of the Venetians. But the duke of Seſſa, to avoid the invaſion wherewith the kingdom of Naples was threatened, ſo ordered it, that the Colonni gave the Pope all the ſatisfaction he deſired. The agreement was made at Rome the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, and the duke of Urbino was countermanded.

They ſubmit.

But about a month after, when his Beatitude leaſt expected it, the Colonni, with five or ſix thouſand men, entered Rome in the night between the nineteenth and twentieth of September, and ſo alarmed the Pontif that he retired in a fright to caſtle St. Angelo. As he was not very ſafe in that fortreſs, where he had not wherewithal to ſupport a ſiege, Moncada went to him, and repreſenting the danger he was in, and that beſide Rome was juſt on the point of being pillaged, he perſuaded him to make a ſeparate truce with the Emperor, for four months. This was more than was required by Charles, who had already ordered levies to be made in Germany, and was about to ſend back Lanoy to Naples with a ſtout band of Spaniards. When the truce was ſigned, the Pope's forces, which ſerved under the duke of Urbino, were recalled to Rome.

Mean while, his Holineſs was extremely ſurpriſed at the ſlowneſs of Francis, who, tho' principal author of the league, made yet no effort to oblige Charles to reſtore his ſons. Nor was he leſs aſtoniſhed at the King of England's indolence, becauſe, being ignorant that the league concluded at Moore was only defenſive, he had imagined both Kings were to attack the Emperor with all their forces: wherefore, to excite them by raiſing their jealouſy, he declared he would take a journey into Spain, to concert means with the Emperor to procure the peace of Europe. This declaration ſtrangely perplexed the French and Engliſh embaſſadors: they feared ſome great myſtery lay concealed in ſo extraordinary a reſolve, and therefore did their utmoſt to divert his Sanctity from his ſaid reſolution: but Henry uſed a more effectual means, namely, a preſent of thirty thouſand ducats, which abſolutely broke off all diſcourſe of this pretended journey.

While this paſſed at Rome, baron de Frondſperg was marching from Germany towards Italy with an army of thirteen or fourteen thouſand men, raiſed for the Emperor's ſervice: whereupon the duke of Urbino, who held the duke of Bourbon as it were beſieged in Milan, quited the neighborhood of that city, under color of oppoſing the paſſage of the Germans. Mean while, his Sanctity's imbaraſſment was not ſmall. The truce was ſoon to expire, Frondſperg was marching to Italy, and the viceroy of Naples was then in the iſland of Corſica, conducting to Naples a ſtrong reinforcement of Spaniards. The King of France made not the leaſt preparation to ſupport his allies, and the King of England ſhewed the ſame remiſſneſs. Mean while, Frondſperg, ſtill continuing his march, entered the Mantouan ſtate, where the Prince of Orange arrived to ſerve under him as a volunteer. Afterwards, about mid-December, he repaired to the Milaneſe borders, the duke of Urbino not being able or willing to oppoſe his march. Here he expected the duke of Bourbon, who was to join him; but was not yet in condition to execute that deſign. The difficulty aroſe from his not having money to pay his men, who poſitively refuſed to move a ſtep before they had received their arrears, and even threatened to ſack the city. There was no other method to prevent their puting in execution theſe menaces than to ſtrip the churches of their plate. This ſerved to pay part of what was due to the troops, who had ſcarce received any thing ſince the battle of Pavia, ſo deſtitute of money was the Emperor. The duke of Bourbon made uſe of another expedient to increaſe his treaſure: and that was, to have ſentence of death paſſed on chancellor Moroni, who, to redeem his life, gave him twenty thouſand ducats. He afterwards became one of his chief counſellors.

While the duke of Bourbon was imployed in raiſing Money, Lanoy, who was come to Naples with a body of Spaniſh troops, amuſed the Pope with negociations tending only to hinder him from taking ſure meaſures, by feeding him with hopes of a ſpeedy agreement with the Emperor. Theſe hopes however became more and more remote after Frondſperg's arrival. While Milan was in danger, Charles had intimated to the Pope, that if he required Franceſco Sforza to be brought to his trial, it was only to ſave the honor of the Empire, and he would give the judges private orders to declare him innocent: but, after the Germans arrived, he inſiſted on ſuch a pecuniary reparation, that Sforza was by no means able to anſwer his demands: wherefore the Emperor pretended that the Pope, Venetians and Florentines ſhould be his ſecurities.

Francis deceives the Pope and Venetians; Guicciard.

Pope Clement and the Venetians had expected that, immediately after concluſion of the league of Cognac, Francis would ſend a ſtrong army into Italy, and, in conjunction with the King of England, make a powerful diverſion on the borders of Spain and Flanders: but, as we have ſeen, they were very much miſtaken. Francis had concluded the league purely to terrify his adverſary, and in hopes it would induce him to accept the proffered equivalent. He was deſirous to avoid a war, and even thought himſelf ſo ſure of ſucceeding by that means, that he had made with the King of England no treaty to oblige them to arm, except in caſe of their being attacked: thus Henry, knowing how the King of France ſtood affected, took care to go no faſter than he. Couriers and expreſſes from the Pope and Venetians frequently came to the two courts to ſollicit them to war, but all in vain. On the contrary, even after his Holineſs and the Venetians had ſolemnly declared war againſt the Emperor, Francis ſent the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux to make him again the ſame offer of two millions of crowns in lieu of the duchy of Burgundy: but Charles diſdainfully rejected it, and charged the embaſſador to tell his maſter; "He had acted like "a knave and a villain, and ought not to have for-"got their laſt converſation (1)." cardinal his favorite was wholly buſied about his college at Oxford, for which he inceſſantly obtained freſh grants from Clement and Henry. The Pope durſt not refuſe him any thing at a time when he fancied he ſtood in need of his credit, to incline his royal maſter to war; and Henry was always ready to give him marks of his affection, by confirming whatever was granted by the Pope. This condeſcenſion of the Pontif and King proved fatal to diverſe ſmall monaſteries (1), which were ſuppreſſed by Wolſey, and their revenues applied to his college.

The Pope attempts perſuading Henry into the league of Cognac. Ib. p. 179—185. July. Auguſt. p. 187.

Ever ſince the league of Cognac was publiſhed, the Pope and Venetians had uſed their conſtant indeavors to perſuade Henry not only to accede to it, but declare himſelf protector. It is eaſy to gueſs with what view they paid him this deference. They hoped to find him the ſame as heretofore, ever ready to be inſnared, and to laviſh his treaſures on the concerns of others. There are, in Rymer's collection, ſeveral credentials of the Venetian embaſſadors addreſſed to the King, Queen, and cardinal, very ſeemingly to preſs King Henry's entering into this league: there is likewiſe Clement VII's commiſſion to Hubert Gambara and Gio. Baptiſta Sanga to treat with Henry. In this commiſſion the Pope ſaid, "That the circumſtances of the times "forcing the allies to conclude a league without the "King of England's participation, they had however agreed to declare him protector." Wherefore he imployed his two envoys to treat with that Monarch on his entering into the league, and to change or alter the articles, as ſhould be agreed with him; nay, to annul it intirely, if it was thought neceſſary, and conclude another. Moreover, he gave them powers to ſettle with him the penſion which was to be adjudged to him as protector of the league, if he would pleaſe to accept of the title: but this penſion, as appears elſewhere, was to be raiſed upon the duchy of Milan and the kingdom of Naples, after being conquered. Thus, on the hope of an imaginary penſion, Clement's view was to perſuade Henry to delare war with the Emperor, and conſequently to draw him into very great expenſes: but, for once, Henry would not be his tool: he knew experimentally what it was to join with the Popes in affairs relating to Italy.

Ferdinand of Auſtria the Emperor's brother, who had married Lewis's ſiſter Ann, pretended to the crown of that kingdom, and had for competitor John de Zapol, wayvod of Tranſilvania. They were both elected by two different parties: but John put himſelf under the protection of Sulyman, who cauſed him to be crowned at Buda, while Ferdinand was taking meaſures to proſecute his right.

But the attempt miſcarrying, the earl took ſevere vengeance on thoſe concerned.

Clement and the Venetians had begun the war in Italy, in the ſole expectation that Francis would ſend thither a powerful army, and the King of England make a diverſion on the Netherland ſide, or at leaſt, according to his cuſtom, furniſh money for maintaining the war. The eaſineſs wherewith he had been amuſed in the former wars, made his money relied on as a certain ſuccor, tho', when a peace or truce was ſtruck up, his intereſts were not even thought on: but the ſcene was changed. Henry, become wiſer by experience, was no longer diſpoſed to find money for other peoples concerns; beſide, the treaſure left him by the King his father being long ſince exhauſted, he could raiſe money only by his parliaments, who always framed difficulties, or made him purchaſe their ſubſidies with ſome extraordinary favors: ſo that Francis, not finding him in the ſame diſpoſitions as formerly, feared to ingage too far, before he was ſecure of his aſſiſtance (4). He was indeed ſenſible of his not being now inclined to favor the Emperor as before: but that did not ſuffice; it was alſo neceſſary to perſuade him to join in the league of Italy, otherwiſe the whole charge of the war muſt have fallen upon France, which was well drained of men, money and generals. For this reaſon, his aim was to induce the Emperor, thro' fear of the league, to accept the equivalent offered him for Burgundy, and to continue the war in Italy only 'till that Prince was reſolved, or the King of England abſolutely ingaged. To that end, he made the Pope and Venetians large promiſes, that they might not grow impatient, but performed them very ill. A ſmall body of troops levied in Italy, under command of the marquis of Saluzzo, was hitherto all he contributed for the league whereof he was himſelf the author and head. Mean while, Clement was exceedingly uneaſy at ſeeing the ſlowneſs or rather coldneſs of the two Monarchs, on whom he relied. Indeed he had no cauſe to complain of Henry, who had made him no promiſe, and yet he ceaſed not earneſtly preſſing him to undertake the defenſe of the church, as if the church could not have ſubſiſted if the Emperor remained maſter of Milan: but he received only general anſwers, Henry being unwilling to ingage in the affairs of Italy, whence he could reap no advantage. Mean while, the great expenſes his Holineſs was at threw him into inſupportable inconveniencies: for which reaſon he privately continued with the viceroy of Naples a negociation, with intent to haſten or retard it, according to the proceedings of the Kings of France and England. Herein he acted agreeably to his real temper, which made him conſider the having always two ſtrings to his bow as the ſureſt maxim of policy: but he was ever ſo unfortunate as to reap from his artifices fruits contrary to his hopes. As his ſole aim was to hinder the Emperor from keeping the duchy of Milan, to that end it was that he would have the Kings of France and England make conſiderable efforts; after which, he would not have ſcrupled forſaking them, provided the Emperor had ſatisfied him on that article. Francis was in no better diſpoſition with regard to his allies. His view was to recover his ſons out of Spain; and, could he have ſucceeded by treating alone with Charles, he would have little regarded the concerns of the Pope and Venetians. As for the republic of Venice, it was of great conſequence to her that the Emperor ſhould not remain maſter of the Milaneſe, and her expenſe to prevent it was nothing in compariſon of the prejudice ſhe would have received had Charles peaceably held that duchy: ſo, never ceaſing to ſollicit the Kings of France and England, ſhe continued the war, tho' faintly, in expectation that theſe two Monarchs would bear the greateſt part of the charge. The negociations which the Pope ſtill carried on with the viceroy of Naples afforded the Venetians a plauſible reaſon not to exert themſelves, becauſe they apprehended his inconſtancy would render ineffectual all their indeavors. The Emperor on his part was no leſs imbaraſſed. As he abounded not with treaſure, a vigorous war muſt have incommoded him extremely: and therefore, finding the King of France made no great efforts, he haſtened not ſending freſh ſupplies into Italy, for fear of exciting his enemies attention; beſide, ſince Frondſperg's arrival with the German troops, he thought himſelf ſtrong enough to keep the duchy of Milan, which was then the principal of his views. Such was the diſpoſition of theſe Potentates in the begining of 1527. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in Italy during this year, becauſe it ſerves for foundation to all the events treated of in the ſequel.

Charles's perplexity.

An' 1527. The duke of Bourbon quite moneyleſs, and greatly imbaraſſed. Guicciard.

The duke of Bourbon was under inconceivable difficulties for want of money to pay his forces. After repeated exactions on the inhabitants of Milan, he ſaw no way to maintain his army any longer, without danger of cauſing a general revolt in that great city, already not far from deſpair. On the other hand, the Germans conducted into Italy by Frondſperg had not touched a penny of their pay ſince their being liſted: it was therefore neceſſary, either to pay them their due, or otherwiſe recompenſe them, or elſe determine on being a ſpectator of the diſſipation of that army on which the Emperor wholly relied. To ſatisfy the troops, there was no other way but to lead them into the territories of the Church, of Florence, or of Venice: but the Venetian towns were too well gariſoned for him to entertain any hopes of booty from thence; eſpecially as he had no artillery; beſide, very likely, he was ſure the duke of Urbino would not oppoſe his deſigns, provided he did not moleſt the republic. So, reſolving to ſubſiſt his army on the Pope's territories, he left ſeven or eight thouſand Germans at Milan, under command of Antonio de Leva, and marched to join Frondſperg in the Plaſentin, where he ſtayed ſome time to raiſe contributions.

War between the Pope and viceroy of Naples.

Before the duke of Bourbon departed Milan, the viceroy of Naples had brought an army upon the borders of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate, to make a diverſion and force the Pope to recall thoſe troops he had ſent the duke of Urbino, ſince the truce expired. This army's approach had obliged Clement to raiſe forces to defend his dominions, not having thought proper to recall thoſe in Lombardy; whereby he found himſelf ingaged in a vaſt and very unuſual expenſe. Hitherto the Popes had found means to make war at the charge of others, and Clement VII had been in hopes of doing the like. He had granted Francis a tenth upon the clergy of France, which he was to divide with him; beſide which, Francis had promiſed to ſupply monthly forty thouſand crowns for the league, and twenty thouſand for his Sanctity in particular: but of all this, he had thitherto diſburſed only ten thouſand crowns. Thus the Pontif ſaw himſelf greatly loaded, without knowing how to get rid of this incumbrance, ſince it was no leſs difficult to raiſe money, than dangerous to make a ſeparate peace at ſuch a juncture. Mean while Henry VIII, being informed of his neceſſities, and fearing he would relinquiſh the league, ſent him thirty thouſand ducats, which helped to comfort him a little, and keep him in a reſolution of continuing the war.

Henry VIII. An' 1527.

It is needleſs to give the particulars of this war between Clement and the viceroy of Naples. It ſuffices to obſerve, that while hoſtilities were carrying on, the Holy Father, having notice of Bourbon's march, concluded a truce with the viceroy; for taking which courſe he had very cogent reaſons. He was not only burdened with the maintenance of two armies, but likewiſe found himſelf daily more remote from his hopes with reſpect to France and England. Francis performed nothing of what he had promiſed, and Henry ſhewed no great inclination to come into the league. Moreover, the procedure of the duke of Urbino, who commanded the confederate army in the Milaneſe, continually grew more ſuſpicious: beſide, Florence was in danger, and his Holineſs not over and above ſafe even in Rome. The conditions of the truce were:

Truce between the Pope and viceroy. Guicciard. P. Daniel. Herbert.

That it ſhould laſt eight months: that the Pope ſhould pay ſixty thouſand ducats to the duke of Bourbon's army; namely, forty thouſand on the twenty-firſt of the preſent month, and the reſt within eight days; and that the Imperial army ſhould quit the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate. The truce being publiſhed, Clement diſbanded all his troops, except two thouſand foot and two hundred horſe, and laid up his gallies before he was appriſed of the intentions of Bourbon, who was on a full march towards Bologna.

Guicciard.

The duke's troops conſiſted of five hundred men at arms, making a corps of about two thouſand cavalry; thirteen or fourteen thouſand Germans; five thouſand Spaniards, two thouſand Italian infantry, and a good number of light horſe of the ſame nation. This army departed from the neighborhood of Plaſenza in February, without money, proviſions, waggons, artillery, and ſubſiſting only by means of the contributions raiſed on their route. The duke not being able to enter Bologna, by reaſon the marquis of Saluzzo had thrown himſelf in with twelve thouſand men, ſtayed ſome time in the Bologneſe, where his army made a prodigious booty. Here he was informed of the truce, to which he would not conſent, becauſe the ſum he was to have ſufficed not to pay what was due to his army. This refuſal brought the viceroy of Naples from Rome to Florence, where the duke ſent an officer to confer with him. As the viceroy's intention was to induce Bourbon to accept the truce, in order to ſend the Imperial army into the ſtate of Venice, he agreed with the meſſenger, that the duke ſhould withdraw in five days; that eighty thouſand ducats ſhould be paid him down, and ſixty thouſand more in May. Clement, underſtanding this new agreement, diſmiſſed the two thouſand men he had retained, in order to be eaſed of the expenſe. But Bourbon, whether he had intended to deceive the viceroy, or could not reſtrain his army, after feigning to attack Florence, ſuddenly took the route to Rome, leaving far behind him the army of the Pope and Venetians, who had thrown themſelves into Florence.

Great was then the alarm at Rome. Clement, ſeeing himſelf without troops and money, knew not what courſe to take. In this diſtreſs, he commited the defenſe of Rome and himſelf to Renzo di Ceri, who made him hope that, with an army raiſed within the walls, he would ſecure the city from all inſults. The Pontif, confiding in his general's aſſurances, would neither quit Rome himſelf to provide for his ſafety, nor ſuffer any thing to be removed thence.

fore Rome on the fifth of May. The ſame day, pretending a deſign to proceed to Naples, he ſent the Pope a trumpet to demand a paſſage, which being refuſed, next morning at break of day he approached the ſuburbs by means of a very thick fog, and ſtormed a breach which the Romans had not had time to repair: but, in the begining of the attack, his thigh-bone was broke with a muſket-ſhot, of which he died inſtantly. The Prince of Orange, who was near him, throwing a cloak over his body, continued the aſſault. At length, after two hours reſiſtance, the breach was forced, and the Imperialiſts entered the ſuburbs: whereupon the Pope withdrew to caſtle St. Angelo, accompanied by thirteen cardinals, all the foreign embaſſadors, and ſome others of diſtinction. Mean while, the Imperialiſts were buſied in poſſeſſing themſelves of the Tyber, which was no difficult matter, conſidering the univerſal conſternation. Clement might ſtill have retired from the caſtle and ſecured his perſon: but, by a ſurpriſing infatuation, on notice of Bourbon's death, he was obſtinately bent, without any juſt reaſon, to continue in a place where he had neither proviſions, nor ammunition, nor a gariſon ſufficient to defend it. So many hiſtorians have deſcribed the ſacking of Rome, that to dwell here on that narrative would be quite needleſs. The reader may eaſily conceive what the thirſt of pillage may induce a diſorderly, ill-diſciplined army, and like this without a general, to perpetrate. Some hiſtorians have been pleaſed to caſt on the Proteſtants among Frondſperg's troops the whole blame of the outrages then commited: but the majority have not made any ſuch diſtinction, agreeing that the Spaniards ſhewed no more regard for the holy city than the Germans (1).

Had the confederates army cloſely followed the Imperialiſts, they might have fallen on them while moſt intent upon the plunder, and probably with ſucceſs. But, if we may believe Guicciardini, the duke of Urbino ſo ordered it, that the army came not before Rome 'till the end of May, and then raiſed ſo many objections againſt attempting the relief of caſtle St. Angelo, that the generals agreed to leave his Holineſs to extricate himſelf as he could. The allies retiring the firſt of June, Clement capitulated the ſixth, having ſent for the viceroy of Naples to treat with him: but the army, having choſen the Prince of Orange for general, repoſed not much confidence in the viceroy, neither would be guided by his counſels: ſo that the Holy Father was obliged to ſign, with Orange, and the principal officers of the army, a capitulation, importing;

That when the Pope ſhould quit Rome, he ſhould leave a legate, and the court of the Rota (2).

The capitulation being ſigned, captain Alarcon, the ſame who had the cuſtody of Francis when a priſoner, entering caſtle St. Angelo with three companies of Spaniards, and as many of Germans, ſet a ſtrict guard over Clement and the cardinals. During the confuſion cauſed by the Pontif's impriſonment, the duke of Ferrara poſſeſſed himſelf of Modena, the Venetians took Ravenna and Cervia, Sigiſmund Malateſta ſeized Rimini, and the Florentines, expeling the Pope's legate, recovered their liberty.

The Pope remains priſoner.

Several alterations Guicciard.

Some time after, all the troops which were in the kingdom of Naples repaired to Rome to ſhare in the booty, and glean what the avarice of the Spaniards and Germans had left. The Imperial army then at Rome conſiſted of twelve thouſand Germans, eight thouſand Spaniards, and four thouſand Italians: but the plague which preſently after raged among the troops, ſo diminiſhed them, that it is reported that, when it was time to enter upon action, ſcarce ten thouſand ſerviceable men remained. Mean while, the eager deſire of plunder occaſioned the Emperor's affairs to be ſo neglected, that the army continued utterly uſeleſs 'till the end of the year, whereas Bologna and the towns of La Romagna might have been reduced, which would have rendered that Monarch abſolutely inſuperable in Italy. Moreover this negligence gave Francis time to ſend troops into thoſe parts he would never have thought of, had Charles's generals, from their taking Rome and the Pope's captivity, reaped all the advantages their maſter might have naturally expected. It is time now to ſpeak of the affairs of England, the recital whereof has been interrupted by our introducing a ſummary of this year's events in Italy, which was indeed abſolutely neceſſary for rightly comprehending the ſequel.

The Imperial army becomes uſeleſs. Guicciard.

Guicciard.

Since Francis had refuſed to execute the treaty of Madrid, he never ceaſed preſſing Henry's acceſſion to the league of Cognac: but whether Henry penetrated into that Prince's deſigns, or hoped by managing the Emperor to make himſelf umpire of the peace, he had kept within the bounds of the defenſive league concluded at Moore. At length, finding that, to all appearance, the Pope and Venetians could not long maintain the war, he was apprehenſive Charles would poſſeſs himſelf of all Italy, and with that increaſe of power become too formidable to Europe. In effect, it might readily be comprehended that, in order to diveſt him of the ſuperiority he was acquiring over France, England would one day be obliged to make greater efforts than were neceſſary to prevent his attaining it. Theſe conſiderations were farther corroborated by the inſtances of cardinal Wolſey, whom Francis had taken care to gain to his intereſt, otherwiſe, very probably, all theſe reaſons would have been ineffectual. So about the cloſe of the preceding year, Henry had ſent to Paris ſir William Fitz-Williams, to acquaint the King of France, that he was ready to join with him in a league offenſive, and give him in marriage his daughter Princeſs

Mary. Francis gladly imbracing the propoſal, the treaty was begun at Paris by the biſhop of Bath and Wells, the Engliſh embaſſador in ordinary, and Fitz-Williams: but, as ſeveral difficulties occurred which depended on the King of England's determination, Francis judged it properer to ſend embaſſadors to London, there to conclude the affair. He made choice for that purpoſe of Gabriel d'Aigremont, or de Gramont biſhop of Tarbe, and viſcount de Turenne, with whom were joined the preſident of Roan, and baron de Vaux, who where already in England. Theſe embaſſadors concluded with cardinal Wolſey, appointed commiſſioners to negociate with them, three treaties, which were ſigned the thirtieth of April 1527, while the duke of Bourbon was marching to Rome.

" II. That, if he rejected the offers, or gave not his anſwer within twenty days, the two Kings ſhould proclaim war againſt him."

Another article of this treaty contained a mutual ingagement for the marriage of Francis, or his ſon the duke of Orleans with Princeſs Mary, at the King of France's option, and upon ſuch terms as ſhould be agreed on at a convenient time (1). Probably, this treaty was to be made public, in order to induce the Emperor to deſiſt from his claim to Burgundy, and be ſatisfied with the proffered equivalent.

By the ſecond treaty it was ſtipulated:

2d Treaty. Herbert. p. 81. Du Tillet.

" I. That, in caſe Charles rejected their propoſals, or defered his anſwer, all commerce with his ſubjects ſhould, by the two Kings, be inhibited; allowing them however forty days to withdraw their effects.

" II. That the two Kings ſhould make war upon the Emperor in the Netherlands, with an army of thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred men at arms, and that two thirds of the infantry, and all the cavalry (2) ſhould be furniſhed by the King of France.

" III. That they ſhould equip a fleet with fifteen thouſand men, whereof the King of France ſhould find ten thouſand.

" IV. That if the King of Portugal, or any other Prince or ſtate, ſhould join with the Emperor, they ſhould be declared enemies to both the Kings.

" VI. That the King of France ſhould indeavor to perſuade the King of Navarre and duke of Gueldres *, to make war upon the Emperor.

The ſubſtance of the third treaty was:

" I. That this treaty ſhould not derogate from that of Moore, which remained in its full force.

" II. That there ſhould be perpetual peace between Francis and Henry, and their reſpective ſubjects.

" IV. Henry renounced, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, all right and title to the kingdom of France, and in general to whatever Francis then actually poſſeſſed.

" V. In conſideration whereof, Francis bound himſelf and ſucceſſors, for ever, to pay Henry's ſucceſſors a yearly penſion of fifty thouſand crowns, at two payments; namely, on the firſt of May, and the firſt of November, and that the payment of ſuch penſion ſhould commence on the firſt of thoſe two days which ſhould happen after Henry's deceaſe, without deduction of what ſhould remain to be paid at Henry's death, of the two millions ſtipulated by the treaty of Moore.

" VI. Moreover Francis obliged himſelf to give Henry annually, beſide the ſaid fifty-thouſand crowns penſion, fifteen thouſand crowns worth of ſalt of Bruage (3).

" VII. That, to prevent the objection which might hereafter be made, That a King cannot bind his ſucceſſors, the two Kings ſhould cauſe the treaty to be confirmed by the ſtates of their reſpective realms, and held as a law perpetual and inviolable.

That the treaty ſhould be approved and confirmed by the archbiſhops, biſhops, Princes, dukes, earls, barons, and other grandees of the two kingdoms, whoſe names were inſerted in this article, under forfeiture of all their goods; and by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, Roan, Bourdeaux, as well as by the courts of judicature in England."

Alterations in the ſecond treaty on account of the ſacking Rome.

The news of the ſacking Rome and the Pope's captivity arriving preſently after concluſion of theſe treaties, the two Kings thought fit to alter the article of the ſecond, concerning their carrying war into the Netherlands, and to agree on acting only in Italy. But as the Engliſh troops could not, without great difficulties and loſs of time, be tranſported into Italy, they ſtipulated, that Francis alone ſhould undertake the war, for a certain valuable conſideration (4) to be allowed him by Henry monthly, 'till the end of October. This laſt treaty was ſigned the twenty-ninth of May, about three weeks after Rome was taken.

The Emperor's memorial to a peace. Ib. p. 200.

While his eminence was at Abbeville, he received a memorial from the Emperor, containing his anſwer to the King of France's offers to the viceroy of Naples. He had at firſt, as was obſerved, diſdainfully rejected theſe offers, nay, even refuſed to hear them mentioned: but, the ſituation of his affairs being altered by the league between France and England, he believed it would be better by a peace, to terminate all diſputes, than run the hazard of maintaining the war alone againſt ſo many powerful enemies. It was therefore in order to a pacification that he ſent Wolſey this anſwer, wherewith he imagined to have reaſon to hope Francis and Henry would be ſatisfied.

As this memorial is extremely proper to illuſtrate the hiſtory of thoſe times, doubtleſs our inſerting its ſubſtance will be not altogether unacceptable.

The Emperor began with proteſting, " That, " by what he offered in this memorial, his mean- " ing was not any way to derogate from the treaty " of Madrid, but only in ſuch points as were there- " to repugnant: that, as to the hoſtages, King " Francis was not ignorant of the reaſon of their " being in Spain, and had it in his power to reco- " ver them." Then he ſet forth the offers made by Francis to the viceroy of Naples, containing theſe four articles, viz.

The King of France's offers to the Emperor.

" I. That he would execute the treaty of Ma- " drid, provided Franceſco Sforza was reſtored to " the duchy of Milan.

" II. That he would give the Emperor, in lieu " of Burgundy, two millions of gold, payable, " thus; a good ſum down when Queen Leonora " ſhould be delivered to him, and the reſt at a day " to be appointed, and then his ſons ſhould be re- " ſtored; except his Imperial Majeſty choſe to " have the whole ſum at once, and deliver at the " ſame time the Queen and the two hoſtages.

" III. That he would pay the King of England " what was owing him by the Emperor.

" IV. He demanded that the Emperor ſhould " augment Queen Leonora's dowry in proportion " to the ſum he was to receive, ſince he could do it " without any charge to himſelf."

To theſe four articles the Emperor replied, by the eight following declarations; viz.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1527.

" I. That what ſhould be ſtipulated, ſhould not " be prejudicial to the treaty of Madrid, except in " ſuch things as ſhould be altered by mutual conſent.

" II. That the Emperor's right to Burgundy ſhould " remain intire, as before the treaty of Madrid.

" III. That all the articles of the treaty of Ma- " drid, except ſuch as were mentioned in theſe of- " fers, ſhould remain intire.

" IV. Remark on this memorial.

On a cloſe examination of this the Emperor's anſwer, it will manifeſtly appear, that he ſimply and abſolutely accepted of the French King's offers, under terms denoting that it was he who gave rather than received law, and by his declarations only obviated all cavils. As to what he farther demanded, it was under ſuch reſtrictions, that he ſeemed willing to ſtand to the King of England's determination, which, at ſuch a juncture, was the ſame thing as to depart from his pretenſions while he was making the demand. There was only a ſingle point concerning which he could not reſolve to ſubmit; namely, the duke of Milan's affair: but this was a point newly propoſed by the King of France, and which had no relation to the Madrid treaty, wherein not a tittle was to be met with that way tending; nevertheleſs it is obvious that, had this been the ſole obſtacle to a pacification, he would alſo have granted it, ſince he reſerved a way to come off with honor; namely, by cauſing Sforza to be declared innocent, in the manner he had himſelf propoſed to Pope Clement. Francis would have accepted the peace, on the terms offered in the memorial, had Charles at firſt come to that reſolution: but ſince he had made theſe offers to the viceroy of Naples, the face of affairs was very much altered, as he had intirely gained King Henry to his intereſt, and as, after the taking Rome, it was to be feared the Emperor would render himſelf maſter of all Italy. Mean while, Charles's offers, which were in effect the ſame Francis had made to the viceroy of Naples, were either to be accepted or rejected: but, as it was not Henry's buſineſs to anſwer it, ſince the affair did not directly concern him, he only ſent the memorial to the King of France, who, no longer deſirous of peace, diſingaged himſelf in this manner. Firſt, he demanded that Sforza ſhould be reſtored unconditionally. Secondly, that his ſons ſhould be delivered before he recalled his forces from Italy (where Lautrec was now arrived) offering to depoſit three hundred thouſand ducats in the hands of the king of England for ſecurity of his ingagement. There could not be a more evident demonſtration of his little deſire to execute the Madrid treaty, tho' the ſame terms only were demanded as were offered by himſelf preſently after his deliverance. His meaning was, after having withdrawn his hoſtages, to have the execution of the treaty in his own power, under color of offering to depoſit for ſecurity three hundred thouſand ducats in the hands of a Prince devoted to him, and who, by a private treaty, was ingaged to make his intereſt his own. Charles, not in a diſpoſition to be thus inſnared, offered on his part to depoſite the ſame ſum in the hands of the King of England, for pledge that the hoſtages ſhould be reſtored: but his offer being rejected, a ſtop was there put to the negociation, and only war imployed the parties thoughts. Mean while, Charles, deſirous of convincing the world that it was not his fault a peace was not concluded, gave England's, the Pope's and Venetians embaſſadors the ſame anſwer he had ſent to cardinal Wolſey. They all ſeemed very well ſatisfied, and ſaid their maſters would doubtleſs accept a peace on theſe terms, and ſend orders to conclude it: but they knew not that the Kings of France and England had changed their minds, and taken new reſolutions.

Francis's conference with Wolſey.

If King Francis and cardinal Wolſey were to confer together at Abbeville, it was not to ſtudy means of accommodation, but rather to concert on ſuppoſition that a war with the Emperor was inevitable. Francis being come to Abbeville the firſt of Auguſt, his eminence repaired thither, where having confered they, on the eighteenth, concluded three treaties, which properly were only ſupplements, explanations and reſtrictions of thoſe three which preceded.

By the firſt it was agreed:

Three new treaties. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 203, &c.

" I. That, as he had left it to the King of " France's option to marry Princeſs Mary, or " leave her for the duke of Orleans his ſecond ſon, " the duke ſhould eſpouſe the Princeſs when they " ſhould both be of age. That then, and not be- " fore, ſhould be ſettled the marriage-articles con- " cerning the dowry, the education of the duke of " Orleans in England, and the like. Moreover, " that, whether the marriage ſhould be conſum- " mated, or the two Kings think fit to diſpoſe of " their children otherwiſe, their friendſhip ſhould " remain firm and inviolable, the marriage being " only to be conſidered as a ſupplement to the " treaties of the thirtieth of April, and not as part " of thoſe treaties.

" II. That the treaty concluded at Moore " ſhould remain in full force.

" III. That the project of the interview of the two " Kings ſhould be laid aſide, on account of the " ſeaſon and circumſtances of affairs.

" IV. As, by the treaty of the twenty-ninth of " May, it was ſtipulated, that the King of Eng- " land ſhould contribute a certain ſum for the war " of Italy, it was by this concluded, that, in " caſe the Emperor accepted the offers the two " Kings ſhould make him by their embaſſadors, " the ſaid contribution ſhould ceaſe without any " prejudice to the treaty of peace: but if he re- " jected them, the treaty of league offenſive and " defenſive ſhould ſubſiſt, on condition that, dur- " this campain, the King of England ſhould be " deemed to have diſcharged his part of the treaty " by his contribution for the war in Italy.

" V. That the King of England ſhould not ever " make any ſort of demand upon the King of " France on pretenſe of his charges towards the " Italian war.

" VI. That, to prevent all diſputes, without " examining the number of troops which the King " of France maintained in Italy, the King of Eng- " land ſhould pay for the month of June laſt twenty " thouſand crowns, for the month of July laſt " thirty thouſand crowns, and thirty two thouſand " two hundred and twenty-two for each of the " three following months: on condition however " that if, in thoſe three latter months, the Engliſh " commiſſaries found in the army of Italy a ſmaller " number of troops than what the King of France " was to maintain, the contribution ſhould be " leſſened in proportion. Moreover, if a peace " was made during thoſe ſaid three months, the " contribution ſhould ceaſe the day the peace was " concluded.

By the ſecond treaty, which concerned only trade, Francis promiſed, " He would grant the Engliſh " merchants ſuch privileges as ſhould be agreed on " hereafter." p. 209.

By a third treaty the two Kings were bound: p. 212. Herbert.

" Firſt, not to conſent to the calling a general " council during Pope Clement's captivity.

" Secondly, to receive no bull, brief or mandate " from the ſaid Pontif (1) 'till he was releaſed.

"Thirdly, that 'till his Holineſs ſhould reſume "the eccleſiaſtical government, whatever might "be determined in England by the cardinal legate, "aſſiſted by the principal clergy (1), and in France "by the members of the Gallican church, ſhould "be punctually executed."

Theſe treaties being concluded, King Francis ratified them, and ſwore to the obſervance before he left Abbeville. Cardinal Wolſey did the like in his maſter's name, by virtue of his full powers and title of vicar-general, which he had received on this occaſion: which done, he re-paſſed over to England, to give Henry account of the ſucceſs of his negociation (2).

Henry's freſh demands on the Emperor. Herbert. p. 86.

Henry, being determined on proclaiming war againſt the Emperor, but willing to conceal the real motives, demanded of him, by his embaſſadors, four particulars, which he knew could not then be performed. The firſt was, "That he ſhould diſ-"charge what had been borrowed of him, or of "his father King Henry VII. The ſecond, "That he ſhould pay him five hundred thouſand "crowns, to which he was obliged in caſe he eſ-"pouſed not Princeſs Mary, to whom he was af-"fianced. The third, "That, according to the "tenor of the treaty, he ſhould ſatisfy him for his "penſion from the King of France, whereof there "was now due four years and four months. The fourth, "That he ſhould releaſe the Pope, and "ſatisfy him for all the damages cauſed by his "troops." The anſwer Charles made the embaſ-ſadors was: "That he had never denied his be-"ing debtor to the King of England; but was "ſurpriſed he ſhould, at this juncture, inſiſt ſo "much on payment: that, at leaſt, when the mo-"ney was required, offer ſhould be made of reſtor-"ing the obligations. 2. That he would write to "the King their maſter to acquaint him, why he "did not think himſelf liable to the penalty of "the five hundred thouſand crowns, for not ac-"compliſhing the marriage. 3. That orders were "ſent into Italy to ſet the Pope at liberty." He made no reply, as to making ſatisfaction for the penſion, becauſe he, very probably, conſidered it as included in the article of the debts which he acknowledged himſelf ingaged to diſcharge; as indeed nothing was more reaſonable.

The Emperor's anſwer. Herbert.

Aſſembly of the grandees of France. Mezerai.

The Emperor's replies were not ſatisfactory to King Henry, who only ſought occaſion of quarrel. On the other hand, Francis having, in September, called together the chief men, which is, properly to ſay, perſons devoted to him, declared to them all the ſteps he had made towards a pacification with the Emperor; and it may be readily preſumed that he took no great pains in the explication of what might be alledged againſt him by that Monarch. Having repreſented the matter as to him ſeemed requiſite, he ſaid, "He was ready to return to his "priſon, if it was judged that, in honor or con-"ſcience, he was obliged ſo to do." The aſſembly unanimouſly replied, "That his perſon belonged "to the realm, and it was not in his power to diſ-"poſe of it according to his pleaſure: that more-"over, he could not alienate the provinces of the "crown; but if the Emperor would accept of a "ranſom for the two Princes in hoſtage, they would "give two millions of gold to redeem them." It muſt have been wilful blindneſs not to perceive what was the deſign of this farce, intirely managed by the court. Mean while, Francis, after this deciſion, imagining that he might, with a ſafe conſcience, go to war with the Emperor, thought only of means to recover his ſons by force of arms: he was however ſtill in hopes that the dread of a war would induce Charles to mitigate the Madrid-treaty. This was not any longer on account of Burgundy, ſince he could not be ignorant of Charles's having accepted the offered equivalent: but he hoped, by means of the war, to procure a new treaty which ſhould annul that of Madrid. Thus many Princes play with their words and oaths, and ſeek to blind themſelves, or at leaſt the public, while none about them dare utter the truth. The Emperor kept his word no better, with regard to the duchy of Milan; and Henry VIII ſcrupled not breaking his league with Charles, as he had done that with Francis. Princes never want excuſes when they are diſpoſed to violate a treaty: but the world is not always blind, tho' people often ſeem ſo. Moſt probably, the Sovereigns themſelves are not ſo hoodwinked, but they ſee the irregularity of their conduct, tho', countenanced by the public's diſſimulation, they affect great ſecurity; but at length a time comes, when poſterity, leſs prepoſſeſſed, does univerſal juſtice and gives things their right names.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1527.

Francis's aim.

Charles, Francis and Henry act with inſincerity.

The aſſembly's opinion.

Francis, deſirous of cultivating the friendſhip newly contracted with Henry, ſent him the order of St. Michael (3) by Ann de Montmorency (4), one of the knights. This noble French peer was impowered to diſpenſe with Henry's oath, in whole or in part, as the new knight ſhould think fit, or even to be contented with his bare word. Henry condeſcended to ſwear obſervance to all the ſtatutes of the order of St. Michael, which were not contrary to thoſe of the Garter, or any order he had already received. Then he ſent the order of the Garter to Francis, by Arthur * viſcount Liſle, natural ſon of Edward IV (5), and Francis took the uſual oath of the order, with like reſtrictions. This French embaſſy, which arrived in England about the end of October, had a reception ſo pompous and magnificent, that Du Bellai, who accompanied the embaſſador, aſſures us he had never beheld any thing comparable. The Engliſh embaſſador was as nobly received in France, there having ever been between Francis and Henry a certain emulation, which frequently drew them to needleſs expenſes: but it was moſt inconvenient for Francis, by reaſon of his continual wars with the Emperor, wherein Henry was no farther ingaged than he pleaſed; nay, he no otherwiſe paid the very contribution for the war of Italy than by deductions from the ſums owed him by Francis (6), as appears in Rymer. Thus Francis was forced to diſburſe all the monies imployed in that war, whereof we muſt now examine the ſequel.

was then far from being plenty with him, he could only pay part of what he had promiſed, and therefore his captivity was longer than he at firſt expected; they in whoſe cuſtody he was not being diſpoſed to take his word for payment. It was not ſooner than the begining of June that Charles had notice of the ſacking Rome, and Clement's impriſonment; and upwards of a month more paſſed before he came to any reſolution in that affair. As he doubted not this buſineſs would make great noiſe in the world, he was willing to ſee, before he determined, how the Kings of France and England would take it, in order to proceed accordingly.

Herbert.

The ſecond of Auguſt, he wrote Henry a letter of excuſe, concerning the outrages commited by his troops at Rome, and the violence offered the Pope's perſon, wherein he proteſted he was not any way concerned: and, at the ſame time, he deſired his counſel what was to be done on this occaſion, as if he ſtill deemed him his good friend and ally; but all this was merely to gain time, 'till he received Francis's anſwer to the memorial ſent cardinal Wolſey. On the other hand, the Pope, tho' narrowly watched, had found means to write to Henry (1), and cauſed the thirteen cardinals, who were confined with him, to do the like, requeſting his protection, and intreating him to imploy his indeavors to deliver them from their unhappy ſituation. Henry, on receipt of theſe letters, ſent orders to his embaſſadors in Spain, to demand of Charles the Pope's and cardinals liberty: to which the Emperor anſwered in general terms, that he would do what lay in his power for the King of England's ſatisfaction. Mean while, he was thinking of conveying the Pope into Spain, in expectation of making a better bargain with him than if he left him in Italy. Of this cardinal Wolſey informed Henry by a letter, from Abbeville, dated July twenty-nine.

Letter to Henry from the Pope and impriſoned cardinals. Burnet. Vol. III. Herbert.

Charles attempts to ſet Francis and Henry at variance.

Certain it is that Henry's inſtances in Pope Clement's behalf greatly imbaraſſed the Emperor. He found that Francis and Henry would not fail joining their counſels and forces againſt him, under color of laboring for the Pope, and this union could not but break all his meaſures with regard to his affairs in Italy. He therefore believed that, before all things, he ſhould try to divide thoſe Potentates, by ſowing between them jealouſies and ſuſpicions.

Herbert.

One of his expedients to effect this, was propoſing to Wolſey a match between the duke of Richmond, King Henry's natural ſon, and Iſabella Princeſs of Portugal, with whom he offered in dower the duchy of Milan. The cardinal herewith informed his Sovereign, by a letter of the thirty-firſt of July, telling him withal, that the offer was not much to be relied on; but it was however proper to ſeem to liſten to it, becauſe it was neceſſary ſtill to preſerve ſome correſpondence with the Emperor. This doubtleſs related to the affair of the divorce, whereof I ſhall ſpeak preſently: for, by a letter of the firſt of Auguſt, Wolſey acquainted the King with the then currency of a report in Spain, that he deſigned to divorce his Queen; but that it was requiſite to ſend orders to his embaſſadors at Madrid to ſtifle the rumor as much as poſſible: that to this end, they might ſay, it had no other foundation than the biſhop of Tarbe's ſcruples concerning Princeſs Mary's marriage with the duke of Orleans, as if there was room to queſtion the Princeſs's legitimacy. The Emperor alſo put in practiſe another method to divide Francis and Henry, which was attempting to gain cardinal Wolſey by advantageous offers (2) but, for this once, he could not ſucceed; whether Wolſey was now too far ingaged with Francis, or was bent to be revenged on the Emperor, who had twice deceived him, or whether the buſineſs of the divorce was already determined, in which caſe it was not poſſible for him to undertake eſpouſing the Emperor's intereſts.

The Emperor indeavors to corrupt Wolſey.

Henry VIII. An' 1527.

When Francis heard of Rome's deſolation, he perceived it was time to lay aſide artifice, and neceſſary to ſend a powerful aid into Italy, otherwiſe the Venetians would infallibly conclude a peace with the Emperor; and, in reality, it was not likely they could or would bear the burden of a war alone: wherefore his firſt care was to make a new treaty with them, to bring each into the field ten thouſand men, and levy ten thouſand Swiſſers at a common charge. The Venetians deſired nothing more than to be ſupported by France, becauſe they juſtly dreaded the army which had ſacked Rome would be imployed againſt them. Indeed, had the duke of Bourbon been ſtill living, or the viceroy of Naples able to influence the army, the Venetians would undoubtedly have been attacked, being the only enemies the Emperor had in Italy: but, happily for them, the Imperial troops being wholly intent on the plunder of Rome, without thinking of any farther exploits, the peſtilence, which broke out among them, carried off two thirds of their army. Finally, the contagion deſtroying them by heaps, they left Rome, and diſperſed themſelves in in the neighboring country. After which, having ſacked Terni and Narni, and put Spoleto to ranſom, the Germans parted from the Spaniards, and returned to Rome. Thus diſcord ariſing in the army, which ill obeyed the Prince of Orange, tho' they had choſen him general, they projected nothing to improve their victory for the Emperor's advantage. On the contrary, by their negligence, they gave Francis time to ſend a force into Italy, under conduct of Lautrec, who was declared general of the league he had newly concluded with the Venetians. As for the duke of Urbino, he remained in the Milaneſe with part of the Venetian army.

Lautrec general of the league. Guicciard. Herbert.

Lautrec arrived in Piemont in July, with part of the army he was to command. The marquis of Saluzzo was ordered to join him with his Italians, and the Swiſſers were ſoon to follow. While he was imployed in conqueſts of little moment, waiting the junction of all his forces, Andrea D'Oria, who had quited the Pope's ſervice, and commanded the French gallies, to which he had joined eight others of his own, found means to reduce his native city Genoua under Francis's dominion. This was a good opening of a campain, which ſeemed to promiſe a moſt advantageous ſucceſs in the reſt of the war, eſpecially as Lautrec, after aſſembling his army, twenty-five thouſand ſtrong, became maſter of Vigevano, Aleſſandria, and Pavia. Sforza and the Venetians earneſtly preſſed him to beſiege Milan; but he ſhewed them poſitive orders to march to Naples. The King of France took care not to imploy his army to conquer the duchy of Milan, which by the treaty of league was to be reſtored to Sforza, after which, the Venetians would give themſelves but little trouble to accompliſh his attempt upon Naples: beſide, he ſtill hoped that, by conſenting the Emperor ſhould keep Milan, he might recover his ſons, whereas in reſtoring Sforza he ſhould deprive himſelf of that means. Lautrec therefore began his march for the kingdom of Naples, but with ſuch deliberateneſs and affected delays, that it was evident he had private orders not to make too much haſte: and indeed, it was at the very juncture when Francis expected the Emperor's final anſwer to the offers made him by his and Henry's embaſſadors. Lautrec long halted at Parma and Plaſenza, which had opened their gates to him. Mean while, the duke of Ferrara joined with France, as well on account of the march of Lautrec, who might eaſily have ravaged his country, as of Francis's proffer to give in marriage Renée of France, ſecond daughter of Lewis XII, to his ſon Hercules. The duke of Mantoua preſently after followed his example.

Mean while, Charles finding the ill effects of the Pontif's captivity, had diſpatched the general of the order of St. Francis to the viceroy of Naples, with injunctions to releaſe his Sanctity. This general, finding the viceroy ſeized with a diſtemper whereof he died in few days, delivered his Imperial Majeſty's orders to Hugo de Moncada, to be by him put in execution. Charles had given general inſtructions, that Clement ſhould ingage to diſcharge all arrears due to the army, and, on recovery of his liberty, give ſecurity for his forſaking the league. But, as that Pontif could not eaſily procure ſureties, or monies requiſite to pay the army, the negociation was tedious. Mean while, by private meſſengers, he was continually preſſing Lautrec to approach Rome, that his deliverance might be facilitated. But that general had expreſs orders which prevented his haſtening; yet his march, tho' ſlow, was of good ſervice to Clement. Moncada, ſeeing the kingdom of Naples on the point of being invaded, and that it was not poſſible to conduct thither the Imperial army which was at Rome, without ſupplying at leaſt ſome of its arrears, at length concluded with the Pontif a treaty to this effect: viz.

I. That his ſaid Holineſs ſhould not oppoſe the Emperor in what related to either Naples or Milan.

II. That he ſhould grant the Emperor a Croiſade in Spain, and a tenth in the reſt of his dominions.

III. That the Emperor ſhould keep Civita Vecchia, Oſtia, Citta Caſtellana, and the caſtle of Furli.

IV. That the Pope ſhould pay down to the German troops ſixty thouſand ducats, and thirty-five thouſand to the Spaniards.

V. That in a fortnight after, he ſhould pay them another certain ſum, and within three months all what remained due to the Emperor, amounting to upwards of three hundred and fifty thouſand ducats.

The treaty being ſigned, and the cardinals of Ceſis and Orſino delivered in hoſtage, it was agreed that, on the tenth of December, Clement ſhould be removed from caſtle St. Angelo, and conducted to a place appointed: but, as he was apprehenſive of longer confinement, becauſe he was unable to perform the treaty, he eſcaped in diſguiſe the night before, and ſhut himſelf up in Orvieto.

When Lautrec underſtood Clement was free, he reſtored to him the city of Parma, and marched to Bologna, where he ſtayed three weeks expecting freſh orders from Francis. Some days after, he received a letter from his Sanctity, acknowledging himſelf indebted to him for his liberty, intimating withal, that having been conſtrained to grant the Imperialiſts whatever they required, he did not think himſelf obliged to keep his word with them.

Guicciard.

It was while the Pope was priſoner in caſtle St. Angelo, that Henry's divorce from Queen Catherine was ſet on foot; a momentous affair, if ever any was ſuch, as well in itſelf, as on account of the parties concerned, and chiefly for its effects. It was not yet thirty years ſince Lewis XII put away his wife without any difficulty, or much noiſe in the world. Henry VIII was diſpoſed to attempt the like; and, tho' ſupported with much more plauſible reaſons, he met with multifarious obſtacles, not to be ſurmounted without ſome extraordinary ſtep, and which made room for introducing the reformation into England. This effect diſtinguiſhed Henry VIII's divorce from ſo many others, which are but ſlightly mentioned by hiſtorians. The writers on this ſubject being either Catholics or Proteſtants, have conſidered it variouſly. The Catholics have thence drawn arguments againſt the reformation in England, and repreſented Henry's divorce as the next and immediate cauſe of the change of religion; whereas the Proteſtants affirm it was only the occaſion. Three Engliſh authors eſpecially have writ the hiſtory of this divorce, beſide many others of the ſame nation, or foreigners. who have touched thereon in their works. Sanderus, or rather Sanders, author of the Origin and Progreſs of the Engliſh Schiſm, makes it his buſineſs to defame Henry VIII, and ſhew that the reformation in England, which he terms ſchiſm, intirely ſprang from Henry's paſſion for Ann Boleyn. He thereby imagined to give a mortal wound to the reformation, and induce the world to think, that a ſuperſtructure raiſed on ſuch a foundation could not be the work of God. Lord Herbert, in his hiſtory of Henry VIII, contents himſelf with a bare recital of the events of this reign, whereof the divorce is one of the principal, without many reaſonings, leaving his readers to draw inferences from the facts he relates. Doctor Burnet, intending to write the hiſtory of the reformation of England, made it his chief aim, in ſpeaking of Henry's divorce, to demonſtrate, that, tho' it occaſioned the reformation, it was only by accident: and for this reaſon, he has indeavored to refute the palpable falſehoods aſſerted by Sanders in his hiſtory. He has ſucceeded ſo well, that no ſincere man can, for the future, acknowledge Sanders for a writer worthy any credit.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1527.

Reaſon why this divorce made ſo much noiſe.

Remarks on Sanders. Herbert, and Burnet.

The ſequel of my hiſtory obliges me to ſpeak, in my turn, of this famous divorce. I ſhould be inclined to refer the reader to the forementioned excellent Hiſtory of the Reformation of England, univerſally known, and to which it is difficult to make any additions; but it would not be reaſonable to oblige the readers to remember what they have there met with, or to reiterate the peruſal. Wherefore I ſhall chuſe, in purſuing the thread of my hiſtory, to inlarge on this event, which is as the hinge whereon do turn numberleſs other matters, which that worthy author had occaſion only to mention, but which I muſt more fully explain, becauſe our ends are different. His aim, in ſpeaking of Henry VIII's affairs with the Pope, Emperor, and King of France, was to illuſtrate the Hiſtory of the Reformation, and mine is not to meddle with religious affairs any farther than they relate to the other occurrences of this reign.

Henry had been married eighteen years to Catherine of Aragon, and by her had three children, whereof one was living, when he formed the deſign of her repudiation. He alledged, as the principal reaſon, his ſcruples for marrying his brother's widow: but, as many pretend that theſe ſcruples troubled him not 'till he was in love with Ann Boleyn, one of his Queen's maids of honor, it is infered, that his doubts concerning the validity of his marriage ſprang from this new paſſion, and without that would not have exiſted (1): accordingly, ingly, ſome labor to ſhew his divorce had no other foundation than his paſſion for that lady. Others again indeavor to prove, that his love and his ſcruples were independent of each other. For my part, I ſhould have thought it needleſs to accuſe or juſtify Henry, with regard to the concerns of religion, if there had not been ſome neceſſity to illuſtrate this matter with reſpect to the hiſtory: by illuſtrating I mean ſhewing the impoſſibility of giving a certain judgment about it. But before all things, it is neceſſary to deſcribe the perſon, who, as is pretended, was the prime cauſe of this King's divorce, and of all the conſequences thereof.

Account of Ann Boleyn. Burnet's Ref. Vol. I. p. 43. Herbert.

* Elizabeth Howard.

Ann Boleyn was of a good, tho' not of a noble family. Sir Thomas Boleyn her father, married a ſiſter of the duke of Norfolk *, and had by her Ann, born, as Camden ſays, in 1507, about two years before Henry's acceſſion to the crown. Her father was twice embaſſador to France, firſt in 1515, and again in 1527. He was made viſcount Rochford in 1525, and afterwards earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond (1). Ann his daughter, being but ſeven years old, was carried into France in 1514, when Mary the King's ſiſter went over to conſummate her marriage, at Abbeville, with Lewis XII. That Queen being ſoon after re-married to the duke of Suffolk, and returning into England, Ann Boleyn was left in France. It is by ſome aſſerted, that ſhe then entered into the ſervice of Francis I's Queen, tho' ſhe was but eight years old; but it is not ſaid in what quality: it is certain, a child of her age was not capable of doing much ſervice; ſo it may be preſumed her beauty, ſprightlineſs, or her lively wit, made Queen Claude deſirous ſhe ſhould be about her. Camden affirms, ſhe retained her in her ſervice to the day of her death, which happened in July 1524, and intimates not her paſſing into England during that whole interval: but Du Tillet and Du Pleix, French writers, pretend ſhe came over in 1522. Lord Herbert ſays the ſame thing, but, without citing any particular author, contents himſelf with ſaying, It appears in hiſtory. Camden aſſures us, Ann remained in France, not only 'till Queen Claude's death, but that, after ſhe had loſt her miſtreſs, ſhe was retained by the ducheſs of Alenſon, Francis's ſiſter; however, he ſays not when ſhe quited that ſervice. Others affirm, ſir Thomas Boleyn brought his daughter to England when he returned from his embaſſy. His embaſſy of 1515 cannot be here underſtood, ſince it is unanimouſly agreed, that Ann was in Queen Claude's ſervice after Queen Mary's departure, and continued ſeveral years in the court of France. It muſt therefore be his embaſſy of 1527. But, according to appearances, Boleyn was not ſent to France 'till September 1527, ſince his ſole commiſſion was to ſee the treaty of the thirtieth of April, of the ſame year, ſworn to, which Francis had not ratified ſooner than the eighteenth of Auguſt, as appears in Rymer's collection. But as, before his departure, the affair of the divorce was already commenced, it may be affirmed, the King's love for his daughter was later than his reſolution concerning the divorce, if it be true that Ann returned to England with her father, about the end of the year 1527. Indeed it may be objected, that two French hiſtorians aſſert, Ann's paſſing over to England in 1522, and that it was then the King fell in love with her. But it may be replied, firſt, that it is very ſtrange, theſe two authors, who wrote long after the fact, ſhould meet with memoirs of the voyage of one of the Queen's maids of honor, and the more as they cite nothing to ſupport their aſſertion. Secondly, ſuppoſing it were ſo, they ſay not that Ann ſtayed in England. Conſequently they deſtroy not Camden's teſtimony, who affirms, Ann ſerved Queen Claude 'till 1524, and afterwards the ducheſs of Alenſon. But if it be true, that Ann took a journey into England in 1522, and the King then fell in love with her, it cannot be ſuppoſed ſhe returned to France, becauſe the rupture between the two crowns happening that year, it is not likely that in war-time this Engliſh gentlewoman ſhould go over to ſerve a Queen of France: beſide, if the King was then inamored of Ann, would he have ſuffered her to leave the kingdom? Camden therefore, or the two French hiſtorians muſt have been miſtaken. This is a difficulty not eaſy to be ſolved.

Uncertainty about Ann Boleyn's return to England. Burnet.

Vol. XIV. p. 218.

Camden. Burnet.

But there is one thing which paſſes for real fact: namely, that Ann Boleyn, being twenty years old, was taken into Queen Catherine's ſervice, as maid of honor. Now this muſt have been in 1527, ſince ſhe was born in 1507. Accordingly, this is the time to which the origin of the King's love may moſt properly be fixed. But ſtill this is only a conjecture, which, were it well grounded, would be a ſufficient proof, that Henry's divorce was not the effect of his paſſion, ſince it was reſolved before the end of the year 1526. My aim in this inquiry is to ſhew, that the time of Ann Boleyn's return into England is very uncertain, and the begining of the King's affection no leſs ſo. How then can it be ſo boldly affirmed, as it is by ſome, that love for Ann Boleyn inſpired the King with the thoughts of annulling his marriage with Catherine? We muſt now examine, whether it be eaſier to diſcover the time when Henry determined on ſuing for his divorce.

At what time Henry reſolved to ſue for his divorce. Burnet Hiſt. Ref. Vol. I. p. 36. Speed, p. 762.

When Henry VII concluded his ſon's marriage with Catherine, Prince Arthur's widow, archbiſhop Warham frankly told him, "Since it was repugnant to God's law, the Pope's diſpenſation could not be of any validity." The King undoubtedly was touched with this remonſtrance. On the very day when his ſon Prince Henry entered his fourteenth year, he cauſed him to make againſt his marriage a ſecret proteſtation, tho' before truſty witneſſes, declaring, he was conſtrained to give his conſent. After that, the King on his death-bed ſtrictly injoined Prince Henry not to conſummate his marriage with Catherine. Notwithſtanding all this, Henry VIII, acceding to the crown, eſpouſed the Princeſs contrary to Warham's ſentiment, to which he prefered that of the biſhop of Wincheſter. He had by her three children (2), two ſons and a daughter, of whom the ſons died ſoon after their birth. He afterwards affirmed, that he conſidered the immature death of his two ſons as God's curſe on his marriage, eſpecially when he found the Queen had done breeding. It happened afterwards that Charles V, who was affianced to Princeſs Mary, refuſed to marry her, on the Spainiſh council's queſtioning that Princeſs's legitimacy. Afterwards, when a marriage was treating between Mary and King Francis, or the duke of Orleans, the biſhop of Tarbe, Francis's embaſſador, made the ſame objection, maintaining, that the Princeſs could not be deemed born in legal matrimony, notwithſtanding Julius II's diſpenſation.

Hall. Burnet.

All this was more than ſufficient to raiſe ſcruples in the King's mind concerning his marriage: but tho', in a full aſſembly of peers which he afterwards called to inform them of his reaſons for a divorce, he affirmed, the biſhop of Tarbe's objection inſpired him with the firſt thoughts of inquiring into the matter, it nevertheleſs appears, that his ſcruples took rise earlier: for in a letter afterwards to Grynæus, he told him, he had abstained from the Queen ever since the year 1524.

But supposing it could be discovered at what time Henry began, either of himself, or by the suggestion of others, to be troubled with these scruples, it would signify nothing with respect to his resolution concerning the divorce, which, in all appearance, was taken much later. Polydore Virgil says, Longland bishop of Lincoln, the King's confessor, labored to persuade him of the necessity of the divorce by cardinal Wolsey's order, but mentions not the time. All the historians affirm, King Henry had himself recourse to the works of Thomas Aquinas, to clear his doubts, and caused the bishops to be consulted on that head: but none of them say at what time this was done. It is well known, secretary Knight was dispatched to Rome about this affair in July 1527, but then the rumor of the King's meditating a divorce had already reached the court of Spain, as appears by Wolsey's letter to the King from Abbeville (1). It is also very probable, that before Wolsey ingaged in this affair, Henry had consulted him about it some time before. It is scarce to be supposed a resolution of this nature can be taken lightly, or when taken, immediately executed, without thoroughly weighing the difficulties, or waiting a favorable juncture. Henry said himself, that the bishop of Tarbe bred the thought of annulling his marriage: but if it be true, as some affirm, that the bishop spoke only as directed by cardinal Wolsey, it may be presumed, the project of this divorce was formed some time before, and that embassador made to speak, purely to gain a pretext to commence the affair: nay, this is what seems to me extremely probable. Indeed it is not likely the embassador, after thus questioning Mary's legitimacy, would have concluded a marriage for the King his master, or for the duke of Orleans, with that Princess, had he not acted in concert with the court of England. These then are my thoughts, which I submit to the reader's judgment.

Conjecture on this subject.

Ever since Francis was restored to his liberty, he had never ceased pressing Henry to join with him in a league offensive against the Emperor: but Henry had constantly excused himself, without even suffering him to entertain the least hopes in that respect. However, lord Herbert says that, about the close of 1526, Henry, of his own accord, sent an embassador to France to propose this league so eagerly desired by Francis, and to offer him his daughter Mary in marriage. This procedure gives room to believe, he had already resolved on the divorce, and foreseeing how much Charles would oppose it, intended so to imbaras him as to oblige him to court his friendship. On this supposition it may naturally be conjectured, that he proposed the marriage of his daughter with the King of France, purely to convince the Emperor, that he really designed to be strictly united with France: but it is at the same time very probable, that he informed Francis of a main obstacle which would occur in the execution of this imaginary project, namely, the divorce of the Princess's mother, which he was meditating: first, this conjecture is confirmed by the coldness wherewith these two Monarchs treated of the marriage; Henry left it to the King of France's choice, to have Mary himself, or to leave her to his second son, as if this alternative were the same thing: secondly, when Francis declared he would leave Mary to the duke of Orleans, the treating more fully concerning the marriage was defered to another time: thirdly, in the treaty Francis and the cardinal concluded at Abbeville, they took care to insert this clause: "that tho' the "marriage should not be effected, the treaty how-"ever should subsist." In fine, tho' Knight was now at Rome, or on his way thither, when the treaty of Abbeville was concluded, it appears not that Francis ever complained to Henry, of his having offered him a Princess whom he was laboring to bastardize, in prosecuting his divorce with the Queen her mother: on the contrary, he assisted him to the utmost of his power to obtain his desires: but he must have looked on the offer as a glaring insult, had they not understood each other. If this conjecture has any foundation, it may be infered, that the resolution concerning this divorce was at least taken about the end of 1526, tho' the execution was defered 'till the middle of the next year: but, in that case, it would therefore be true, that the King had resolved on the divorce before his passion for Ann Boleyn, who, in all probability, returned not into England sooner than October 1527.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1527.

From what has been said it may be gathered that, to affirm, with any probability, that Henry's passion for Ann Boleyn was the cause of his divorce from Catherine, these queries must be decided in favor of that opinion. At what time did Ann Boleyn return into England? When did the King's love for her first begin? When was it that he came to a resolution concerning his divorce? But on all these questions, conjectures only, as I have observed, can properly be formed. Thus much is certain, that between Henry's determination about his divorce, and the commencement of his love, was no great distance of time. There we must stop. But it is going too far to ground, on this proximity of time, that Henry took in hand the prosecution of his divorce from Catherine, purposely to marry Ann Boleyn. I farther say, that even were there no difficulty at all concerning the times, yet, with regard to what passed in the King's breast, it would be only conjecture.

I have somewhat inlarged on this point, because the illustrious author of the history of the reformation seems to leave it in some obscurity. Beside, I thought it requisite to curb the over-confident, by informing the readers of what is true, and what doubtful in the matter. We see it in many histories, and hear it every day positively affirmed, as if not to be contested, that Henry's love for Ann Boleyn was the sole cause of his divorce from Catherine of Aragon, tho', as I have evidenced, it can only be said by conjecture; nor does the very conjecture countenance that notion: not that Henry VIII is to be considered as a Prince incapable of being so far misled by such a passion, as to sacrifice Catherine of Aragon to Ann Boleyn. Why should he be more scrupulous with respect to Catherine, than he was with regard to Ann herself, whom he made no difficulty to sacrifice to a third wife, as will be seen hereafter. He was a Prince of a fiery, impetuous disposition, who could not bear the least contradiction. The flatteries of his subjects, and the extravagant praises continually bestowed on him by the Sovereigns who stood in need of him, had possessed him with such a conceit of his own merit, that he imagined his actions ought to have been the standard of good sense, reason, and justice. When therefore it is said, his love for Ann Boleyn caused him eagerly to push the affair of his divorce, of which otherwise the difficulties would perhaps have discouraged him, nothing is affirmed repugnant to his character: only care must be taken, not to assert for incontestable truth, what is no other than a bare surmise.

(1) Dated August 1, 1527. See Herbert, p. 84.

However this be, without dwelling longer on the King's ſecret motives, or attempting to penetrate into his thoughts, which lye concealed from human eyes, let us content ourſelves with what he himſelf publiſhed. In the firſt place, he ſaid, He was troubled in conſcience for his marriage with Catherine; and, in reality, he had but too much reaſon; the wonder is, that he had not theſe ſcruples ſooner. He had married his brother's widow, and found ſuch matches prohibited by the Levitical law. It is true, he had the Pontif's diſpenſation; but he could not be ignorant, that many learned divines were of opinion, that the Pope could not diſpenſe with the laws divine. This was ſufficient to give him very juſt ſcruples. As ſoon as theſe doubts had poſſeſſed him, he was willing to clear them, and found in Thomas Aquinas what he had perhaps inattentively read many times: firſt, that the Levitical laws are moral and eternal: ſecondly, that the Pope cannot diſpenſe with the laws of God, becauſe to diſpenſe with a law, one muſt be ſuperior * to the legiſlator. This deciſion of a divine, for whom he had the greateſt eſteem, confirming his ſcruples, he deſired archbiſhop Warham, who had formerly declared againſt the marriage, to conſult the biſhops of England on this ſubject. Some affirm, that Longland his confeſſor cheriſhed his doubts, by the private orders of cardinal Wolſey; which is not improbable. The Queen was aunt of the Emperor, with whom Wolſey had no great reaſon to be pleaſed: beſide, the favorite loved not the Queen herſelf, becauſe ſhe could not help ſhewing how much ſhe was offended, that a biſhop, a cardinal, a legate of the Holy See, ſhould lead ſo ſcandalous a life. Howſoever this was, ſoon after the archbiſhop preſented to the King a writing, under the hands and ſeals of all the biſhops, wherein they condemned his marriage as contrary to common decency, and the law of God. Only Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter refuſing to ſet his hand, it is ſaid the archbiſhop made another write his name unknown to him (1). Nor were the prelates the only perſons of this ſentiment. Since the appearance of Luther's works, many people in England were diſabuſed, and had no longer that high conceit of the Pontifical power. As therefore the validity of the King's marriage was wholly founded on Julius II's diſpenſation, it was publicly canvaſſed, whether the diſpenſation could authoriſe a marriage ſo notoriouſly repugnant to the law of God: nay, many who were, otherwiſe, ſtrongly attached to the Roman court, could not reliſh the doctrine of the Pope's diſpenſing with the divine laws. All which conſpired either to breed or confirm the King's ſcruples.

The people are of the ſame mind. Herbert.

But it was not only ſcruples of conſcience which Henry alledged to juſtify his deſign. He pretended, "That even were he quite regardleſs of his ſalvation, or able to overcome his ſcruples, the good of his people required his laboring to prevent a moſt pernicious inconvenience, eaſy to be foreſeen. He had but one daughter, and, to all appearance, ſhould not have any more children, if his mariage were not annulled. If therefore, after his deceaſe, the validity of his marriage with Catherine ſhould come to be queſtioned, he foreſaw England would again be involved, on account of the ſucceſſion, in troubles from whence ſhe was but juſt delivered. Mary his daughter, the King of Scotland his nephew, and the dowager Queen of France, could equally pretend to the crown, on very plauſible reaſons. Mary could alledge the Pope's diſpenſation againſt ſuch as ſhould charge her with her being born of a marriage not lawful. The King of Scotland, who was next heir after her, could aſſert the diſpenſation not to be valid. His ſiſter, the dowager of France, could alledge, that the firſt was illegitimate, and the ſecond a foreigner. Theſe different claims might eaſily kindle a civil war in England, where it was but too viſible that each would find adherents, not to mention the foreign aids wherewith they might be ſupported." Henry therefore imagined there was but one method to avert this imminent peril; namely, by annulling his marriage, and taking another wife, by whom, with God's bleſſing, he might have ſons. He to whom the ſecrets of all hearts are open, can only know of a certainty, whether this thought was inſtilled into him by the danger he foreſaw, by his averſion to the Queen, or by his love for Ann Boleyn: but howſoever this might have been, independently of the ſeveral motives aſcribed to him, it is certain, there was great danger of the kingdom's being one day expoſed to a civil war, if the King always continued in his preſent ſtate, and he ſaw no other way to quit it than by diſſolving his marriage. It is true, he foreſaw great oppoſition from the Emperor, Queen Catherine's nephew, who was then very powerful. But on the other hand, as that Monarch had himſelf ſhewn on this occaſion ſcruples which hindered him from eſpouſing Mary, Henry hoped he would not obſtinately maintain what he had himſelf queſtioned: beſide, the juncture ſeemed very favorable for his purpoſe. The Pope, who was priſoner in caſtle St. Angelo, ſeemed to have no other reſſource to be reſtored to his former ſtate, than the aſſiſtance of France and England, and Henry did not queſtion that Francis, who ſtood in need of him, would promote his proceedings to the utmoſt of his power. As to the reſt, he never doubted obtaining the Pope's authority, reckoning that Clement VII could revoke a diſpenſation granted by Julius II. Nay, cardinal Wolſey warranted the ſucceſs of that affair; whether he had already gained his Holineſs, or imagined that Clement, in his then circumſtances, durſt not deny the King any requeſt: ſo it was reſolved the ſuit ſhould be moved in the court of Rome, in order to get the marriage annulled.

Reaſons of ſtate alledged by the King. Burnet.

Reaſons which gave him hopes of ſucceeding. Burnet.

The beſt reaſon could be alledged was, that Julius's diſpenſation was contrary to divine law, and that alone ought to have been ſufficient. But it would have been imprudent to begin with diſputing the prerogative of the Roman Pontifs, when a favor was to be aſked at the Roman court. Recourſe therefore was to be had to another expedient, which was to find nullities in Julius's bull, and ſhew it was procured by falſe ſurmiſes, and untrue ſuggeſtions, which rendered the bull revocable, even according to all rules of the court of the Rota (2). And this was not very difficult. The bull was grounded on Henry's and Catherine's requeſt, ſetting forth, that their marriage was neceſſary to preſerve peace between England and Spain: and here were found two reaſons for revoking the bull. The firſt, that Henry, being then only twelve years old, could not be deemed to have any political views; whence it was infered, that the requeſt was not his own. The ſecond, that the ſuggeſtion was falſe, ſince, as matters then ſtood between Spain and England, the marriage was not at all neceſſary for the preſervation of peace between the two crowns, and conſequently Julius II had been ſurpriſed. Another nullity was found, as the bull having no other foundation than the maintenance of peace and union between Henry VII and the King and Queen of Spain, this reaſon ceaſed when the marriage was conſummated, ſince Henry VII and Iſabella were now dead. Laſtly, it was alledged, that Henry VIII, having proteſted againſt his marriage before conſummation, thereby renounced the liberty granted him by the bull, and therefore another bull was neceſſary to render the marriage valid; but all theſe reaſons were produced only to afford the Pope a pretenſe to revoke Julius's diſpenſation: for, if the contrariety of the diſpenſation to divine law was not the real foundation of ſuing for the divorce, nothing would have been eaſier for his Holineſs, than to have quieted the King's conſcience by confirming, in a new bull, whatever had been done in this affair by his ſaid predeceſſor.

Knight is ſent to Rome about the divorce. Herbert. Burnet.

Mean while, as the Pontif's then ſituation left no room to doubt of his compliance, the King diſpatched away to Rome doctor Knight, ſecretary of ſtate, to deſire his Sanctity to ſign four inſtruments drawn in England. The firſt was a commiſſion to cardinal Wolſey, to try and decide the affair with ſome Engliſh biſhops. The ſecond was a bull decretal, declaring the King's marriage with Catherine void, becauſe Arthur's with the ſame Princeſs was conſummated. By the third, the Pope granted the King a diſpenſation to marry another wife. By the fourth he promiſed never to repeal any of the three foregoing acts.

He gets a memorial delivered to the Pope. Burnet. Herbert.

Knight departed England in July, about the time when cardinal Wolſey began his Journey to confer with the King of France (1). But as the Pope was priſoner, and guarded by a Spaniſh captain, it was abſolutely impracticable for the Engliſh envoy to obtain audience. He however found means to convey to him a memorial (2), containing the ſum of his commiſſion, to which Clement returned a favorable anſwer. He made believe he would grant whatever the King deſired, tho' the Emperor had already, by the general of the Franciſcans, deſired him not to take any ſtep in that affair, without communicating it to his miniſters. By the way, this ſhews Henry had reſolved long before to ſue for his divorce, ſince the Emperor had time to hear of it, and thus to precaution Pope Clement. As there was not any poſſibility of Knight's treating perſonally with his Sanctity, the buſineſs was then carried no farther. At length, the news of Clement's approaching releaſe having reached England, cardinal Wolſey wrote to ſir Gregory Caſſali (3) the King's ordinary embaſſador at Rome, ordering him to join with Knight, and preſs his Holineſs to grant the King's requeſt. This letter was worded in very ſtrong terms, and evidenced his ſaid eminence's deſire that the divorce ſhould be effected. It was dated the fifth of December 1527, the cardinal not yet informed of Clement's having made his eſcape the ninth of the ſame month (4).

The Pope owned he had received his memorial, and promiſed again to do whatever lay in his power for the King's ſatisfaction; but intreated him not to be too haſty. Such was his then ſituation, that as yet he knew not whether he ſhould want the King of England, or whether the Emperor would accommodate matters with him: wherefore he deſired to gain time, in order to proceed as ſhould beſt ſuit with his intereſt; but for that very reaſon, and becauſe the King's orders were urgent and poſitive, Knight would not delay his negociation. He earneſtly preſſed his Holineſs, who finally ingaged to ſign the acts, on condition no uſe ſhould be made of them 'till the Germans and Spaniards were departed Italy. Knight willingly accepted of the condition, imagining, when the inſtruments ready ſigned were in the King's hand, he would uſe them when he judged proper: but Clement was not eaſily to be deceived. While he feigned to have no other view than to ſatisfy the King, he was only contriving to gain time, being ready to ſacrifice him if he found it for his advantage; and therefore he put in practiſe his whole fund of artifice to prolong the affair, by means unſuſpected by Henry. To this end, he told Knight that, before the inſtruments were executed, he ſhould be glad to have a conference with cardinal Sanctorum Quatuor.

He promiſes to do what the King deſires.

But he finds means to delay performance. Herbert. Burnet.

The Pope having thus ingaged, Knight and Caſſali fancied they had no more to do, than to prepoſſeſs in their maſter's favor the cardinal whom his Sanctity intended to conſult. They were at no great pains to ſucceed, ſince, beſide ten thouſand ducats they had in hand, wherewith to reward ſuch as ſhould do them ſervice, they were impowered to make what farther promiſes they ſhould think fit, in King Henry's name. The cardinal examining the inſtruments ſent from England, found very great faults, particularly in the legate's commiſſion, and took upon him to draw one more perfect; which done, Knight and Caſſali waited on the Pope, and preſſed him to ſign. He did not abſolutely refuſe, but ſaid, "The Emperor having required "him not to act in that buſineſs without imparting "it to him, it was neceſſary to find ſome expedi"ent to excuſe ſo haſty a proceeding: that there"fore it would be proper to get Lautrec to march "towards Orvieto, and preſs him in his maſter's "name to give the King of England ſatisfaction." Lautrec being then at Bologna, to get him to march to Orvieto there would have been occaſion for orders from the court of France, which would have taken up much time. Wherefore Henry's agents rejected the expedient, their aim being to finiſh the affair before it came to the Emperor's knowledge. At length Clement, finding himſelf extremely preſſed, delivered to them the commiſſion for cardinal Wolſey, with the bull of diſpenſation for the King (6), and promiſed to ſend into England the bull decretal to null the marriage (7). But the artifice here uſed by that Pontif was what poſſibly the Engliſh agents did not ſufficiently conſider. He dated theſe two inſtruments from the time of his being priſoner in caſtle St. Angelo: ſo, when the King had them in his power, he thought not proper to make uſe of them, leſt it ſhould be objected, that the Pope had granted them only with deſign to obtain his liberty by the aſſiſtance he expected from England: beſide, all acts executed by a priſoner may be deemed void, whereof the treaty of Madrid was a late inſtance. Thus, how urgent ſoever King Henry was to terminate the affair, he found at the cloſe of the year 1527, that he had not yet made the leaſt progreſs.

been very unſucceſsful, becauſe he had ſwerved from the maxims of his ableſt predeceſſors. He had unadviſedly involved himſelf in a war with the Emperor, whereas Alexander VI, Julius II, and Leo X, after ſowing diſſenſion among the Potentates, left them for the moſt part to decide their quarrels, and then ſided with the ſtrongeſt, or if they ingaged in war, it was generally at the expenſe of others. But for once Clement VII, after draining his treaſure in maintaining a large army, had loſt Florence, Parma, Reggio, Rome itſelf, with the beſt part of the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and ſeen himſelf captive and ranſomed: this was ſufficient to make him wiſer, and take a different courſe. As ſoon as the embaſſadors of France, England and Venice ſaw him ſecure at Orvieto from the outrages of the Imperialiſts, they preſſed him to declare againſt the Emperor. They thought if he could not aſſiſt the league with temporal arms, he might at leaſt, by means of his ſpiritual ones, imbroil the common enemy, whom he ſeemed to have no reaſon to regard: but he himſelf conſidered this affair in quite another light. Having learned by ſad experience, that he had been the dupe of his allies, he reſolved to be no longer guided by their intereſted counſels: wherefore, without diſcovering his thoughts, he only told them, "That his joining in the league "would only draw on him freſh miſchiefs, without "procuring them any advantage: that beſide, it "was neceſſary for the benefit of Chriſtendom, "there ſhould be a mediator to labor to procure "peace, and that was all he could do in the ſtate "to which he was reduced." Nevertheleſs, he intimated to them, that he might take other meaſures, if Lautrec approached to oblige the Emperor's troops to abandon Rome. This indeed was his ſole aim to free the Eccleſiaſtical ſtate from that foreign army, in order to be able to act moſt agreeably to his intereſt.

Lautrec marches towards Naples. Guicciard. Hall.

Lautrec at length departing Bologna, the ninth of January, took the road to Naples, having firſt ſent the Prince of Vaudemont and La Trimouille to the Pope, to preſs him to declare: but Clement found means to excuſe himſelf, without giving a poſitive denial. He ſaw, as I may ſay, all Europe in motion, and was willing to wait the ſucceſs of the war, in order to take juſter meaſures than before; and therefore it was not by any means poſſible to bring him to a declaration: he only made believe that, if Francis and Henry would cauſe Ravenna and Cervia to be reſtored to him, he would join with them. This advantage he would moſt willingly have reaped from their inſtances, without being debared from finding ſome other evaſion to prevent his declaring after the recovery of theſe two places: mean while, he was ſtudying how to treat ſecretly with the Emperor, from whom he had greater expectations than from the allies. Indeed, his chief aim being to reſtore the Medicis family to the government of Florence, he perceived that he could not accompliſh it without the Emperor's concurrence, ſince the allies were concerned to ſupport the Florentines, who were become parties in the league: but it would have been imprudent in him to declare for the Emperor, when that Monarch was weak in Italy, and ſo powerful a body of forces was marching to invade the kingdom of Naples; wherefore it was requiſite for him to wait 'till the event of the war inabled him to reſolve with ſafety. This was the true reaſon which obliged him to uſe ſo many artifices, in order not to diſpleaſe either the Emperor, the King of France, or the King of England. If, inſtead of ſo prepoſterouſly involving himſelf in a war, he had before taken this courſe, he might have ſold his favors at what price he pleaſed: at leaſt, he would not have had the mortification of being a priſoner, even in Rome itſelf.

Reaſons why Clement would not act againſt the Emperor.

Henry VIII. An' 1528.

But tho' his Sanctity refuſed declaring, the Kings of France and England were not the leſs eager in the purſuits of their projects. On the twenty-firſt of January 1528, their embaſſadors in Spain demanded the Emperor's leave to retire, and next day Clarenceux and Guienne, heralds, one of England, the other of France, proclaimed war againſt him. This was done with great ſolemnity, the Emperor being ſeated on his throne, and attended by all his grandees. He anſwered each in particular, but in a ſtile very different. Speaking to the Engliſh herald, he made uſe of civil and honorable terms, denoting, it not to be at all pleaſing to him that the King his maſter ſhould be his enemy. He complained however, that Henry had uſed him ill, in deſigning to give him in marriage a Princeſs whom he propoſed to baſtardize, ſince he was ſuing to be divorced from the Queen her mother: but he threw all the blame on the boundleſs ambition of cardinal Wolſey. He ſaid, the cardinal would have obliged him to imploy his arms in Italy to make him Pope, and thought himſelf injured, becauſe he would not, on his account, diſturb the peace of Chriſtendom. As for the ſums, of which Henry demanded payment, he denied he had ever refuſed diſcharging thoſe debts: but added, that the Engliſh embaſſadors not having brought with them the original obligations, nor even a power to give him a diſcharge, Henry was in the wrong to complain. As to the indemnity he demanded, he knew the King of France had taken it upon him in the treaty of Madrid. As for the penalty of five hundred thouſand crowns, in caſe he refuſed to marry Princeſs Mary, he replied, it was not his fault: that he had demanded her of the King her father, by embaſſadors ſent purpoſely, and that Henry had refuſed to ſend her: that beſide, before that time Henry had offered her to the King of Scotland: and finally, that he could not lawfully claim that ſum, before he had proved that he had himſelf performed all the articles of the treaty of Windſor. Such was Charles's reply to the declaration of war made by Henry's herald. In his anſwer to the French herald, he ſpoke not with ſo much regard and caution. He plainly accuſed Francis of breach of faith, and charged the herald to put him in mind of the meſſage he ſent him by the archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, his embaſſador, that it would be better for them to decide their quarrel by ſingle combat; but that he had not received any anſwer. Seemingly, the embaſſador had not thought fit to deliver that meſſage to Francis, ſince he appeared extremely ſurpriſed when he heard it from the herald's mouth. In a few days, he ſent the ſame herald to the Emperor, with a challenge under his own hand, wherein he gave him the lie in form, and required him to Aſſure him the Field to fight hand to hand: the challenge was dated March 18, 1528. Charles returned his anſwer by one of his heralds, who was charged to tell him by word of mouth very diſagreeable things. The herald coming to Paris, could not obtain leave without great difficulty, to put on (1) his coat of arms when he entered the city. The King expected him on his throne, ſurrounded with a great number of Princes and nobility: but he had ſcarce begun his harangue when the King interrupted him, and demanded whether he had brought the Security of the Field. Bold act of Wolſey, which drew on him the King's anger. Herbert. Hall.

Hugo de Mendoza, the Emperor's embaſſador at London, hearing what had paſſed in Spain, would have retired; but cardinal Wolſey (1) ſent him word, that Clarenceux had exceeded his inſtructions in proclaiming war againſt the Emperor, and ſhould be puniſhed at his return: whereupon the embaſſador diſpatched away a courier to inform Charles of what the cardinal had ſaid. Clarenceux, who was ſtill in Spain, ſurpriſed that he ſhould be made accountable for what he had expreſs orders, demanded and obtained a genuine and authentic copy of the embaſſador's letter (2) On his arrival in England, he waited on the King, before he ſpake with Wolſey, and ſhewed him the letter, with three others, writ with the cardinal's own hand, whereby he gave him poſitive orders to declare war againſt the Emperor. Henry, aſtoniſhed at this preſumption of his miniſter, fell into a violent paſſion with him before the whole court: nay, he would perhaps have utterly diſgraced him, had he not been withheld by the conſideration of the divorce-buſineſs, wherein without him he could not proceed. He nevertheleſs cauſed him to undergo a terrible mortification, by having this affair examined in council. This inquiry would doubtleſs have been fatal to that miniſter, had Henry thought fit to purſue it; but he was contented with the cardinal's proteſtation, that he believed to have acted agreeably to his Majeſty's intentions.

Wolſey aſſembles the grandees, and attempts juſtifying the war againſt Charles. Hall.

Charles's anſwer to Clarenceux being, by the Spaniſh embaſſador's means, publiſhed in England, the cardinal was afraid it would create no good effects among the people, conſidering the weakneſs of the motives alledged by King Henry for undertaking the war. For this reaſon he aſſembled, in the Star-chamber (3), all the great lords then at court (4), to whom he made a ſpeech, agravating, as far as poſſible, the injuries his Majeſty had received from the Emperor, and his reaſons to ſeek reparation by dint of ſword: but, ſpite of all his plauſible inſinuations, nay, tho' outwardly all applauded him, what Charles had told the herald, viz. that this war was occaſioned by the cardinal's private diſcontent, made deeper impreſſion than any arguments his eminence could alledge (5). The people openly exclaimed againſt a war which threatened the kingdom's utter ruin, purely to gratify the favorite's paſſions; nay, ſome went farther than murmurs. As the Netherland commerce was quite at a ſtand by the declaration of war, and the merchants would no longer purchaſe cloths which they could not vend, the clothiers roſe in arms (6). Hereupon the cardinal ordered the merchants to buy up cloths as uſual, threatening in caſe of refuſal to make the purchaſe himſelf, and ſell them to foreigners: but they made a jeſt of this menace, and continued obſtinate; being determined againſt expoſing themſelves to inevitable loſſes merely thro' complaiſance to the favorite miniſter. An embaſſy from the governeſs of the Netherlands to King Henry, while theſe matters were in agitation, freed Wolſey from his imbaraſſment. The embaſſadors acquainting him, that if the King pleaſed to conſent to a truce with the Netherlands, for the mutual benefit of trade, the governeſs would readily join in it; and this overture being debated in council, it was reſolved, notwithſtanding the French embaſſador's oppoſition, to agree to a truce for eight months; which was ſigned the eighth of June.

While this paſſed in England, the affairs of Italy were in ſuch a ſituation as gave Francis room to expect Lautrec's expedition in the kingdom of Naples would be crowned with ſucceſs; tho' its concluſion proved quite the reverſe. Lautrec, leaving Bologna the ninth of January, arrived the tenth of February on the confines of Naples, and marching into Abruzzo, poſſeſſed himſelf of that province, and afterwards of part of Apulia. It was not without extreme difficulty that the Prince of Orange prevailed on the Imperialiſts to quit Rome, where, during ten months ſucceſſively, they had exerciſed all imaginable rapine and violence. Nothwithſtanding it was the ſeventeenth of February before their army left Rome, they got the ſtart of Lautrec, who had taken a larger compaſs in order to pick up contributions of money, which he wanted exceedingly, Francis, according to cuſtom, not having ſent him what he promiſed. The Imperialiſts being poſted at Troya, he offered them battle; but, as they thought proper to retreat towards Naples, he purſued his march, and arrived early in May before that capital, which anſwerably to his inſtructions he beſieged. Sixteen French gallies, commanded by Andrea D'Oria, eight others under conduct of Philipino D'Oria his nephew, with twenty-two from Venice, were to block up Naples by ſea, while Lautrec attacked it by land with his army, thirty thouſand ſtrong: but, at his opening the ſiege, he had only Philipino's eight gallies. Thoſe of Venice came very late, and Andrea D'Oria, who was diſſatisfied with King Francis, and had thoughts of entering into the Emperor's ſervice, detained at Genoua the ſixteen gallies under diverſe pretexts. Mean while, a ſea-fight between Philipino and the Imperialiſts (wherein Moncada loſt his life and marquis Del Vaſto his liberty) made Lautrec hope he ſhould reduce Naples by famine, tho' his own camp was deſtitute of all neceſſaries. His hopes were increaſed by the arrival of the twenty-two Venetian gallies, which joined thoſe of Philipino. The buſineſs now was to ſee who could bear famine longeſt, the beſiegers or the beſieged, who were equally in want of proviſions: but the French, beſide ſcarcity, labored under another grievous diſadvantage, a contagious diſtemper making horrible ravage among them, to the inceſſant diminiſhing their number. Finally Andrea D'Oria, having agreed with the Emperor, recalled his nephew Philipino with his eight gallies: and the Venetian gallies being, ſoon after, obliged to depart for the Calabrian coaſts to make proviſion of biſcuit, the beſieged took that opportunity to convey into the city great ſtore of all requiſites, while Lautrec remained in a moſt wretched condition, without either money or other neceſſaries, with a languiſhing army terribly afflicted with the peſtilence. Moſt of his general officers were dead, or ſick, and to compleat the misfortune, he was himſelf ſeized with the plague, which carried him off the ſixteenth of Auguſt (1). The marquis of Saluzzo, who aſſumed the command of that ruinous army, being finally determined on raiſing the ſiege, with great difficulty retired to Averſa, where he was inſtantly inveſted and in few days forced to capitulate, ſurrendering himſelf, with all his chief officers, into the hands of the Imperialiſts. Thus was that fine army wherewith Lautrec ſat down before Naples utterly diſperſed. Moreover, France had lately loſt Genoua, taken by Andrea D'Oria in the Emperor's name, after which, purſuant to his agreement with that Monarch, he reſtored his country to liberty, and eſtabliſhed a government which ſtill ſubſiſts. In this manner, was the countenance of affairs in Italy, which in the begining of this year promiſed ſo fair for Francis, ſo intirely changed, that he had ſcarce any thing left in that country.

The knowledge of what paſſed in Italy this campain will be of no little ſervice to diſcover the motives of Pope Clement's conduct in the buſineſs of King Henry's divorce. That Prince looked on the affair as terminated, when he underſtood his Holineſs had left it to the deciſion of cardinal Wolſey: but when, after much difficulty, he had obtained this commiſſion for the cardinal, with a bull decretal declaring the marriage void, and a diſpenſation to re-marry, he nevertheleſs found juſt nothing at all as yet effected. The commiſſion was dated from caſtle St. Angelo, while the Pope was a priſoner, which rendered it abſolutely null, and conſequently it muſt of neceſſity be renewed. The decretal had no clauſe to prevent the Pope's revoking it if he pleaſed: in ſhort, the diſpenſation was only conditional, in caſe the King's marriage with Catherine ſhould be declared void; beſide, certain reſtrictions were inſerted, leaving the Pope at liberty to repeal it. For inſtance, he granted the diſpenſation, "As far as might be without offending "ing God. Notwithſtanding any prohibitions of "the divine law, or other conſtitutions and ordi-"nances whatever to the contrary, as far as the "authority apoſtolical reached (2)." Henry was not a little concerned at finding he could not uſe theſe bulls, without being liable to be diſturbed: nevertheleſs, in the belief, that all this was owing to inadvertency, he ordered ſir Gregory Caſſali, his embaſſador at Rome, to demand bulls leſs obnoxious to diſpute. Caſſali moved it frequently to his Holineſs, but obtained not any deciſive anſwer: that Pontif, finding himſelf preſſed, told him as a ſecret, that he adviſed the King to proceed and get his marriage annulled, by virtue of the commiſſion given the legate, but with as little noiſe as poſſible, and marry the party he liked. He grounded this advice on its being much eaſier for him to confirm a thing done, than to permit the doing it: he however charged Caſſali, not to let the King know this counſel came from him. Henry looked on this ſuggeſtion as a ſnare laid for him by the Pope. He conſidered, it was not poſſible to have ſuch a cauſe tried without noiſe, ſince it was neceſſary the Queen ſhould be heard, otherwiſe there would be a maniſeſt nullity in the ſentence. In the next place, had he done what he was adviſed to, he muſt have been wholly at the Pope's mercy, who, according to the opinion of the canoniſts, might have refuſed to confirm the legate's ſentence, as well as the conſequent marriage: wherefore, the matter being taken into conſideration, it was judged properer to apply directly to the Pope for new bulls. Purſuant to this reſolution, the King ſent Stephen Gardiner, cardinal Wolſey's ſecretary, and Edward Fox (3), to manage the affair. Their inſtructions were, to demand for the cardinal a new commiſſion, appointing him judge of the cauſe, with powers to null the King's marriage, if he thought convenient, and yet to declare his daughter legitimate, to preſs the Pope to give him a promiſe under his hand, not to revoke the legate's commiſſion; to demand a bull decretal to null the King's marriage, and a diſpenſation to eſpouſe another wife without any reſtriction. In ſhort, the envoys had orders to give his Sanctity to underſtand, that this divorce was not adviſed by the cardinal, and to diſplay the extraordinary merit of the lady whom his Majeſty deſigned to eſpouſe. This was Ann Boleyn, as may eaſily be gueſſed, ſince the King no longer concealed his love for her. It was very requiſite to acquaint his Beatitude, that cardinal Wolſey was not author of that advice whereby King Henry was induced to ſue for a divorce, ſince he was required for judge; and yet the letters he ſent by Gardiner and Fox, and which are in the hiſtory of the reformation, clearly evidence his being paſſionately deſirous the buſineſs ſhould ſucceed. Finally, it appears that the King was ſtill willing to have ſome condeſcenſion for his Queen and her nephew the Emperor, ſince he required that the legate ſhould have powers to declare Mary legitimate: perhaps alſo this was an effect of the affection he bore her.

The Pope's artifice to amuſe Henry.

When Gardiner and Fox came to Orvieto, Lautrec was advancing towards Naples: but his progreſs was yet ſo inconſiderable, that it was difficult to judge of the ſucceſs of his undertaking, eſpecially as the Imperialiſts were already departed Rome, in order to oppoſe his paſſage; nay, it was likely a battle would inſue; and, as the event was dubious, Clement took care not to incur the Emperor's reſentment, in caſe his arms were victorious. Wherefore, in order to gain time, he wrote Henry a letter in cypher, as if his meaning was to acquaint him with a ſecret, and yet it was not thereby poſſible to diſcover his deſign. This letter not being very welcome, the envoys had orders to inſiſt on their demands: but, at that juncture, the face of affairs was ſomewhat altered. Lautrec had already made conqueſts in the kingdom of Naples, and the Prince of Orange, unable to impede his march, was retired to that metropolis, which, moſt apparently, was on the point of being attacked. It would therefore have been very imprudent to diſoblige Henry, when the King of France his ally was ſo likely to become powerful in Italy. So Clement, being greatly imbaraſſed in ſo nice a juncture, had recourſe to his uſual artifices to gain time. He feigned to deſire nothing ſo ardently as to ſatisfy Henry, tho' he was reſolved in his own mind to do nothing effectual in his favor. His drift was to render himſelf maſter of the divorce affair, and prolong it 'till the events of the war ſhould determine him to content either Charles or Henry. The intereſt of his houſe required that he ſhould manage the Emperor, becauſe it was by his means that he hoped to reſtore the Medici to Florence. That of his See was no leſs important: Henry demanded that he ſhould revoke a diſpenſation granted by a Pope his predeceſſor, on ſuppoſition that the ſaid Pontif had not power to grant it, which is, properly ſpeaking, that he ſhould declare the Roman

Pontifs

Pontifs had hitherto aſſumed a prerogative which belonged not to them. This was a very difficult ſtep to be taken, at a time when great part of Germany had thrown off the Papal domination, and nothing was every where heard but complaints and murmurs againſt the exorbitant power the Pontifs had uſurped: ſo that Clement's real deſign was to amuſe Henry with hopes he would conſent to his divorce, 'till it was in his power to oppoſe it with ſafety: nor is there any occaſion to ſeek for other myſteries in this Pope's conduct, as will be more clearly manifeſted hereafter. As for the arguments and authorities alledged on both ſides, with reſpect to the main point in queſtion, from the holy Scriptures, the fathers, and the canons, they were only ſo many amuſements which were wonderfully ſubſervient to his Sanctity's ſchemes, but which made on him little or no impreſſion.

The Pope gives Wolſey a new commiſſion. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 237, Herbert. Burnet.

Clement VII, being in this diſpoſition, ſcrupled not outwardly to grant King Henry whatever he required. On the thirteenth of April 1528, he ſigned a bull, appointing cardinal Wolſey judge of the cauſe, jointly with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or any other Engliſh prelate he ſhould think fit to chuſe, and gave him as ample powers as the King deſired. But beſide the above-mentioned inconveniencies in the decretal and diſpenſation, Henry's council found two in Wolſey's new commiſſion. The firſt was, That there was no clauſe to prevent the Pope's revoking it. The ſecond, That to appoint for ſole judge of the cauſe a cardinal devoted to the King, and actually his prime miniſter, would be a manifeſt nullity. Theſe conſiderations obliged Henry to requeſt his Holineſs, that he would join another legate with cardinal Wolſey, and poſitively promiſe not to revoke the commiſſion. As, when this was demanded, Lautrec was already before Naples, and it was not doubted he would become maſter of that city, as well as of the whole kingdom, Clement granted whatever was deſired (1). He appointed therefore, by a bull dated at Orvieto the ſixth of June, Thomas Wolſey cardinal of York, and Lorenzo Campegio, or Campejo, cardinal biſhop of Saliſbury for his legates a latere, giving them the ſame powers he had granted to Wolſey alone, appointing them his vicegerents in this affair of the divorce, and inveſting them with his whole authority (2). He gave likewiſe, the thirteenth of July, the promiſe under his hand deſired by the King: in a word, he delivered to Campejo a decretal, nulling the King's marriage, expreſſed in the very terms which had as it were been dictated to him. It ſeemed Henry could deſire nothing more; but all the artifices of the Roman court were not yet known in England. Clement's ſole deſign was to gain time, in order to ſee the iſſue of the Naples expedition. To that end, he always placed ſome interval between his favors to Henry. Wolſey was appointed ſole judge in the divorce buſineſs the thirteenth of April; Campejo was, in a conſiſtory, declared his aſſociate about the end of that month; but the bull was not drawn 'till the ſixth of June. His promiſe not to revoke the commiſſion was not ſigned before the twenty-third of July. In all appearance, the decretal was not drawn 'till Auguſt, nor did Campejo begin his journey 'till after Lautrec's death, or perhaps after raiſing the ſiege of Naples; that is, when the Pope was no longer in dread of France, and it was more neceſſary than ever to manage the Emperor: ſo, it may almoſt be affirmed, that when Campejo departed Rome, the Pope was reſolved not to grant the divorce. It was however requiſite, he ſhould ſtill ſeem willing to ſatisfy Henry, in order not to be delivered to the Emperor's mercy, with whom he was determined to agree, and nothing was more capable to procure him advantageous terms than his ſeeming union with France and England. This was moſt certainly the ſecret of the Pope's policy, and the real motive of all his artifices in this affair. In purſuance therefore of the reſolution he had taken, he gave the following inſtructions to his legate. Firſt, to prolong the affair as much as poſſible. Secondly, not to give ſentence on the divorce before the reception of his commands in writing. Thirdly, he expreſsly injoined him not to ſhew the bull to any perſon but the King and cardinal Wolſey, nor to part with it out of his hands, without his order, on any pretenſe whatſoever.

Inſtructions to Campejo.

Campejo departing with theſe inſtructions, arrived not in England 'till October, ſix or ſeven months after he was appointed legate. While he was on the road, the Emperor's miniſters at Rome raiſed a freſh obſtacle to the divorce, by the pretended diſcovery of a brief of Julius II (3), confirming the bull of diſpenſation for Henry's marriage with Catherine: but there was this difference between the bull and the brief, that the Pope in the bull ſaid, "The marriage was perhaps conſummated;" whereas in the brief, the word "perhaps" was omited. They thence infered, that Pope Julius II had not been ſurpriſed or impoſed on, ſince he took for granted Catherine's firſt nuptials were conſummated. But this brief, whereof they gave only a true copy, without ſhewing Henry's miniſters the original, was to appearance propoſed ſolely that time might be loſt in its examination: for, among many other reaſons, there were two in particular which manifeſtly proved it to be a forgery. The firſt was, That this brief granted at Catherine's requeſt, ſuppoſed that Princeſs's marriage with Arthur to have been conſummated; and yet ſhe had ſworn the contrary: and upon that her agents had grounded the validity of Julius's diſpenſation. The ſecond reaſon was ſtill much ſtronger, viz. That the brief was dated the twenty-ſixth of December 1503. Now, as in the date of the briefs, the court of Rome begins the year the twenty-fifth of December, being Chriſtmas-day, this date anſwered to the twenty-ſixth of December 1502, of the common year, that is, ten months before Julius II was Pope.

Campejo being arrived in England, began his legateſhip with gravely exhorting the King to live in good underſtanding with his Queen, and deſiſt from all farther proſecution of the affair. This was very heinouſly taken from a legate who was thought to be ſent into England to judge the cauſe in the King's favor. After that, he held with Queen Catherine a diſcourſe quite the reverſe, attempting to perſuade her, that ſhe ought to comply with the King's deſire (4), and even intimated, it would be in vain to oppoſe it: but whether the Queen was told beforehand what ſhe was to ſay, or naturally uttered her own real ſentiments, ſhe anſwered, "She was the "King's wife, and would be ſo, 'till parted from Campejo, not being able to prevail with either King or Queen, affirmed, he could not proceed without freſh orders; as if his whole commiſſion was only to make theſe exhortations: but it was ſix months before his inſtructions arrived. Mean while, he kept the King in hopes of obtaining his deſires, and even inſinuated, that he was himſelf ſatisfied of the juſtice of his cauſe. To amuſe him the better, he ſhewed him the bull he had brought, and gave the cardinal his collegue a ſight of it alſo: but when he was preſſed to ſhew it to ſome lords of the council, he replied, "He had very poſitive orders to let no per-"ſon ſee it but the King and Wolſey." Henry ſurpriſed and angry at ſuch procedure, complained of it to the Pope, who, inſtead of blaming his legate, anſwered, "He had done very well to fol-"low his orders: that the decretal was granted on "condition it was ſhewn to none but the King and "cardinal Wolſey, and on purpoſe to prevent "Wolſey's ruin, which otherwiſe, he was told, "would be infallible: and that, in ſhort, the bull "was not to be publiſhed, except the legates gave "ſentence for the King (2)."

While Campejo amuſed Henry in England, the Pope was taking meaſures to conclude his treaty with the Emperor, and ſeeking pretenſes to leave the Kings of France and England, whom he no longer feared, ſince the Naples expedition had miſcarried. He complained, that theſe two Monarchs had diſappointed him, in not cauſing Ravenna and Cervia to be reſtored to him according to their promiſe; thereby inſinuating, that it was not to be thought ſtrange he made no haſte to ſatisfy Henry, ſince that Prince had neglected to do him juſtice by the Venetians (3). He would fain have had it believed, that this affair of the divorce was retarded ſolely on that account, and was very deſirous to have theſe two places in his power before he concluded with the Emperor: but, what caution ſoever he uſed, his negociation in Spain could not be ſo private but Francis and Henry had thereof ſome private intelligence. They complained to him by their embaſſadors; but he conſtantly denied he intended to depart from his neutrality. Mean while, under colour of removing theſe groundleſs ſuſpicions, he diſpatched into England one Campana, to give the King freſh aſſurances of his good intentions; but withal, ſent by him expreſs orders to cardinal Campejo, to burn the bull decretal, and defer the ſentence of divorce as long as poſſible. Campejo immediately obeyed the firſt of theſe orders; and, as for the ſecond, never ceaſed finding ſome freſh pretext to retard the proceedings.

The difficulties in the divorce affair increaſe. Burnet. Herbert.

At length Henry, tired to ſee ſo many affected delays, and perceiving they came from the Pope, ſent, about the cloſe of this year, ſir Francis Brian and one Peter Vannes to Rome, to diſcover the true cauſe. They had likewiſe ſeveral other commiſſions: firſt, to ſearch the Pope's records for the pretended brief of Julius II: ſecondly, to propoſe, as of themſelves, ſeveral expedients ſpeedily to terminate the divorce affair, and to conſult, under feigned names, the canoniſts of Rome, whether they were practicable: thirdly, in caſe they ſaw the Pope over-awed by the Emperor's threats, they had orders to offer him a guard of two thouſand men: laſtly, if this had no effect, they were to balance the Emperor's menaces with others from the King. They found the Pope in a real or pretended fright at the Emperor's miniſters threats to have him depoſed for a baſtard. His anſwer therefore to the offer of two thouſand men for a guard was, "That it would not be capable of ſecuring "him, but rather render him more ſuſpected." He took care not to put himſelf in King Henry's power, when he was thinking to break with him intirely. The two envoys finding Clement leaned to the Emperor's ſide, plainly told him at laſt, "That if he continued to deny the King their "maſter the ſatisfaction he demanded, he might "be aſſured England would be loſt to him: that "the Engliſh were already but too much diſpoſed "to withdraw their obedience from the Holy See, "and on the leaſt incouragement from their King, "would openly declare what they yet kept con-"cealed in their hearts: that the King their "maſter, and the King of France, were powerful "and very ſtrictly united, and therefore his Holi-"neſs would run a great hazard, if he ſhould cauſe-"leſsly make theſe two Monarchs his enemies: "that tho' the Naples expedition had miſcarried, "he could not be ſure it would be the ſame with "ſuch others as ſhould be hereafter undertaken; "nay, it was eaſy to ſee, by the dangerous ſtate "of the Emperor's affairs, what might happen "another time: that if, out of exceſſive conde-"ſcenſion for the Emperor, he dealed ſo unjuſtly "by the King of England as to refuſe him what "even equity and the law of God required, he "muſt likewiſe expect no favor or regard when "affairs ſhould be altered: that he ought to con-"ſider the King of England had ingaged in this "war to free him from captivity, and if, inſtead "of making a grateful return, he ſhould join with "his enemy, all Chriſtians would abhor his ingra-"titude." All this was not capable of diverting Clement from his deſign, and yet he would ſtill be thought unreſolved. He replied with a ſigh, "That "he was between the hammer and the anvil, and, "which way ſoever he turned, ſaw nothing before "him but dangers; and therefore he placed all his "hopes in the protection of God, who would not "forſake his church: that as to the reſt, he had "done for the King of England more than could "be reaſonably expected, in commiting the trial "of his cauſe to two legates, who were both de-"voted to him: that, not content with this, he ſtill "preſſed him to do more, and to diſregard the "cuſtomary rules of the church on like occaſions, "and publicly ſacrifice to him the Emperor, the "archduke his brother, Queen Catherine, the ho-"nor, dignity and intereſt of the Holy See: that "this was aſking too much, and the King ſhould "at leaſt ſuffer this affair to be decided by the "legates appointed for that purpoſe: that it was "not his fault if matters were delayed, and in caſe "it was owing to Campejo's negligence, he had "acted contrary to his orders." This anſwer was a plain indication of the Pontif's ſentiments. Accordingly, the envoys acquainted King Henry, that nothing was to be expected from the Pontif, and that the only way was to get the legates to give a ſpeedy ſentence. The truth is, Clement was already determined on agreeing with the Emperor; and if he ſhewed any farther regard for Henry, it was merely to avoid coming openly to a rupture with him, leſt Charles ſhould thereof take advantage in the treaty they were about concluding.

marry again? 2. Or if the King ſhould vow religion as well as the Queen, whether Pope Clement would diſpenſe with his vow, and allow him to take another wife while the Queen lived? 3. Or whether the Pope would grant him a diſpenſation to have two wives? But it does not appear how theſe points were decided. As for the brief produced by the Imperial miniſters, there was not the leaſt trace of any ſuch thing among the Pope's records, of which the Engliſh envoys (1) had good certificates. In this manner paſſed the whole year 1528, at the cloſe whereof the King found himſelf no more advanced than at the begining, except that he had ſtill ſome hope from Campejo, who all along pretended to be intirely in his intereſt. It may be affirmed, that Francis, in neglecting to aſſiſt Lautrec, occaſioned the turn which the divorce buſineſs then took, ſince he thereby gave Clement room to join with the Emperor (2).

While King Henry meditated only on his divorce, cardinal Wolſey was very diligently buſied in founding his colleges. As Clement, by his affected delays, gave Henry great uneaſineſs, he indeavored to gratify him otherwiſe, in granting his favorite whatever he deſired for his foundations. Among the public acts of the year 1528, there are ten or twelve bulls, as well for the ſuppreſſion of ſeveral ſmall monaſteries (3), as for other things concerning the two colleges, the indowment whereof his eminence ſo paſſionately deſired. Wherefore, perceiving what a fair opportunity preſented to obtain private favors from the Pontif, he forgot not to improve it. Had he waited another year, he would have run great hazard of leaving the work unfiniſhed.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan.

I have for ſome time been ſilent concerning the affairs of Scotland, there not having been any room to introduce them: but as their ſituation was changed during the courſe of this year, it is neceſſary briefly to relate what had paſſed in that country. The earl of Angus, George Douglaſs his brother, and their uncle Archibald, had ſtill the King's perſon in their power, and governed in his name. However Queen Margaret, who had cauſed her marriage with the earl of Angus to be annulled, and was married again to Henry Stewart, had ſtill a powerful party in Scotland: but as her partiſans could not act openly without being liable to be deemed rebels, ſince the King was in the hands of the Douglaſſes, the Queen made uſe of another expedient to accompliſh her deſigns. She perſuaded the King her ſon, by ſome perſons about him, to make his eſcape and retire to Sterling. The contrivance ſucceeded according to her wiſh. James took his opportunity, and eſcaping from the earl of Angus, withdrew to Sterling, where it was publiſhed that the Douglaſſes ſhould be no longer acknowledged for regents, and were withal forbid the court. This order was notified to the earl of Angus, while he was marching to recover the King's perſon. As he had but few troops, and was unable to enter Sterling by force, where ſeveral great men were come to the King's relief, he obeyed and retired.

James aſſumes the reins of the government before he was of age.

Soon after the King called a parliament at Edinburg, the third of September, and came himſelf to hold it. The Douglaſſes, perceiving what was preparing againſt them, attempted to ſurpriſe Edinburg, and become maſters of the King's perſon, with deſign to diſſolve the parliament: but being repulſed, they were forced to retire. Whereupon the parliament confiſcated their eſtates to the King; but they continued in arms, and made incurſions even to the gates of Edinburg.

Henry being informed of what paſſed in Scotland, and fearing the young King might ſuffer himſelf to be prejudiced againſt him, thought it adviſeable to ſend embaſſadors to make peace, ſince a war with Scotland could not be but very inconvenient in his then ſituation. But it was not poſſible to ſucceed: a truce only for five years was concluded at Berwick, and ſigned the fourteenth of December. It was agreed by a ſeparate article, That the Douglaſſes might take refuge in England, on condition they delivered to their Sovereign the places they held in Scotland; and in caſe they entered the kingdom, and commited any diſorders, Henry ſhould be reſponſible as if done by his own ſubjects (4).

Since his Sanctity had determined to agree with Charles, his feeding the allies with hopes was only to obtain the better terms from that Monarch. On the other hand, Francis ſuſpecting Clement's intentions, perceived likewiſe that a peace only would procure him his ſons, and therefore continued a ſecret negociation with the Emperor: but, at the ſame inſtant, he made great promiſes to the Venetians, Florentines, duke of Milan, and the Pope himſelf, to let the Emperor ſee, in caſe he did not make haſte and conclude, it would perhaps be too late when he deſired it. About this time, Charles had certain advice, that the Turks were making great preparations to invade Hungary, and penetrate even into Germany: wherefore, very ſenſible that a diverſion in Italy might greatly imbaraſs him at ſuch a juncture, he was the more inclined to peace. Theſe diſpoſitions in the principal parties could not in the end but produce the pacification which was univerſally expected with impatience. Mean while, the war was continued, tho' faintly, in the kingdom of Naples and the duchy of Milan, where the French and Venetians had kept ſome places, but it was eaſy to ſee that nothing deciſive would happen.

How the Pope and Francis ſtood affected to the Emperor. Guicciard.

Mean while Clement was wholly intent on his own particular concerns. His aim was not only to be reſtored to Florence, but alſo to become maſter of Peruſa and Ferrara, and recover Ravenna and Cervia, taken by the Venetians during his captivity. Under color of uſing his intereſt to procure a general peace, he had ſent a nuncio to Spain, to conclude a private treaty with the Emperor. During that negociation, the divorce buſineſs was quite at a ſtand. Clement VII was fully reſolved to ſatisfy the Emperor, and by that Henry daily loſt the hopes of ſucceeding in his purſuit. Mean while, a violent diſtemper, which ſeized the Pope in the begining of the year 1529, had like to have very much changed the face of affairs (5). Cardinal Wolſey having notice of the Pope's dangerous illneſs, had diſpatched away a courier to Gardiner, conjuring him to neglect nothing he thought capable of procuring him the Papacy. Henry himſelf had writ to ſeveral cardinals in his behalf, and the King of France, who was not yet ſecure of a peace, had given him all thoſe of his faction. It is pretended, Wolſey would have been ſure of more than a third of the votes, in caſe the Pope had died: indeed that was not ſufficient to make him Pope; but it was enough to hinder any other from being elected. This affair was even carried ſo far, that the King had ordered his embaſſadors at Rome, that if, notwithſtanding the cardinals of Wolſey's faction, another perſon ſhould be deſigned, they ſhould ſo manage, that theſe cardinals ſhould proteſt againſt the proceedings in the conclave, and then withdrawing to ſome ſecure place, ſhould themſelves come to a new election. I know not, whether it would have been eaſy for the embaſſadors to obtain ſo abſolute a reſignation to the King's pleaſure: however, it is not ſtrange that Henry ſhould be ſo very deſirous of procuring the Papacy for his miniſter and favorite: but it is ſurpriſing, that a Prince who ſtiled himſelf Protector of the Church, and Defender of the Faith, ſhould not ſcruple indeavoring thus premeditately to form a ſchiſm in the church, purely to gratify his paſſion. As for cardinal Wolſey, nothing in his conduct ought to be thought ſtrange; ſince it is certain, he was ready to ſacrifice all to his ambition. Clement's recovery put an end to all theſe cabals, which however could not be ſo privately carried on but they came to his knowledge. This made him conſider Wolſey as a dangerous rival, and capable of ſupplanting him if opportunity offered, by uſing for pretext the defect in his birth.

King Henry imploys all his intereſt for him. Burnet. Vol. I. p. 64. Herbert.

When Clement VII was fully recovered, the proceedings for the divorce continued on the ſame foot as before. His ſaid Holineſs gave hopes that the buſineſs ſhould be decided in England in the King's favor, by a ſentence of the legates which he would himſelf confirm, to render it more authentic. His aim was to gain time, and prevent the appearance of any miſunderſtanding between him and the Engliſh court, before he had concluded his treaty with the Emperor, becauſe it was a means to obtain better conditions. To this end, and to prevent Henry's being impatient, he had put into Gardiner's hands a brief, promiſing not to revoke the powers given his legates: but, beſide that the brief was expreſſed in ambiguous terms, he knew ſentence would not be paſſed without his poſitive orders. This management, which Clement continued with many artifices, afforded the King ſome hope of gaining him to his intereſt. The better to ſucceed, he prevailed on King Francis to ſend to his Holineſs the biſhop of Bayona, with orders earneſtly to ſollicit the deciſion of that affair. He could have wiſhed that the Pope of his own accord would have granted a bull to annul his marriage, and diſpenſe with his taking another wife, or at leaſt have given the legates ſuch a commiſſion as it ſhould not be in their choice to judge otherwiſe than in his favor. Clement, delighted to find King Henry ſo intent on his own projects, ſtill fed him with hopes of ſucceſs: but withal, he expreſſed great apprehenſion of what the Emperor might do againſt him, and uſed that pretenſe to delay the favor he ſeemingly reſolved to grant. In all other matters he was ever ready to content the King. The See of Wincheſter being vacant, by the death of Richard Fox, and Henry deſiring him to beſtow it on Wolſey, the bulls for that purpoſe were immediately diſpatched: it is true, they were rated at fifteen thouſand ducats; but Wolſey would give no more than ſix thouſand, alledging, he could do very well without it, ſince the King had already granted him the temporalities of that biſhoprick. This ſhews in what ſpirit he thus heaped upon him the church-preferments. But herein is nothing ſurpriſing, ſince the Pope himſelf made no ſcruple to own in his bull that he confered this biſhoprick on the cardinal, to help him to bear the expenſes to which by his rank he was obliged.

The Pope's pretenſe to delay the divorce. Burnet.

While this paſſed, the Emperor haſtened, as much as poſſible, the concluſion of his treaty with Pope Clement, being reſolved to grant whatever he required, rather than give him occaſion to join with his enemies. Before the Pope was aſſured of this agreement, policy required he ſhould keep Charles under apprehenſion that the divorce affair would be determined to the King of England's ſatisfaction; conſequently, it was his intereſt that the buſineſs ſhould remain undecided, to convince Charles that it depended on the ſucceſs of the negociation at Barcelona: but when he had juſt brought him to his own terms, he began inſenſibly to ſeek pretenſes to break his ingagements with Henry. To this purpoſe, the reſtitution of Ravenna and Cervia was again moved, his Sanctity feigning a belief that had Henry pleaſed, he ſhould have had theſe two cities before now, and from thence took occaſion of diſſatisfaction. On the other hand, the Emperor, knowing Clement's intention, proteſted in Queen Catherine's name, againſt whatever ſhould be done in England relating to the divorce, declaring, that ſhe excepted againſt the two legates, as one was notoriouſly devoted to the King, and the other biſhop of Saliſbury. The King's miniſters uſed their utmoſt indeavors to perſuade his Holineſs to reject the proteſtation. But he replied, he could not, without ſhewing himſelf too partial to the King, ſince a proteſtation was no prejudice to the cauſe itſelf. That it would be a very ſtrange thing to refuſe a Queen the right of proteſting, which the meaneſt perſon could claim. All this, added to many other circumſtances, and to certain advices, that Pope Clement was treating with the Emperor, took from the Engliſh miniſters all hope of ever doing any good with him: wherefore, they wrote to the King, that they were only amuſed, and if the proceſs was not ſpeedily decided in England, there was danger of its being transfered to Rome. Hereupon, Henry reſolved to proceed before the legates, and not ſuffer himſelf to be any longer impoſed on by deceitful promiſes. Mean while, when the inſtrument whereby Clement had promiſed not to revoke his legates commiſſion, came to be examined, it was found to be worded in general or ambiguous terms, which left him at liberty to proceed as he pleaſed. In order therefore to know whether he had acted with ſincerity, when he ſigned that inſtrument, Gardiner was ordered to repreſent to him, that the paper, whereon it was written being wet thro' the courier's careleſſneſs, and the words in a manner quite defaced, his Majeſty deſired he would ſign another: but his Beatitude deviſed ſome artifice to be excuſed. Thus Henry, ſatisfied nothing was to be expected from the court of Rome, where Charles had but too much intereſt, recalled Gardiner (1) and Brian, and ſent Bennet to Rome, only to hinder, as much as lay in his power, the avocation of his cauſe. This envoy was charged with a letter from the two legates, directed to the Pope and cardinals, wherein they ſaid, that the principal point in the cauſe they were to judge, conſiſted in knowing, whether Julius II could grant a diſpenſation, or had exceeded his power: that ſince the ſole point was to decide concerning the authority of the head of the church, they conceived it to be beyond their commiſſion, and therefore were of opinion, his

Sanctity

Remarks on the letter with reſpect to Wolſey.

Sanctity would do well to avocate the cauſe: that they doubted not, the King would conſent to it, provided he had ſome aſſurance it ſhould be decided in his favor. It is not eaſy to conceive what could induce cardinal Wolſey to ſign ſuch a letter, ſo directly contrary to the King's intereſt: for, tho' the legates ſeemed to preſume his concurrence, it was evident the reaſon of the avocation ſtill ſubſiſted, whether Henry did or did not conſent. Conſequently they furniſhed his Sanctity with a plauſible pretenſe to avocate the cauſe, which the King, of all things, moſt dreaded. Was Wolſey deceived by Campejo, or did he ſacrifice the intereſt of his Sovereign? It is difficult to believe either; and yet hiſtorians affirm, that one of the principal cauſes of his diſgrace was a letter he had writ to the Pope which by Bennet's means, came to King Henry's knowledge, and it might, very poſſibly, be this. In reality, he was inexcuſable if he ſigned it without the King's approbation; and on the other hand, it cannot be conceived that Henry ſhould be ſo blind as not to ſee the conſequence of ſuch counſel.

The legates ſit to hear the cauſe. Burnet. Vol. III. p. 46. Herbert. p. 107, &c. Hall.

Tho' Campejo came to England in October the year preceding, it was now the end of May, and nothing done towards the trial of that cauſe which brought him thither. Henry, having ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed by Clement, whoſe intereſt it was to gain time, had been ever in hope of obtaining a bull to null the marriage, without being obliged to go thro' the uſual forms of a proceſs: but his agents finally convincing him that his expectations were vain, he reſolved to proceed before the legates. To this end, on the thirty-firſt of May, he granted them a licenſe to execute the Pope's commiſſion. They met the ſame day, and appointed aſſiſtants (1) to examine the papers and evidences. From the very firſt ſeſſion, it appeared that Campejo intended to prolong the proceſs, ſince, after the commiſſion was read, he ordered the King and Queen to be cited to appear the eighteenth of June. This was too long a term, if there had been any deſign to diſpatch the affair, eſpecially as the parties were in London itſelf, or in one of their palaces near the city. Tho' Wolſey was the ſenior cardinal, he ſuffered Campejo to preſide, to ſhew he intended to act without partiality: ſo, from the firſt day to the laſt, Campejo did all, without Wolſey's ever appearing to oppoſe the affected delays of his collegue between the ſeſſions. I ſhall not enter any farther into the particulars of this famous proceſs, which may be ſeen at large in the excellent and univerſally known hiſtory of England's reformation, but content myſelf with relating in general the moſt remarkable circumſtances.

In the ſecond ſeſſion, the Queen's proctors (2) excepted againſt the two legates: but the exception not being deemed valid, ſhe had a further day given her, to the twenty-firſt (3). On that day, the King and Queen appeared in perſon (4): but the Queen, without ſaying a word to the legates, went and kneeled down before the King, and made a very moving ſpeech, concluding with imploring his juſtice and pity; after which, ſhe withdrew, and would never more appear, nor ſuffer any perſon to defend her cauſe (5). As ſoon as ſhe was retired, the King declared he was very well pleaſed with the Queen, and in ſuing to be divorced from her, acted ſolely from a motive of religion and conſcience (6). Adding, that his ſcruples concerning his marriage ſprang from thoſe of the biſhop of Tarbe, and were confirmed by the opinion of all the biſhops of England. The archbiſhop of Canterbury confirmed what the King ſaid, concerning the Biſhops; but Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter denied he ever ſet his hand to the writing which was preſented to the King. Mean while, the Queen was cited again for the twenty-fifth of June, but inſtead of appearing, ſhe ſent in her appeal in form *, from whatever had been, or ſhould be done hereafter: nevertheleſs ſhe was declared contumacious. The ſame day, the proceſs was reduced to twelve articles, on which witneſſes were to be examined. The principal article was, Prince Arthur's conſummation of his marriage with Catherine, which the Queen had denied with an oath, and which notwithſtanding was proved by the teſtimony of ſeveral perſons, as far as a thing of that nature can be. Theſe proofs conſiſted in the age, health, and vigorous conſtitution of the Prince, and in his diſcourſes next morning after the nuptials: ſo that either Arthur or Catherine muſt have vouched what was not the truth; the one thro' vanity, or the other thro' intereſt (7).

to declare for either afforded him a pretenſe to remain undetermined, 'till he received advice of the concluſion of his treaty with Charles. At length the agreeable news being come, he reſolved to avocate the cauſe, before publication of the treaty, leſt it ſhould be thought to be one of the ſecret articles. Weak precaution to efface or prevent ſuch a ſuſpicion.

Conditions of the treaty. Guicciard.

The ſubſtance of this treaty, which was ſigned at Barcelona the twenty-ninth of June, was, That Charles ſhould reſtore to Florence the Medicis family on the ſame foot as formerly: that he ſhould cauſe Ravenna and Cervia to be delivered to his Holineſs: that he ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of Modena and Reggio, ſaving the rights of the Empire: that he ſhould aid him to become maſter of Ferrara: that Franceſco Sforza ſhould be reſtored to Milan, if innocent; but if guilty, Charles ſhould not diſpoſe of the duchy to any Prince Pope Clement ſhould diſlike: that the Pope and Emperor ſhould imploy their temporal and ſpiritual arms againſt the heretics of Germany: that Aleſſandro di Medicis ſhould eſpouſe Margaret the Emperor's natural daughter: that the Pope ſhould grant the Emperor a fourth of the Eccleſiaſtical revenues in his dominions, to make war upon the Turks: that he ſhould abſolve all who were any way concerned in taking and ſacking Rome. What greater advantages could Clement have expected, ſuppoſing he had been victorious in the late war? But Charles believed he could not purchaſe at too high a price the friendſhip of his Sanctity, who might ſtill have greatly imbaraſſed him, if he had joined with France, England, and the republic of Venice.

Clement avocates the cauſe to Rome. Burnet. Herbert.

Pope Clement having concluded his treaty with the Emperor, did himſelf, on the ninth of July, acquaint the Engliſh embaſſadors with his reſolution of avocating to Rome the cauſe of their maſter's divorce. Thoſe miniſters uſed all poſſible indeavors to diſſuade him from it, repreſenting to him, that the Holy See would thereby irrecoverably loſe England: but all their arguments were fruitleſs. By his late treaty with Charles, the Medici were to be reſtored to the government of Florence: this alone was ſufficient to outweigh in his mind all the dangers to which he expoſed the Holy See; ſo great was his affection for a family from whence he was deſcended, even tho' illegitimately. So, the fifteenth of July, he ſigned the bull of avocation. Next day he notified it to Caſſali the King's embaſſador in ordinary, and to Bennet who had been ſent to him laſt. He alledged, in excuſe of the avocation, ſeveral reaſons which might have been of ſome weight in the begining of the proceſs, on ſuppoſition he had been intirely impartial, but which had loſt all their force ſince his proceedings, and the concluſion of his treaty with the Emperor. Three days after, he diſpatched a meſſenger with the bull of avocation into England, where proceedings were very dilatory by the artifices of cardinal Campejo who preſided in the affair.

He ſends a courier to England.

Continuation of the proceſs. Burnet. Herbert.

The Queen who was cited for the twenty-fifth of June, not appearing that day, ſhe had farther time given her to the twenty-eighth, and was ſummoned again to appear by the biſhop of Bath and Wells, tho' to no purpoſe. On the twenty-eighth, ſome depoſitions were read, after which the ſeſſion was adjourned to the fifth of July, when, by reaſon of certain holidays kept at Rome, it was farther defered 'till the twelfth. The court met again on the twelfth, the fourteenth, the ſeventeenth, the twenty-firſt and the twenty-third.

Campejo's delays. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 300.

As there was nothing more to do but to pronounce the ſentence, it was univerſally preſumed, that all would be over this ſeſſion; but people were ſtrangely ſurpriſed when cardinal Campejo was heard to adjourn the court to the firſt of October. He alledged for reaſon, that it was the time of the great vacation at Rome, and he was indiſpenſibly obliged to comply with that cuſtom (1).

HENRY VIII. AN' 1529.

He adjourns the court to October.

Thus did that legate, who was in the Pope's ſecrets, amuſe Henry, in the ſame manner as the Pope had amuſed him at Rome near two years, ever ſince the affair commenced. That Prince was as much inraged as ſurpriſed at the proceedings of the legates, but diſſembled both his ſurpriſe and reſentment. Shortly after, he plainly perceived to what all theſe affected delays tended, when he came to know that, notwithſtanding his ingagement, the Pope had avocated the cauſe. The bull of avocation being arrived *, he would not ſuffer it to be notified to him, but intimated to the legates, that he was content they ſhould obey the Pope's orders. Nor was it without reaſon that he would not have the bull notified to him: he was therein cited to appear at Rome within forty days; which he could not have done without acting contrary to the national laws, which prohibited obeying ſuch citations, and carrying cauſes to a foreign court. On this foundation it was that he had always inſiſted, that the proceſs ſhould be determined in the kingdom: beſide that, cenſures were denounced againſt him in the bull, as againſt a private perſon, if he obeyed not the citation. Some time after, Clement made him a ſort of reparation, in revoking theſe cenſures by a brief †, wherein he proteſted they were inſerted contrary to his intention: but as to the citation itſelf, he only prolonged the day to Chriſtmas.

† Dated Auguſt 29. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. P. 346.

The figure cardinal Wolſey made, during the pretended judgment of the proceſs, was very extraordinary. Of all mankind he was the proudeſt and moſt haughty: he was ſenior cardinal to his collegue, and yet gave place to him in every thing, and ſuffered him to act as he pleaſed, without ever oppoſing his opinion. Had the buſineſs ſucceeded anſwerably to Henry's deſire, Wolſey's conduct would doubtleſs have been applauded: but as every thing turned againſt the King, that miniſter could not poſſibly avoid being ſuſpected of betraying his maſter's intereſts, or at leaſt of having been very remiſs in his ſervice. Henry himſelf thought ſo, tho' he did not ſhew it directly (2). On the other hand, Ann Boleyn, who had ever believed the cardinal in her intereſt, was extremely ſurpriſed when ſhe was informed of what had paſſed. The King had removed her from court (3) while the legates were imployed in the judgment of the proceſs; but ſhe was ſent for the moment the bull of avocation arrived. It is pretended ſhe contributed not a little towards confirming the King's ſuſpicions of Wolſey. She was perſuaded, that had the cardinal ſo pleaſed, this affair would have taken another turn; but that he had altered his reſolution. Whether her opinion was well-grounded, or the vexation to find herſelf ſtill ſo remote from her hopes, exaſperated her againſt Wolſey, ſhe thenceforwards looked on him no otherwiſe than as a profeſſed enemy deſerving her utmoſt vengeance: ſo, finding Henry diſpoſed to give ear to whatever was ſaid againſt his miniſter, ſhe neglected nothing might contribute to his ruin. In this ſhe was aſſiſted by ſeveral perſons of the higheſt rank, who had no reaſon to love that haughty prelate.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1529.

The King is extremely uneasy. Burnet.

It is easy to guess Henry's concern to see himself on a sudden so distant from his aim. The Pope had joined in league with Charles, who was properly his party. Francis I, from whom he had expected a powerful aid in case of need, had just concluded at Cambray a treaty with the Emperor, whereby he ingaged not to assist that Prince's enemies. Finally, Queen Catherine remained obstinate not to accept any expedient which might occasion her ceasing to be the wife of King Henry. On the other hand, that Monarch's love for Ann Boleyn, which he had pleased himself with the hopes of gratifying by a lawful marriage, helped not a little to increase his concern. He knew not which way to get rid of his Queen, who, by her obstinacy, had very much lessened that esteem and affection he had always borne her (1). His heart replete with these perplexing thoughts, and uncertain what to resolve, he determined on taking a progress into some of his counties, in order to dispel his melancholy.

He takes a progress. Burnet. Hall. Stow.

Dr. Cranmer opens him a way to extricate himself. Burnet. * Named Cressy.

During his journey, he lodged one night at Waltham, where Edward Fox and secretary Gardiner chanced to take up their lodging at the house of a gentleman * who had two sons to whom Thomas Cranmer was tutor. Cranmer was a doctor in divinity, who, having been professor at Cambridge (2), had lost his benefice because married. He had travelled into Germany, where he had read Luther's works, and imbraced his doctrine, but with more moderation than was usually seen in the first disciples of that reformer. At supper, Cranmer being at table with Fox and Gardiner, the conversation ran on the divorce, and as the master of the family had informed the two courtiers of Cranmer's merit and capacity, they desired him to give his opinion on that subject. Cranmer at first modestly declined it, but they pressed him so much that he could not excuse himself: so, after stating the question, he said, He saw no better way to extricate the King from his difficulties, than to procure, in writing, the opinions of all the universities in Europe, and of the most eminent divines and civilians: that one of these two things would follow, either the universities and the learned would judge Julius II's dispensation sufficient, or deem it invalid: that in the first case, the King's conscience would have reason to be easy; and in the second, the Pope would never venture to pass sentence contrary to the opinion of all the learned and able men in Christendom. Fox and Gardiner relishing this advice, imparted it to the King, who, immediately taking the author's meaning, cried out, in extasy of joy, "That he had "got the right sow by the ear"; an expression, which in its coarseness shewed how much the King was pleased with the expedient. At the same time he sent for Cranmer, who explaining more at large what he had just hinted at table, so gained his esteem, that from that moment he was ordered to follow the court. This is the same doctor who will shortly be seen making a considerable figure in England, and laying the first foundations of the reformation in that kingdom.

The King entertains a great esteem for Cranmer.

Campejo returns to Rome. Herbert. Hall.

The King being returned from his progress, cardinal Campejo, whose commission was revoked, took his audience of leave, as having no farther business in England. Henry had so much command of himself as not to take any notice of his procedure, and looked on him pleasantly: but just as the cardinal was going to imbark, the custom-house officers searched all his baggage, under color of looking for contraband goods (3). Probably, the King hoped to find the decretal bull, which he had seen in his hands, not knowing it was burned (4). Campejo loudly complained of this insult, and wrote to King to demand satisfaction, as for a gross affront done to the legate of the Holy See. Henry coldly answered, That his customers had done their duty, in executing orders long since established with regard to persons going out of the kingdom: that he was surprised he should talk of his being legate when recalled, and much more that, being bishop of Salisbury, he should be so ignorant of the laws of the land, as to dare to assume that title without his license. Campejo perceiving, by this answer, that the King intended not to give him satisfaction, thought himself very happy in being suffered to depart.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1529.

They search his baggage.

He complains of it, but to no purpose.

This cardinal had good reason to wish himself out of the kingdom. With what moderation soever King Henry behaved to him, he could not be ignorant how much he was insensed, after seeing, some days before his departure, what course was taking with his collegue cardinal Wolsey. The ninth of October, the attorney-general had prefered a bill of indictment against Wolsey, as guilty of violating the statute of Præmunire. The seventeenth of the same month, Henry sent and demanded the great seal, tho' it was given him for life: for which reason, the cardinal made some scruple to deliver it; but he obeyed the second command (5), and in few days the King gave it to sir Thomas More, a person universally esteemed for his great integrity. No sooner had Wolsey delivered the great seal, but the attorney general prefered against him other articles of impeachment. The King having given him leave to appoint counsel to answer for him, he chose two who appeared, and protested in his name, he knew not that obtaining the bulls whereof he was accused was contrary to the national laws, and prejudicial to the prerogative royal: as for the particulars wherewith he was charged, they said, he confessed them, and cast himself intirely on the King's mercy. He was accused twice, as I said, viz. on the ninth and eighteenth of October, and both times found guilty, and declared to be out of the protection of the laws. Probably, he was indicted first, for obtaining several bulls without the King's express license, and the second time for exercising the office of legate a latere in England, without the King's letters patent to that purpose, contrary to the intent of the law.

As soon as the cardinal was out-lawed, the King commanded him to quit York-place, and retire to a country-seat belonging to him as bishop of Winchester. Then he ordered an inventory of all his goods to be taken, which contained immense riches (6), acquired by many acts of injustice. It is affirmed that, of fine Holland alone, no fewer than a thouſand pieces were found in his houſe: one may judge of the reſt by this pattern. Some time after, he got preſented to the King a very humble petition, praying a protection for his perſon; without which, he ſaid, he was expoſed to the inſults of the meaneſt enemy who would abuſe him. This requeſt Henry granted, November the ſeventeenth, with a power to anſwer for himſelf in all actions which ſhould be entered againſt him for the future: moreover, he left him the archbiſhoprick of York, and the ſee of Wincheſter. It is difficult to account for Henry's behavior with reſpect to this cardinal, ſince, at the very time he ſeemed moſt inſenſed againſt him, he ſent him a certain ring, which was, between them, a token of the continuance of his affection. The cardinal, who was then on the road to his ſeat near Wincheſter (1), was ſo tranſported with joy at ſight of the ring, that he alighted from his horſe, and fell on his knees in the dirt to receive it (2): but his hopes were not long-lived. His enemies, who had Henry's ear, labored ſo ſtrenuouſly to exaſperate the King againſt him, that his affair was finally brought before the parliament.

Burnet. Fiddes. Stow.

Wolſey's affair brought before the parliament.

Lord Herbert has inſerted in his hiſtory the forty four articles of impeachment preſented to King Henry againſt Wolſey by the houſe of lords, which differ much from thoſe prefered by Hales the attorney general, either in the ſtar-chamber, or elſewhere. Hales had accuſed him of violating the ſtatute of Præmunire, and executing the office of legate a latere without the King's licenſe. Therein, he proceeded according to the tenor of the ſaid ſtatute, which ran, "That no perſon ſhould be "exempt from the penalty, but thoſe to whom the "King ſhould vouchſafe to grant his letters patent." Now, as Wolſey had not the precaution to get a licenſe in due form, he was, according to the rigor of the law, liable to thoſe penalties: but in the houſe of lords articles, there was no ſuch matter; and indeed it would have been contrary to equity to accuſe his ſaid eminence of exerciſing a legatine authority without his Sovereign's permiſſion, ſince the King was known to conſent to it, tho' not in the manner by law preſcribed. The attorney general did well to keep the letter of the law, purſuant to the duty of his office: but it would have been wrong in the peers to take advantage of the want of a formality to deſtroy one of their body: ſo, the articles exhibited by the lords ran upon crimes which had no relation to the ſtatute of Præmunire. The cardinal was chiefly accuſed of abuſing his legatine power, contrary to his oath, when admited to the exerciſe of his legateſhip: of unjuſt proceedings as chancellor: of making himſelf, on ſeveral occaſions, equal to the King (3): of iſſuing out diverſe orders of moment without the King's knowledge: of acting arbitrarily on many accounts, as if he was rather Sovereign than miniſter. The reſt of the articles were all of the ſame nature, and ran upon the ill uſe he had made of his power, as legate, chancellor, prime miniſter, and favorite: but Article VI.

I cannot paſs over in ſilence one article which ſeems very extraordinary, namely, that the cardinal, knowing he had the pox upon him, had the confidence daily to approach the King's perſon, frequently whiſpering in his ear, without fearing to infect him with his breath. Theſe articles being ſent down to the commons, Thomas Cromwell, member of parliament, and Wolſey's domeſtic, undertook his defenſe, and did it in ſuch a manner as redounded much to his own honor, and was one of the main cauſes of his future advancement: it is true, he pretended not to clear him of the crimes wherewith he was charged, but only to ſhew he was not guilty of treaſon, as the houſe of peers aſſerted, wherein he ſucceeded anſwerably to his wiſhes.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1529.

It is now requiſite to treat of the peace of Cambray, which before was only tranſiently mentioned. All Europe was ſo nearly intereſted in the differences between Charles V and Francis I, that it is very difficult to underſtand the hiſtories of the other ſtates, without having a clear idea of the affairs of theſe two Monarchs. The whole former part of the year 1529, Francis imployed in laboring to negociate a peace with the Emperor. After his ill ſucceſs in the Neapolitan war, he was convinced he had no other way to recover his two hoſtages. He knew the Pope was carrying on a ſecret negociation in Spain, and that it lay intirely in Charles's breaſt to have peace with all the Italian Potentates, by reſtoring Sforza to Milan: ſo that even had France and England uſed their utmoſt efforts, that, in all probability, would have only ſerved to haſten the peace of Italy. But the King of France was not even ſure he could prevail on Henry to act, that Prince being ſtill deſirous to keep meaſures with Clement and Charles, in hopes of obtaining their conſent to his divorce rather by fair means than by arms: beſide, tho' he was bound to contribute large ſums for the war, he payed them only in paper, by acquitances of what was due to him from Francis; ſo, properly ſpeaking, this was no aſſiſtance to France, drained by the former wars of men and money. Francis had therefore no buſineſs to ſtand in ſuſpenſe: it was neceſſary for him to make peace at any rate; however, to obtain as good terms as poſſible, he amuſed the Venetians, the duke of Ferrara, and the Florentines, with great promiſes, leſt they ſhould prevent him, and, after they had made peace with the Emperor, his condition become ſtill more deſperate. He told them, he was reſolved perſonally to lead into Italy a powerful army. This management he purſued 'till he had concluded the treaty of Cambray, wherein he left them all to the Emperor's mercy. Probably, Henry was the only ally who was privy to his intentions. The Emperor was not ignorant of the ſituation of the French King's affairs, and doubtleſs, would have made it turn more to his advantage, had not the invaſion the Turks were preparing againſt Hungary and Auſtria, and the commotions raiſed by the proteſtants in Germany, made him deſirous to leave Italy in quiet: beſide, he ſaw that a peace was the only way to break the ſtrict union of France with England. If theſe two Monarchs had joined in the league which the proteſtants of Germany were projecting for their common defenſe, they would have created him troubles which might have broke all his meaſures. Theſe were the real motives which made Charles inclinable to a pacification, which however he obliged France to purchaſe at no cheap rate. Charles and Francis being in the ſame diſpoſition, agreed together by ſecret negociations on the chief articles of the peace, the whole honor whereof they were however pleaſed to leave in appearance to the ladies. In July, Margaret of Auſtria, the Emperor's aunt and governeſs of the Netherlands, and Louiſa of Savoy, ducheſs of Angoulême, Francis's mother, repaired to Cambray, and, the fifth of Auguſt, ſigned a treaty, the ſubſtance whereof was as follows:

This treaty being ratified, it was ſome time before Francis durſt give audience to the embaſſadors of Venice and Florence, becauſe he could not without confuſion hear their juſt reproaches. At length, he put them off with ſome trifling excuſes, and freſh promiſes, which he performed no better than thoſe before the peace. What was ſuperlatively ridiculous, even after the peace was concluded, the biſhop of Tarbe, his embaſſador at Venice, not having timely notice, ſtrenuouſly ſollicited the ſenate to ſupport the war on the hopes he gave them of a powerful aſſiſtance.

Francis deceives his allies.

It was likewiſe ſomewhat ſtrange that, Henry having proclaimed war with the Emperor by a herald, there ſhould be however no particular treaty between them. Henry was ſatisfied with a ſingle article inſerted in that of Cambray, whereby the King of France was bound to pay him the two hundred and ninety thouſand crowns, due from the Emperor, and redeem the rich flower-de-lys, pawned by the Emperor Maximilian to Henry VII, for fifty thouſand crowns. He did more; for he generouſly forgave Francis the firſt ſum, and made a preſent of the ſecond to the duke of Orleans, his god-ſon (1). This evidences that, in making peace, Francis had not dealed with Henry as with the Princes of Italy, but had convinced him of the neceſſity he was under to conclude it.

Henry's generoſity to Francis. Herbert. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 328.

Charles, being agreed with Francis on the principal articles of the peace, departed Barcelona before he received advice of the concluſion, and, with nine thouſand men, on the twelfth of Auguſt, arrived at Genoua. The peace of Cambray being publiſhed ſoon after, the Venetians, the duke of Milan, the duke of Ferrara, and the Florentines, whom Francis had abandoned, ſaw no other refuge than to caſt themſelves on the clemency of Charles, who had it in his power to make them pay dear for their attachment to France. The diſcuſſion of their affairs being refered to a conference, which the Emperor was to have with his Holineſs at Bologna, each ſent embaſſadors to take care of their concerns. Here it was that Charles injoined the Venetians to reſtore Ravenna and Cervia to the Pontif, and to himſelf ſome places they ſtill held in the kingdom of Naples. Franceſco Sforza was reſtored to the duchy of Milan, on condition of paying to the Emperor four hundred thouſand crowns in hand, and five hundred thouſand in the ſpace of ten years, at ten payments. The duke of Ferrara having offered to make Charles arbiter and judge of his differences with the Pontif, his offer was accepted, Clement thinking nothing could be more for his advantage than to ſubmit to the deciſion of his Imperial Majeſty, who was already bound by the treaty of Barcelona to procure him Modena and Reggio, and aſſiſt him to take poſſeſſion of Ferrara. As to the Florentines, it was not poſſible to reconcile them with the Pontif: they would not hearken to any agreement, except they were aſſured of preſerving their liberty, being reſolved to defend it to the laſt drop of their blood. They however offered to purchaſe it with a ſum of money: but the Pope, on his part, tendered them all kinds of advantages, provided the Medicis family was reſtored to Florence on the ſame footing as before the legate's expulſion. The parties not agreeing, Charles ordered the Prince of Orange to beſiege Florence, and re-eſtabliſh the Medici.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1530.

Charles, having ended his affairs in Italy, was impatient to return into Germany, where the affairs of religion began to make him uneaſy. For ſome time, the Proteſtants had conſtantly inſiſted on a free council in Germany, which was poſitively promiſed tho' never deſigned. During the late war, the Emperor had all along amuſed them with the hopes of granting this council: but no ſooner was the peace concluded than, in his conference with Clement at Bologna, he promiſed him to imploy his utmoſt efforts to effect their reduction without a council. Mean while, the Proteſtants, comprehending his intention by his menacing anſwer to their envoys after concluſion of the peace, were meditating to join in a league for their common defenſe; and this gave his Imperial Majeſty great uneaſineſs, and obliged him ſpeedily to finiſh his affairs in Italy, in order to ſettle thoſe of Germany. Before his departure from Bologna, he received the Imperial crown at the Pontif's hands, February 24. 1530, the feſtival of St. Matthias, being his own birth-day, and which, on ſeveral occaſions, had been to him very fortunate (2). He finally ſet out from Bologna, on the twenty-ſecond of March 1530, for Germany, being attended by cardinal Campejo, who, on Clement's behalf, was to aſſiſt at the diet of Augſburg.

Purſuant to Charles's orders, the Prince of Orange inveſted Florence, and was ſlain at the ſiege, which the Florentines deſperately maintained. At length, on the tenth of Auguſt, they were forced to capitulate, but yet on expreſs condition, that they ſhould injoy their liberty, leaving it to his Imperial Majeſty to ſettle the form of their government. But ſome days after, the Medici's adherents raiſing a tumult in the city, and finding themſelves ſupported by a great number of Spaniſh officers, who had entered on diverſe pretexts, Pope Clement was re-poſſeſſed of the government. Then the Emperor, without regarding articles of capitulation, eſtabliſhed Aleſſandro di Medicis, his ſon-in-law, at Florence, on the ſame footing his progenitors had been before, and moreover made the Sovereignty hereditary in his family.

The firſt of June this year, Francis received his two ſons, who were hoſtages in Spain, on paying the Emperor twelve hundred thouſand crowns in hand, and giving ſecurity for the reſidue of the ſum ſtipulated. He then eſpouſed Leonora, purſuant to the treaty of Cambray. Had he been obliged to find ready-money to pay Henry what the Emperor owed him, according to the tenor of their treaty, very probably he would not ſo ſoon have recovered his ſons: but Henry proved a moſt generous friend, who, to facilitate his redeeming them, frankly gave him up Charles's bonds, to reſtore them to him, as well as the above-mentioned pledged jewel (3). Moreover, he renounced all demands of his charges in aſſiſting him, which, according to Francis's confeſſion, extant in Rymer, amounted to the ſum of five hundred twelve thouſand two hundred twenty-two crowns de ſoleil (1), in ready-money and acquitances on the two millions owed him by Francis. This exceſſive munificence he charged with only a ſingle condition, viz. "That, "in caſe Francis violated the peace and alliance "they had made together, he ſhould ſtill be ac-"countable for all theſe ſums," to which Francis bound himſelf by letters-patent.

By the execution of the Cambray-treaty, King Francis ſaw himſelf at length in profound tranquillity, tho' the late war had coſt him immenſe ſums, the loſs of Genoua and Milan, the ſovereignty of Flanders and Artois, a year's captivity, numberleſs vexations, and perhaps ſomething of his honor and reputation: but it was not ſo with Henry. After a vaſt charge to ſupport the intereſts of his ally, he was ſtill imbaraſſed with the affair of his divorce, and in danger of a ſpeedy quarrel with the Emperor. However, as he was naturally ſteady in his projects, all theſe obſtacles ſufficed not to diſcourage him, and he reſolved to bring this buſineſs to a concluſion, let what would inſue. Thomas Cranmer being then highly in his favor and eſteem, he injoined him to imploy his pen on the divorce; and the doctor did it with univerſal approbation. After that, he was ordered to accompany the embaſſadors ſent by King Henry to the Pope and Emperor, to try for the laſt time to find ſome expedient to terminate this matter which gave him ſuch perplexity. Theſe embaſſadors found Clement and Charles at Bologna, and had audience of both. The Pope expreſſed ſome inclination to give Henry ſatisfaction, but durſt not act without concurrence of the Emperor, who loudly proteſted, he would never abandon his aunt Queen Catherine. Cranmer maintained his maſter's cauſe with great warmth, which hindered not Clement from nominating him his plenipotentiary in England, to pleaſe King Henry, whom he ſtrove to oblige in trifles, while he did nothing for him in the grand affair.

Henry purſues at Rome the divorce affair. Herbert. Burnet. Hall.

Mean while Henry, purſuant to Cranmer's counſel, had ſent able and learned men into France, Italy, Germany, Swiſſerland, &c. to conſult univerſities concerning the divorce. We find, in Rymer's collection, the opinions of the univerſities of Angers, Paris, Bourges, Orleans, Thouloufe, Bologna, Ferrara and Padoua all uniform, declaring, that Julius II's diſpenſation for Henry's marriage with Catherine, being contrary to the divine law, could not be deemed valid. It might be objected, that the determinations of the French univerſities were ſuſpicious, by reaſon of the ſtrict union at that time between Francis and Henry: but the ſame cannot be ſaid of thoſe of Padoua and Ferrara, and ſtill leſs of that of Bologna, a city appertaining to the See of Rome. Dr. Burnet having largely handled this ſubject, thoſe who are diſpoſed more amply to examine the matter, may conſult his hiſtory of the reformation. It will ſuffice to obſerve here, that the queſtion was: whether Henry's marriage with his brother's widow was repugnant to God's law, and on that ſuppoſition, whether the Pope had power to grant a diſpenſation. The above-named univerſities maintained; that ſuch a marriage was contrary to the law of God, with which the Pope had not power to diſpenſe. Oxford and Cambridge being likewiſe conſulted, decreed the ſame, tho' not without great oppoſition from ſome of the members. It ſeems at firſt ſomewhat unaccountable that the two Engliſh univerſities ſhould herein be more ſcrupulous than the foreign: but the wonder ceaſes, when it is conſidered that theſe ſcruples aroſe not from the queſtion itſelf, but from the conſequence their determination might occaſion. Moſt of thoſe univerſities members were furiouſly averſe to Luther's doctrine, which began to ſpread in England, and were afraid of countenancing it, by deciding againſt the Pope: beſide, they plainly foreſaw that the King's marriage with Ann Boleyn would ſucceed his divorce from Queen Catherine, and this ſecond marriage they would have gladly prevented, becauſe Ann Boleyn much inclined to the reformation, and expreſſed a very particular eſteem for Cranmer, whoſe preferment, for the ſame reaſon, they greatly dreaded.

The reaſon of it. Burnet.

The embaſſadors who had been ſent into Italy (2), returning re infectâ, Henry, who 'till then had expreſſed a ſingular regard for the Pontif, reſolved to alter his behavior towards him: he by experience might have known that Clement was to be gained only by his intereſt. It is certain if, at firſt, he had proceeded with more vigor, and powerfully ſupported the war in Italy, his ſaid Beatitude would never have thought of joining with the Emperor. A good Engliſh fleet in the Mediterranean would have made Francis maſter of Naples, and ſaved the city of Genoua. His Holineſs would thereby have been ſo bridled, that he would moſt gladly have cultivated a laſting friendſhip with the King of England. Inſtead of acting thus, Henry remained quiet during the whole campain of 1528, ſuffering himſelf to be amuſed by the deceitful hopes wherewith he was conſtantly fed by Clement: ſo, the French were expeled the kingdom of Naples, and his Sanctity was at liberty to negociate with Charles concerning the recovery of Florence, of which he would never have even dreamed, had the French been ſuperior in Italy. Henry perceived his error when it was too late to repair it, that is, after Clement was united with the Emperor, and Francis bound by the treaty of Cambray. He was left alone to ſupport himſelf againſt both Pope and Emperor, and it was very happy for him that the Turks and Proteſtants of Germany ſo imbaraſſed the latter, as to hinder him from turning his thoughts towards England. Thus all means failing to accompliſh his deſign but what could be found in his own kingdom, he began, tho' ſomewhat of the lateſt, to make uſe of the inclinations of his ſubjects who, for the generality, were not over and above inamored of the Romiſh Pontifs.

Henry's falſe ſteps in relation to the divorce. Burnet.

He is ſtrangely imbaraſſed.

In ſeveral parts of this hiſtory, we have obſerved how frequently the Engliſh complained of Romiſh tyranny, and mentioned likewiſe the remedies by parliament applied to this grievance. It is true, the private intereſt of the Kings rendered theſe remedies in ſome meaſure ineffectual, becauſe, as they often ſtood in need of the Popes for their temporal concerns, the laws were not duely put in execution: but that altered not the inclinations of the Engliſh: the Lollards principles were ſtill deeply imprinted in the minds of great numbers; beſide, Luther's books, whereof many were brought into England, had opened the eyes of multitudes: ſo that it may be affirmed, at the time I am ſpeaking of, the Engliſh in general had, in matters of religion, ideas very different from thoſe of their anceſtors, eſpecially concerning the Pontifical authority. The three laſt Popes, Alexander VI, Julius II, and Leo X, had ſhewn ſo little piety and religion in their conduct, and Clement VII ſo cloſely followed their ſteps, that it was naturally infered to be impoſſible that Jeſus Chriſt ſhould have given the government of his church to ſuch vicars. Thus the Engliſh were very ready to ſhake off the Pope's yoke, had not their Sovereign, for the ſake of his own private intereſt, ſupported the exorbitant power ſo long complained of: but Clement VII had no ſooner joined with the Emperor than the King's intereſt became the ſame with the peoples. To this chiefly are to be aſcribed all the changes mentioned in the ſequel.

Diſpoſition of the Engliſh to the Popes, contrary to the intereſt of their Kings.

The King's and peoples intereſt becomes the ſame.

Letters from the Engliſh grandees to PopeClement. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 405. Herbert, p. 141. Burnet.

Henry, determined on making his Holineſs ſenſible of the danger of loſing England if he continued any longer to favor the Emperor, cauſed a letter, worded in ſtrong terms, to be ſent him by the grandees of the realm, according to the example of their progenitors in the reign of Henry III (1). They plainly told him, "That the King's cauſe "being their own, if he continued to deny them "what was abſolutely neceſſary for their quiet, they "were themſelves reſolved to apply the remedy "which was vainly expected from him." This was ſufficient to ſatisfy him, that the patience of the Engliſh was almoſt worn out, and they would not ſuffer themſelves to be curbed, or even amuſed any longer by the court of Rome. Indeed, the letter had not the deſired effect; nevertheleſs it failed not acquainting his Holineſs with the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, and how neceſſary it was to uſe them gently. Wherefore he returned the grandees a very moderate anſwer, vindicating his conduct with reſpect to the King, in the beſt manner poſſible. Mean while, he ſent for ſir Gregory Caſſali, King Henry's embaſſador in ordinary, and hinted to him, that the affair might be adjuſted by means of a diſpenſation for his maſter's having two wives. This we learn from the embaſſador's letter of the eighteenth of September, wherein, after informing his Majeſty of what the Pope had intimated, he added, that the Emperor's miniſters were alſo deſirous that the affair ſhould be terminated by this expedient. But Henry was ſo aware of all Clement's artifices, that he took no notice of this overture. His reſolution was, either to have a bull to null the marriage, or at any rate to procure himſelf the ſatisfaction he required: and therefore apprehenſive that, when leaſt expected, the Pope might ſend to England a bull of excommunication or interdict, he iſſued out a proclamation forbiding, under ſevere penalties, to receive any bull from Rome, contrary to the prerogatives of the crown. His deſign was to bring the affair before the parliament and clergy, and after gaining theſe two bodies to his intereſt, to cauſe it to be determined in England, without regarding the Pope's proceedings againſt him. The difficulty was, to prepoſſeſs the people in his favor. To this end, he ordered to be printed and publiſhed a ſort of abſtract of his reaſons for the divorce, that theſe reaſons being publicly known, he might meet with leſs oppoſition in parliament. This abſtract contained two principal points. The firſt was, that the King's marriage with Catherine was contrary to the law of God. The ſecond, that Julius II had not power to grant a diſpenſation for that marriage, and conſequently the diſpenſation could not render it lawful. As this affair was the ſpring of the great events which will hereafter occur, it will not be perhaps unacceptable to the reader to ſee here the ſubſtance of the arguments alledged on both ſides.

Allegations in Henry's behalf.

For the King it was ſaid, I. That the Levitical law, forbiding a man to marry his brother's wife, was not a poſitive precept which bound only thoſe to whom it was given, but obliged all mankind without exception: that this evidently appeared, in its being found among many others which prohibited the crimes wherewith the Canaanites were polluted. Now the Canaanites could not be polluted with crimes forbiden only by a poſitive law given to another nation.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1530.

II. Another argument was taken from what John the Baptiſt ſaid to Herod in the New Teſtament, "It is not lawful for thee to take thy brother's "wife," becauſe St. John could allude only to the laws of Moſes, and conſequently owned them to be divine.

III. It was ſhewn from ſeveral paſſages of Tertullian, and writings of the Popes, that the church always deemed the Levitical laws as parts of the univerſal law of nature and all mankind. To this was added the authority of diverſe provincial ſynods, of the Conſtantinopolitan general council, of the council of Conſtance in the condemnation of Wickliff, of many Greek and Latin fathers, and of ſeveral ſchoolmen.

IV. It was, by the authority of Popes and councils, proved, that a marriage is completed by the mutual contract of the parties, tho' it be never conſummated. For that reaſon it was ſaid, Adonijah could not marry Abiſhag, who had been his father David's wife, tho' David never knew her. That, on the ſame account, Joſeph could not put away Mary, without a bill of divorce; a clear evidence that their marriage was complete, tho' not conſummated. Hence it was infered, that even tho' Prince Arthur had not conſummated his marriage, it was not the leſs valid, it being maintained, that it was as certain as a thing of that nature could be, that the marriage was conſummated. It was proved; firſt, by violent preſumptions: ſecondly, becauſe after Arthur's death the Princeſs his widow was ſuppoſed pregnant, and ſhe never ſaid any thing to the contrary. Indeed, it might be objected that Catherine had ſince ſworn ſhe was never known by that Prince: but it was replied, the canon law forbids taking oaths when there are ſtrong preſumptions to the contrary; beſide, the Queen's oath could not be reckoned deciſive, ſince it was deſtroyed by the brief produced by her own advocates.

V. Julius's diſpenſation being the ſole foundation whereon the validity of Henry's marriage was eſtabliſhed, it was ſhewn by a croud of witneſſes, both ancient and modern, that the Pope has not power to diſpenſe with the laws of God: nay, it was affirmed that, if he diſpenſed with the decrees of the church, it was uſurpation, and that ſeveral biſhops in England itſelf had reſiſted the Popes when they would have aſſumed ſuch liberty.

On the other ſide, the Queen's advocates replied to theſe reaſons:

Arguments for the Queen;

I. That the prohibitions in Leviticus were not parts of the moral law, ſince God himſelf had diſpenſed with them, in commanding the brother to marry his brother's widow: but of what nature ſoever the law was, if it were diſpenſed with by Moſes to the Jews, why might it not be as well done by Popes to the Chriſtians?

II. It was ſaid, the law in Leviticus againſt marrying the brother's wife, muſt be underſtood of not taking her while the brother lived; for after his death a man, by another law, was injoined by God himſelf to take his brother's relict.

III. The crime, wherewith St. John Baptiſt re-

(1) Lord Herbert ſays, it was done by the parliament: but that is a miſtake; the letter being dated the 13th of July, it appears by the records there could be no ſeſſion at that time, the houſes being prorogued from the 21ſt of June to the 1ſt of October. The letter it ſeems was ſent about to the chief members for their hands; and Cavendiſh tells us with what chearfulneſs Wolſey ſigned it. It was ſubſcribed by the two archbiſhops, four biſhops, two dukes, two marquiſes, thirteen earls, two viſcounts, twenty-three barons, twenty-two abbots, eleven commoners, moſt of them the King's ſervants. proached Herod, might be adultery as well as inceſt, ſince, according to Joſephus and Euſebius, Herod's brother Philip was living when St. John ſpake.

IV. The Popes, contrary to God's laws, daily diſpenſed with vows and oaths, without being cenſured: beſide, it was maintained, the Pope was the only judge, whether the prohibition was moral or not.

V. It was alledged, the Pope had very weighty reaſons for granting the diſpenſation, particularly to preſerve amity between the two crowns of Spain and England.

VI. It was urged, that the marriage had ſubſiſted near twenty years, and never been by any deemed invalid.

VII. It was finally aſſerted, that if there were any nullities in the bull of diſpenſation, the Pope was therein the ſole competent judge.

The King's advocates replied to theſe allegations, and were again anſwered by the writers on the Queen's ſide, both practiſing what is very common on ſuch occaſions: that is, they evaded the force of the oppoſite party's arguments by keeping to generals. I ſhall not dwell any longer on the matter: ſuch as have the curioſity to peruſe the reaſons urged on both ſides, may be ſatisfied in Burnet's hiſtory of the reformation, where they are ſet forth at large. It will ſuffice to remark, that the whole year 1530 paſſed in ſuch diſcuſſions, King Henry being very well pleaſed his ſubjects ſhould be thoroughly informed of the affair before it was brought to the parliament.

Cardinal Wolſey's uncertain ſtate.

During theſe tranſactions, cardinal Wolſey remained, at his country ſeat, between hope and fear, without being able to form any certain judgment of the King's deportment towards him. Tho' all his goods were ſeized, and that ſeemed to denote he intended to ſhew him no favor, yet he, from time to time, beheld ſhining on him ſome rays of benevolence, which made him hope that his maſter, who had loved him ſo well, would not be for ever inexorable. In effect, the twelfth of February, the King granted him a general pardon of all his offenſes, of what nature ſoever. Among the multitude of pardons in Rymer, none are ſo full and particular as this. Then the King made with Wolſey a ſort of agreement, by which he left him the archbiſhoprick of York (1), with all its revenues and dependencies: as to the See of Wincheſter and abbey of St. Albans, Henry reſerved to himſelf their revenues, tho' he left him the titles; but the cardinal was bound to reſign both when required, in conſideration whereof the King aſſigned him yearly a thouſand marks ſterling (2), from the See of Wincheſter, with a promiſe to grant him the like penſion on ſome other benefice, in caſe he was deprived of this. Moreover, he returned him out of his own confiſcations (3) to the value of ſix thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four pounds: all the reſt remained to the King, with Wolſey's conſent, who acknowledged it as a particular favor that his Majeſty vouchſafed to leave him any thing. This was all he preſerved of the immenſe riches acquired during his credit: but what afflicted him moſt ſenſibly, was that his two colleges, founded with ſo much pains, and called by his own name to be a perpetual monument of his glory, were likewiſe confiſcated. He wrote on that topic to the King, and in terms which perfectly expreſſed his deep concern for that loſs: nay, he even intreated Cromwell to imploy his utmoſt indeavors towards preventing his two colleges from being involved in his ruin. But in vain: the King took poſſeſſion of all the lands thereto belonging, and indowed them anew, in his own name inſtead of that of their founder.

Nothwithſtanding all this, Wolſey had ſtill hopes, by reaſon of ſome marks of friendſhip given him by the King on certain occaſions. He had permited his removal to Richmond, where he was nearer his perſon: moreover, hearing he was indiſpoſed, he ſent a nobleman to viſit him in his name, and even cauſed Ann Boleyn to write to him (4): but at the ſame time the compaſſion which Henry expreſſed for him cheriſhed his hopes, it made his enemies apprehenſive of his return to court, and therefore they never ceaſed to exaſperate the King againſt him. In a word, as they could not ſee him ſo near the court without apprehending a revival of the King's affection for a miniſter he had ſo paſſionately loved, they cauſed orders to be ſent him to withdraw to his dioceſe of York. In all probability, Ann Boleyn, contributed moſt to his diſgrace, ſince none but a miſtreſs could have made the King forget ſuch a favorite. However this be, the cardinal being forced to ſubmit, began his journey (5) to the north with a train, tho' not ſo numerous as uſual during his proſperity, conſiſting ſtill of a hundred and ſixty followers (6). He arrived about the end of September at Cawood (7), where he made a ſtop, according to the cuſtom of the archbiſhops of York, 'till things were ready for the ceremony of his inſtallment, which was to be performed in a month, with a magnificence little ſuiting his preſent condition. But while he was preparing to injoy in his archbiſhoprick the ſmall remains of authority which he imagined would be ſtill left him, he was, by the earl of Northumberland, arreſted for high treaſon. He would at firſt have inſiſted on his privilege as cardinal: but the earl told him, that ſhould not hinder him from executing the King's orders. At the ſame time his phyſician was ſeized, and ſent to London with his legs tied to his horſe. It is not known to this day, whether Henry had been prepoſſeſſed that the cardinal had a deſign upon his life, which however is not very probable (8). However this may have been, he ſet out by eaſy journies, for London, extremely mortified at the thoughts of his going to appear as a criminal in a city where he had before commanded with almoſt ſovereign authority: but, very probably, his affliction turned to his advantage, as it threw him into a fit of illneſs which conſtrained him to ſtop at Leiceſter abbey, where he ended his days the thirtieth of November (1). Before he expired, he ſaid to the King's officer who ſtood near his bed: "If I had ſerved God as dili- "gently as I have done the King, he would not "have given me over in my grey hairs." But I know not whether he had reaſon to boaſt of his zeal and diſintereſtedneſs in the ſervices he had done King Henry. He added, ſpeaking to the ſame officer, that if, as he thought him worthy, he ſhould ever be admited to the King's council, he ſhould take care what he put in his head; for he would never be able to put it out again. This ſeems to intimate, he had counſeled the King to undertake the divorce, from which afterwards he would have diſſuaded him: and indeed, he deſired the ſame perſon to tell the King, that he prayed him to call to remembrance what had paſſed between them about the divorce, and hoped that, when he ſhould be leſs prejudiced, he would do him more juſtice. This ſhews that he looked on that affair as the ſole cauſe of his diſgrace. Thus died this famous cardinal, the proudeſt and moſt haughty of men; and we may add, the moſt ambitious and moſt greedy of eſtates and honors. It is affirmed that, while he governed the King, he never gave him advice without a view of his own intereſt. This alone would be ſufficient to obſcure all the fine qualities he might otherwiſe have, but which, in the main, amounted only to a great penetration, whereof he made very bad uſe. The King ſhewed a concern for his death (2): and yet, ſince he had ordered him to be arreſted for high-treaſon, very probably, his ruin was determined. Henry was of a diſpoſition to accompliſh whatever he undertook (3): this will plainly appear hereafter, in his extraordinary ſeverity to perſons who, certainly, were much leſs criminal than this favorite.

The King expreſſes concern for his death. Herbert.

As the divorce buſineſs (4), and its conſequences, imployed Henry during the reſidue of his life, it will, to the concluſion of this reign, be the main topic of my diſcourſe: but as, by the alterations this Prince introduced into his realm, his affairs led him to concern himſelf with the troubles of Germany, it is, for better comprehending the ſequel, requiſite we juſt touch on the tranſactions of thoſe quarters.

Affairs of Germany as to religion. Sleidan.

The Emperor's aim in convoking the diet of Augſburg, was rather to inflame than appeaſe the commotions concerning religion. Since he made peace with France, and Italy was as it were ſubject to his yoke, he was forming vaſt projects. He beheld himſelf maſter of Spain, Italy, and the Netherlands; his brother Ferdinand was actually King of Bohemia, and had newly been elected King of Hungary. With theſe advantages, he hoped to be able to ſubdue the reſt of Europe. It was neceſſary to begin with Germany, where he had great power, as Emperor and archduke of Auſtria, becauſe if he once became abſolute in the Empire, and could diſpoſe of the forces of the German Princes, he imagined France and England would not be able to reſiſt him. The troubles cauſed by religion in Germany, ſeemed to him a very ſpecious pretenſe to arm againſt the Proteſtants, judging that, after ruining them by the help of the Catholics, theſe laſt would, in their turn, be eaſily ſubdued. I cannot be accuſed here of aſcribing to this Monarch deſigns he never really had, ſince it is notorious that himſelf and ſucceſſors purſued gradually, and I may ſay openly, the execution of that very project. The wars which, for upwards of a century, afflicted Europe, were ſolely excited by the boundleſs ambition of thoſe of the Auſtrian family, whom the other Potentates were concerned to oppoſe.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1530.

Since Luther's preaching in Germany, the reformation had made ſuch progreſs, that ſeveral Princes of the Empire, and many Hanſe Towns, had openly imbraced it. As they were accuſed of introducing abundance of innovations in religion, in anſwer to that charge, they proteſted, their intent was no other than adherence to Evangelic doctrines and the primitive church's tenets; and therefore, they demanded that a free council might be held in ſome city of Germany, where the religious differences might be calmly examined by God's word; but this was a method which could not be allowed by their adverſaries. They ſuppoſed, as a thing certain, that the religion profeſſed before Luther's appearance was the true religion, and, being without the leaſt ſpot or wrinkle, had no need of reformation. According to that principle, they thought the point was not to examine it at all, but to compel the recuſants or heretics to conform. This was the conſtant maxim long ſince followed by the Romiſh clergy, and which induced them to uſe faggot and ſword to extirpate thoſe they were pleaſed to term heretics: but in the ſituation of Germany, at the time I am ſpeaking of, it was not eaſy to practiſe that maxim. It was not private perſons only who declared againſt the Roman church, but cities, whole nations, and Sovereigns: ſo the zealots for the ancient creed were not in condition to compel them by violence; and therefore choſe to feed them with expectation of the required free council, 'till the affairs of Europe were ſo diſpoſed that it might be hoped to reduce them by way of authority. On that ſubject ſeveral diets were held in Germany, whereat, contrary to the Roman court's deſire, the Emperor and Catholic Princes had been obliged to conceal their ſentiments, and conſent to a toleration, which however left them at liberty to

By the mediation of that earl, ſir William Kingſton conſtable of the tower (the perſon to whom he ſpake his laſt words) was ſent by the King to convey him to London. With much ado, being ſcarcely able to ſit his horſe, he got to Leiceſter abbey, where upon their coming out to receive him, he ſaid, Father abbot, I am come to lay my bones among you. He was buried in the abbey-chapel, of which even the ruins are not at preſent to be diſcovered. He died the 28th of November, according to Burnet; and according to Fiddes the 29th, of a dyſentry, p. 529. He had begun a monument for himſelf with his own image, which one Benedetto a ſtatuary of Florence took in hand 1524, and continued till 1529, receiving for ſo much as was already done four thouſand two hundred and fifty ducats. The deſign thereof was ſo glorious, that it exceeded far that of Henry VII. But upon his death the King ſeized what was finiſhed and called it his. Thus the cardinal's tomb had the ſame fate with his college. He is ſaid to behave mighty well during the time he was in the north, after his diſgrace, and to become very popular. As no man, ſays Polydore, did ever riſe with fewer virtues, ſo, ſays lord Herbert, few who ever fell from ſo high a place had leſſer crimes objected againſt him. He is ſaid, according to one of the articles of his impeachment, to leave two natural ſons behind him, whereof one named Winter, was loaded with church preferments. act another time according to their real principles.

At Luther's firſt appearance, the religious diſputes turned only on the exceſſive abuſes of the Papal power, and a few other points: then the doctor had on his ſide almoſt all the lay-Princes of Germany, and many Hanſe towns, each of which was a republic. From that time, he made new diſcoveries, and publiſhed them to the world; but he had not on all the articles the ſame number of followers, as on that of the Pontifical authority; beſide, the Emperor and zealous Catholics did, with all their might, oppoſe the reformation. Care was taken to intimidate ſuch as inclined that way, or to continue them in the old religion by promiſes, poſts, and other advantages, which not a little contributed to confirm them in their firſt ſentiments: ſo, for ſome years, the reformers uſed all poſſible indeavors to gain proſelytes; and the Romiſh clergy were as diligent to hinder their progreſs. Mean time, while they ſtrove only in this manner, the reformation daily took root; which obliged the adverſaries to ſeek other means to prevent its growth, thoſe hitherto uſed not proving very effectual.

In 1524 Charles V, coming to the diet of Worms, ſent for Luther, and after a hearing, baniſhed him the Empire, with all his adherents, by a formal decree in the name of the diet; but ſome pretend, the diet was not concerned in the decree: however, the Emperor perſiſted to maintain it; but it ſeems the Germans conſidered it not as obligatory. Next year, the diet held at Nuremberg, produced againſt the court of Rome a hundred grievances, of which they demanded the redreſs by means of a free council.

Another diet, convened at the ſame place, paſſed a decree, whereby it was reſolved to demand a free council in Germany: but, on their diſſolution, the Catholics aſſembled by themſelves at Ratiſbon, and ordered the decree of Worms to be put in execution.

In another diet at Spires in 1526, Charles declared, that his meaning was not that any reſolution ſhould be taken concerning the affairs of religion, but only concerning the method of executing the decree of Worms, 'till there ſhould be a general council: but as this council was yet very remote, the diet decreed, that his Imperial Majeſty ſhould be requeſted to procure a general council in Germany within a year, and in the interim all perſons ſhould, in point of religion, ſo deport themſelves as to be able to render account of their conduct to God and Cæſar.

During theſe tranſactions, the war which the Turks had carried into Hungary, ſuſpended, for ſome time, the execution of Charles V's projects againſt thoſe who had imbraced the new religion, becauſe he wanted the aſſiſtance of all the German Princes, as well Proteſtants as Catholics: beſide, the war he then had with Francis ſuffered him not to think much on the affairs of Germany. But in 1529, being on the point of making peace with France, he thought he might talk in a higher ſtrain. He called a diet at Spires, where it was ordered, that ſuch as had thitherto obeyed the decree of Worms, ſhould continue to obſerve it, and the reſt who had not ſubmited, ſhould make no innovations in religion, nor hinder their ſubjects from going to maſs. Againſt this decree the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the Princes of Lunenburg, made a ſolemn proteſtation, whence all their party were ſtiled Proteſtants. Charles, then in Italy, gave a rough reception to the deputies who brought him this proteſtation, and thereby obliged the Proteſtants to unite for their common defenſe, that Monarch's words giving them to underſtand that he had no very good intentions towards them. In the diet which was to meet at Augſburg in April 1530, but did not however aſſemble 'till June, he was reſolved to lay the foundation of his projected war againſt the Proteſtants.

Henry VIII. An' 1530.

At opening the diet, the Emperor's chancellor made a long ſpeech, complaining, in his maſter's name, of thoſe who had hitherto attempted to alter the ancient faith, and cardinal Campejo exhorted the Germans to extirpate the errors which had been introduced into Germany. The Proteſtants then required liberty to make declaration of their creed in the diet: but this was refuſed them; and the Catholics would have them take as a favor the permiſſion granted to deliver their confeſſion of faith in writing. The landgrave of Heſſe, ſeeing ſo great partiality in the diet, withdrew without taking leave; whereupon the Emperor commanded the gates of Augſburg to be ſhut, ſhewing, he intended to uſe violence towards thoſe who remained in the city: but, on the elector of Saxony's remonſtrances, he ordered them to be opened. In ſhort, after many debates (1), he cauſed to be publiſhed in the diet's name, a decree intirely againſt the Proteſtants, and which, on the hopes he gave them of a general council, obliged them to deſtroy whatever had been thitherto done in matters of religion.

The diet ending in this manner, Charles injoined the archbiſhop of Mentz to aſſemble the electors, and proceed to chuſe a King of the Romans, intending to get his brother Ferdinand elected. The Proteſtants ſtrenuouſly oppoſed this meeting, affirming there was no occaſion to elect a King of the Romans, and demonſtrating the inconveniencies which would ariſe from his deſign to render the Imperial crown as it were hereditary in the Auſtrian family. At length finding that, notwithſtanding their remonſtrances, they would proceed to this election, the Proteſtants met at Smalcald the twenty-ſecond of December 1530, and concluded a defenſive league againſt all who ſhould attack them on account of religion: then they made a formal proteſtation againſt the intended election of a King of the Romans without their conſent. In this ſituation were the affairs of religion in Germany about the cloſe of 1530.

An' 1531. The Emperor diſobliges the Pope in the affair of Ferrara. Guicciard.

After Charles had quited Italy, the Pope's nuncio continually preſſed him to pronounce judgment on the duke of Ferrara's buſineſs. Clement could not imagine but the judgment would be in his favor, conſidering the Emperor's ingagements with him by the treaty of Barcelona: but whether Charles had more fully examined the matter, or for ſome other reaſon, he gave ſentence, that Modena and Reggio appertained rightfully to the duke of Ferrara; but, to ſatisfy his Holineſs, he ſhould pay one hundred thouſand ducats, for which Clement ſhould be obliged to give him the inveſtiture of Ferrara, as granted to his predeceſſors; and to commence puting this ſentence in execution, he delivered Modena to the duke. The Pope, extremely diſpleaſed with a judgment ſo different from what he expected, refuſed to ſubmit to it, and, in hopes of ſeizing Ferrara, would not receive the hundred thouſand ducats offered him by the duke.

Clement VII being thus inſenſed againſt the Emperor, had great inclination to be reconciled with the Kings of France and England, imagining he ſhould be received with open arms. Indeed, Francis had unwillingly agreed to the treaty of Cam-bray, and ſolely becauſe there was no other means to obtain the liberty of his ſons: but ſince he had recovered them, he had been meditating how to retrieve what he had loſt by that treaty. To this end, he privately labored to ſow jealouſies among the Princes, by making them apprehenſive of the Emperor's ambition, and promiſing them aſſiſtance. As ſoon as he was informed of the Pontif's diſcontent, he thought nothing ſhould be neglected to gain him to his intereſt at ſo favorable a juncture: wherefore he propoſed a marriage between Catherine di Medicis, daughter of the late duke Lorenzo, and the duke of Orleans his ſecond ſon; an honor to which the family of the Medici durſt never aſpire, had not Francis himſelf made the offer. On the other hand Henry, ſenſible that the union between Clement and Charles ſolely occaſioned what obſtacles occurred in the divorce affair, queſtioned not he ſhould eaſily effect his deſigns, could he but ſet them at variance: but two things prevented his applying himſelf to that means. The firſt was, he could not truſt Clement. The ſecond, that he began to find his ſubjects much more inclined to ſhake off the Papal yoke than he had imagined, and therefore did not think himſelf under any neceſſity of building much on his Sanctity. If he had at firſt humbly addreſſed the Pontif, it was partly becauſe he ſtood in awe of the peoples prepoſſeſſion in favor of Chriſt's vicar: but when he found this prejudice was not ſo ſtrong as he had believed, he never troubled himſelf about the Pope's oppoſition. His kingdom being ſafe from invaſions by land, he had nothing to fear from any Prince in Europe, provided his ſubjects were not terrified with the Vatican thunders: but the Engliſh were not in this reſpect the ſame as formerly. Wickliff had begun to inlighten them; the conduct of the late Pontifs had increaſed their light; and Luther's books and followers had quite opened their eyes. Since the ſpreading of the new doctrine in England, the Pontifical authority was ſo diſcredited, that the generality of the Engliſh wiſhed for a favorable opportunity to throw off a yoke under which they had ſo long groaned. This made the King reſolve to have his cauſe tried by the parliament and convocation.

He offers to marry his ſon the duke of Orleans with Catherine di Medicis.

Henry dares not truſt the Pope.

He deems himſelf no longer obliged to rely on him.

The parliament meeting the ſixth of January, the chancellor opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, declaring, that the King earneſtly wiſhed to annul his marriage, not from diſhoneſt motives, as ſome labored to make his people believe, but for the peace of his conſcience, and the welfare of his realm, being unwilling to leave the ſucceſſion of the crown in danger of being diſputed. Then he cauſed a great number of books and treatiſes, written on that ſubject, with abſtracts of ſeveral authors both ancient and modern, to be brought, with the determinations of the univerſities of France, Italy, and England, which were all left upon the table to be examined at leiſure. The King's deſign was alſo brought before the convocation, who declared, they were ſatisfied the King's marriage was contrary to the law of God. Henry required no more at this time: he had another important affair to debate with the clergy, which was to be decided before this was farther examined. In all appearance, the convocation being informed of Henry's intent, the more readily gave their opinion for him, as they perfectly knew how much they ſhould want his favor in the buſineſs in hand, which was of the utmoſt conſequence.

The clergy decide in the King's favor. Burnet.

Cardinal Wolſey had been accuſed by the attorney general, of exerciſing in England his legatine authority without the King's ſpecial licenſe, and of diſpoſing as legate of ſeveral benefices, contrary to the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire. Hence it naturally followed, that thoſe who had owned his authority, and appeared in his courts, were equally liable to be indicted. By this means, all the eccleſiaſtics were in a like caſe, ſince there was ſcarce one who had not occaſion to apply to him during the courſe of his legateſhip: ſo, after Henry had procured of the convocation a concurrence with his proceedings concerning the divorce, he ordered an indictment to be brought into the King's bench againſt all the clergy, for violating the national laws (1). He had in this a double view; the firſt to draw from the eccleſiaſtics a good ſum; the ſecond, to humble that powerful body, and ſo leſſen their great credit with the people, who before had always ſeen them ſupported by royal authority. He knew it was from the clergy he ſhould meet with the greateſt oppoſition in the divorce affair: for that reaſon, he was very glad to put it out of their power to hurt him, by keeping them as it were in dependence, and by ſowing a kind of diviſion between the clergy and people, by the ſatisfaction theſe laſt would probably expreſs at the diſgrace of the eccleſiaſtics, who had ever treated them with exceſſive haughtineſs. He thereby put the clergy under a neceſſity of recurring to the royal protection, and conſequently of ſhewing leſs zeal for the Roman court's intereſt. This ſucceeded according to his expectation. In vain did the clergy plead, that the King himſelf had connived at Wolſey's proceedings. What had not been ſerviceable to his eminence, was not capable of excuſing thoſe who had owned his authority: ſo the court proceeded to a ſentence, that all clerks were out of the King's protection, and liable to the pains in the ſtatute of Præmunire. The people were extremely pleaſed, and particularly the favorers of the new religion, to ſee the clergy thus humbled. On the other hand, the eccleſiaſtics comprehended that, as the laity ſtood affected, offering to reſiſt the King would be to no purpoſe. They could not look for any farther aſſiſtance from Rome: ſince the Pope had quarreled with King Henry, his Sanctity had loſt all credit in England; and as that Prince declared that he would no longer regard him, the thunders of the Vatican were there heard with contempt. The clergy, in this their bad ſituation, reſolved to purchaſe the King's favor at any rate, finding they could no longer depend on the people, who were extremely changed from what they were formerly: wherefore the convocation of Canterbury having debated on the affair, reſolved (2), to offer the King a hundred thouſand pounds for a pardon. Purſuant to this reſolution, ſome of their members were ordered to draw an act for that purpoſe. Very probably, thoſe charged with this commiſſion held good intelligence with the court, and willingly laid hold on this opportunity of inveſting Henry with a prerogative which had not ever been injoyed by any of his predeceſſors. Lord Herbert and doctor Burnet ſay, the convocation determined on preſenting a petition to the King, to intreat his acceptance of a hundred thouſand pounds: but as this inſtrument is extant in Rymer's collection of public acts, it may now be ſpoken of with greater exactneſs. It was not a petition but a public act of the clergy, in form of letters patent, whereby they gave that ſum to the King. It was ſaid in the inſtrument, that it was, firſt, in conſideration of his great merit: ſecondly, in teſtimony of the clergy's gratitude for the great benefits he had procured the Catholic church as well by his pen as his ſword: thirdly, for his zeal againſt the Lutherans, who were laboring to deſtroy the church of England, "of which the clergy acknowledged the King ſole "Protector, and ſupreme Head:" laſtly, in hopes he would be pleaſed to grant the clergy, and all their members, a pardon for whatever offenſes they might have commited againſt the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire.

Oppoſition to that title. Burnet. Herbert.

When this inſtrument was read in the convocation, many diſliked that the clergy ſhould be made to ſay, that they acknowledged the King for "Protector and ſupreme Head of the Church of Eng-"land." Some imagined, it was inſerted thro' inadvertency and exceſſive flattery, whereof thoſe who drew up this inſtrument had not conſidered the conſequence. Others ſaid, it was intended to ſurpriſe the convocation, by inſerting theſe words in the body of an inſtrument which was only to grant the King a ſum of money. They added, that thoſe very words, which ſeemed to be put in without deſign and by mere accident, were yet very conſequential; and, as the convocation had not taken any reſolution on that point, they were for having them eraſed. But on the other hand, thoſe who were in the ſecret, pretended the words could not be put out by a formal reſolve, without diſpleaſing the King, and giving him occaſion to refuſe the offered compenſation. This cauſed ſuch debates, that they were obliged to poſtpone the deciſion of this matter to the next day. It was not without reaſon that ſeveral dreaded the conſequence which might very naturally be drawn from theſe words, ſince it was evident, the clergy were thereby ingaged to acknowledge the Pope no longer head of the church of England, which could not have two ſupreme heads at once. This was in effect the King's intention, as well as theirs who had penned the inſtrument, as evidently appeared on the morrow. Thomas Cromwell, with others of the King's council, repairing to the convocation, there gave very intelligible intimations; "That the point "in debate yeſterday was very agreeable to the "King, and he could not but conſider the oppo-"ſers as very diſaffected perſons." After ſuch a declaration, not one durſt directly oppoſe it, eſpecially as the archbiſhop and ſeveral other prelates openly maintained, that the King was actually and really ſupreme head of the church of England. So the act paſſed as it was drawn; only ſome moved to add this reſtriction, "as far as is conſiſtent "with the law of Chriſt." But it was not Henry's meaning to leave a door for thoſe to eſcape who ſhould hereafter diſpute his ſupremacy (1). The inſtrument being ſealed the twenty-ſecond of March, was preſented to the King, who very graciouſly accepted both the clergy's preſent, and his new title, of which he afterwards made great uſe. The convocation of the province of York reſolved likewiſe to give the King eighteen thouſand eight hundred and forty pounds: but as they omited in the grant to acknowledge the King ſupreme head of the church of England, they were told, that their preſent would not be accepted, if they ſpoke not like the convocation of Canterbury; ſo the clergy of York province were forced to inſert the ſame acknowledgment in their inſtrument. In this manner King Henry procured, or rather extorted from the clergy, the title of "Supreme Head of the Church "of England." Certain it is that, tho' ſome freely gave it him, yet the major part were not of that opinion (2); which is evident from the methods uſed to obtain it. This acknowledgment was procured in the manner we have ſeen, by Warham archbiſhop of Canterbury, Thomas Cromwell, and ſome others, who were really of opinion that England might do extremely well without the Pope. Thoſe who flattered themſelves at firſt, that the words were inſerted without deſign in the inſtrument brought into the convocation of Canterbury, might have ſeen their error, had they given good attention to another article in the ſame inſtrument, and which was alſo inſerted in that of the province of York, namely, that the clergy did promiſe for the future neither to make nor execute any conſtitution without the King's licenſe: which was, in other words, acknowledging the King for ſupreme head of the church of England. We ſhall ſee hereafter what uſe Henry made of this new title.

Pardon granted to the clergy.

The King being ſatisfied with the clergy, granted them a pardon in ample form: but when the pardon was brought into the houſe of commons, they refuſed to paſs it, except the laity, who might have been guilty of the ſame offenſes, were alſo included (3). Henry offended at their oppoſition, ſent them word, he would be maſter of his own favors, and not ſuffer them to be forced from him. The King's reſolution terrified the commons, who to avoid his indignation, paſſed the pardon as it was, throwing themſelves on his mercy as to what concerned the laity: whereupon, pleaſed with their ſubmiſſion, he granted to his temporal ſubjects a pardon like that to his ſpiritual. It ſeems however, that the colleges and monaſteries were excepted, who not being included in the pardons, were forced to compound with the King, as may be ſeen in Rymer.

So far were the people from moving in this affair, as would infallibly have been the caſe had they been under the ſame prepoſſeſſion as were their anceſtors in the reigns of Henry II, and King John, that, on the contrary, ſatisfaction was viſibly painted on every countenance, being highly delighted to ſee the eccleſiaſtics humbled. Thus that body, ſo formidable heretofore, inſtead of daring to reſiſt the King, were conſtrained to fly to his protection, becauſe they ſaw plainly, the people ſhewed no concern at their diſgrace, and they had no remedy elſewhere (4).

Then, he ordered the univerſities deciſions to be printed, with the opinions of the learned concerning his marriage, that againſt the next ſeſſion every one might be informed of the ſtate of the caſe and of his motives to proſecute the divorce. Mean while, as in repudiating his Queen, his intent was to marry Ann Boleyn, he paſſionately wiſhed, Catherine would be perſuaded to conſent to the divorce, in order to avoid the inconveniencies which might ariſe from her obſtinacy. To that purpoſe, he ſent ſome biſhops and lay lords, earneſtly to preſs her, either to conſent to the divorce, or refer the deciſion of the affair to four prelates and four ſeculars: but as ſhe could not be prevailed on to deſiſt from her appeal to the Pope (1), he gave her to underſtand, that ſhe ſhould retire and take up her abode at ſome one of his manſions, which ſhe pleaſed to chuſe, naming diverſe; and, July fourteen, 1531, took his leave of her, intending never to ſee her more (2).

Three perſons burned for religion. Herbert. Fox.

What had lately paſſed in the parliament and convocation, incouraged the well-wiſhers to a reformation in the church, to which they already ſaw ſome preparatives. For this reaſon, religious diſputes became more frequent and public than formerly: but the King, perceiving what inferences would be drawn from his firſt proceedings, was pleaſed to ſhew that, in throwing off the Papal yoke, he deſigned not to ſtrike at the fundamental truths of religion. So, to diſabuſe thoſe who had any ſuch thought, he commanded the laws againſt heretics to be rigorouſly executed. This occaſioned the death of three Proteſtants, namely, Bilney, Bayfield, and Baynam, of whom the two firſt were burned this year, and the other in the inſuing April (3).

Affairs of Germany. Sleidan. Herbert.

While this paſſed in England, the affairs of Germany were more imbroiled. In the begining of the year, Ferdinand of Auſtria King of Bohemia and Hungary, was elected King of the Romans, notwithſtanding the proteſtation of the confederates of Smalcald, and a few days after crowned at Aix la Chapelle. This was in conſequence of a league concluded between the Catholic Princes of Germany in the foregoing November: but this league was offenſive, whereas that of Smalcald was only defenſive. Never had the Proteſtants any deſign to force the conſciences of ſuch as differed from them in opinion: but the intent of the Catholic league was to compel the Proteſtants to return to the church they had forſaken. Theſe laſt proteſted againſt Ferdinand's election as unneceſſary, and contrary to the uſual form: but their proteſtation had no effect.

The remnant of this year was imployed in ſundry negociations, wherein Charles ſeemed to have no other aim than to adjuſt the religious differences, tho' in effect his deſign was only to amuſe the Proteſtants, and hinder them from taking meaſures for their defenſe, when they ſhould be attacked. As they were not ignorant of his artifices, they wrote on that ſubject to the Kings of France and England, who returned them favorable anſwers, with a promiſe of aſſiſtance in caſe any attempts were made to oppreſs them: not that theſe two monarchs deſired to countenance the reformation, but it was their intereſt to protect the German Proteſtants, becauſe their deſtruction could not but exceedingly increaſe the Emperor's power. Indeed, this was one of the chief means whereby that Prince intended to execute his vaſt deſigns.

AN' 1532. Francis indeavors to excite commotions to perplex Charles. Guicciard. Mezerai.

While the Emperor was forming projects to become maſter of Germany, under color of ſupporting the intereſts of religion and the Empire, Francis left no ſtone unturned, in order to create him troubles capable of producing ſome change which he might improve. His vexation at having been conſtrained to ſign the Cambray treaty, ſet him moſt earneſtly on ſeeking means to repair his loſſes, and eſpecially to recover Genoua and Milan. To this end, he careſſed or menaced his Holineſs according as he ſaw it proper to uſe one or other of theſe methods, and put the Proteſtants of Germany in hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance, in caſe they were attacked by the Emperor (4). But chiefly he labored to ſecure the King of England, becauſe he could be moſt ſerviceable to him. He confirmed him, as much as poſſible, in his reſolution to puſh the divorce buſineſs, in order to keep him always at variance with the Emperor and Pontif. Sometimes he intimated to him, that if the juſtice due to him was obſtinately refuſed, he would join in a league with him, to withdraw their dominions from the tyrannical domination of the Roman court. Then, fearing he would agree with Charles, he adviſed him ſpeedily to marry Ann Boleyn; well knowing it would be a certain means to widen their breach: nay, he ſent a letter to Clement, wherein he appeared no leſs concerned than Henry himſelf in the affair of the divorce. Among other things he told him, that if, thro' complaiſance or fear, he continued to be governed by the Emperor, he muſt not think it ſtrange, that the King of England ſhould indeavor to procure by extraordinary means the juſt ſatisfaction he had ſo long expected in vain; adding, that his intereſts were ſo ſtrictly united with Henry's, that he was indiſpenſibly obliged to aſſiſt, with his utmoſt power, a Prince of whom he gloried to be the perpetual ally. Finally, he prayed him to conſider, whether it was prudent to give thoſe who could not be compeled to obey, the opportunity and will to withdraw their obedience. But Clement, ſeeing only the Emperor's forces in Italy, took care not to follow ſuch dangerous counſels.

Francis and Henry try to frighten the Emperor and Pope; Burnet.

The two Kings at length finding it was impoſſible to gain the Pope, reſolved on an interview, to contrive means to break Charles's meaſures: but they thought proper firſt to ſpread a report, they deſigned to make a new league, in order to intimidate Clement, and hinder him from again cloſing with the Emperor, from whom he was ſomewhat alienated by the buſineſs of Ferrara. Accordingly, they concluded a league at London, ſigned the twenty-third of June: but it is manifeſt this treaty was made only with the above-hinted view, ſince it contained only two articles which could have reaſonably alarmed the Pope or the Emperor, had they been known to them. The firſt was, that in caſe Charles ſeized the Engliſh merchants effects in the Netherlands, the King of France would do the like with reſpect to the Emperor's ſubjects, the Germans and in order thereto conclude two treaties.

excepted: nay, this article was guarded by ſo many reſtrictions on Francis's part, that it plainly appeared to be merely a pretext to make a treaty. By the ſecond, if King Henry was attacked by the Emperor, Francis was to aid him with five hundred lances, and if the King of France was invaded, Henry was to aſſiſt him with a body of foot, not exceeding five thouſand (1). As the public was not acquainted with the particulars of this treaty, ſeveral reports were ſpread. Some ſaid, the two Kings had agreed to join in the league of Smalcald, or at leaſt to ſend a powerful aid to the German Proteſtants. Others fancied that, as the Turks threatened Auſtria, and the Emperor would be unavoidably obliged to lead his forces into that country, Francis would invade at the ſame time the duchy of Milan, and Henry carry war into the Netherlands. Theſe reports, tho' uncertain, made the Emperor very uneaſy, becauſe they were grounded on conjectures not improbable.

Various reports concerning the treaty.

The interview of the two Kings, between Calais and Boulogne, was not 'till October. They had in view chiefly two particulars. The firſt, to divert the blame thrown on them by the Emperor, in ſpreading over all Europe, that while Chriſtendom was going to be invaded by the Infidels, they remained idle ſpectators of the danger, without offering the leaſt aſſiſtance to thoſe who were preparing for her defenſe. Their other view was, to keep the Italians and Germans in expectation of a freſh war, leſt they ſhould become too compliant to the Emperor's will. To effect their deſign, they mutually gave each other letters patent, whereby they ingaged jointly to raiſe an army eighty thouſand ſtrong, to ſtop the progreſs of the Turks, and to lead the ſame either into Germany or Italy, as there ſhould be occaſion: but this pretended agreement was never put into the form of a treaty. Du Tillet ſpeaks of it in his inventory of the treaties between France and England, by the name of Letters of Agreement*: but there is not any ſuch matter in Rymer: wherefore it is not probable, theſe two Monarchs deſired to execute this pretended project, the ſole aim whereof was to juſtify them to the world, and inſpire the Emperor and Pope with terror: doubtleſs that was the reaſon of their affecting to make it public.

Henry's interview with Francis. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh: Herbert.

* Lettres d'Accord.

During the interview, Henry complained much of the Pope, and Francis even improved upon him, in a long enumeration of the complaints he had received from the Gallican church, on account of the Roman court's exactions: but this was only to amuſe Henry, ſince he was at that very time in ſecret negociation with the Pope, concerning the duke of Orleans his ſecond ſon's marriage with Catherine di Medicis. It manifeſtly appears by that Prince's whole conduct, that his ſole aim was to make the King of England's friendſhip ſubſervient to gain Clement, in order to recover Genoua and Milan, which he had always in view: wherefore he outwardly expreſſed a ſtrong attachment to Henry's Intereſt. He even preſſed him not to ſtay for the Pope's diſpenſation to marry his miſtreſs, who was preſent at the interview, having been lately created marchioneſs of Pembroke (2). While the two Kings were together, they feaſted each other ſeveral times, a minute account whereof is needleſs in this place. Henry came to ſee Francis at Boulogne, and Francis returned his viſit at Calais (3). They parted the thirtieth of October to return, the one to Paris, the other to London: but, by reaſon of the bad weather, Henry continued ſome days at Calais, where it is ſaid he privately married Ann Boleyn (4). It is more probable however, as ſome affirm, that it was not 'till the January following (5).

Henry marries Ann Boleyn. Burnet. Vol. III. p. 70. Hall.

During this whole year, the Emperor was greatly imbaraſſed. Sulyman Emperor of the Turks threatened to invade Hungary with a powerful army; nor was he worſe than his word. Germany was in trouble, becauſe the Proteſtants, who had been already menaced, were taking effectual meaſures for their defenſe, and refuſed to acknowledge Ferdinand of Auſtria for King of the Romans. On the other hand, Charles was not ignorant of his Sanctity's diſcontent on account of the duke of Ferrara's affair, and that the Kings of France and England were uſing their utmoſt indeavors to draw him off from his party, in order to diſturb Italy. Moreover, the Italians were quiet only becauſe a conſiderable body of Imperialiſts was ſtill in Italy, and no preparation in France to ſupport them, in caſe they were for making attempts. Mean while, in the midſt of this ſeeming tranquillity, they eagerly wiſhed to ſee ſome revolution to free them from their apprehenſions of Charles's too exorbitant power. Finally, the late interview between Francis and Henry extremely troubled the Emperor, apprehenſive as he was that, if Sulyman proſpered in Hungary, they would imbrace that opportunity to invade Milan and the Netherlands. It was neceſſary therefore to think, without loſs of time, of preventing the dangers which might proceed from all thoſe quarters, and to begin with the moſt urgent affair, viz. ſatisfying the Proteſtants, in order to have their aſſiſtance againſt the Ottomans. To that purpoſe, early this year he came to the diet at Ratiſbon, where he found means to negociate with the Proteſtants a ſort of accommodation, whereby no perſon was to be diſturbed on account of religion, 'till a council was called; nor that he deſigned any punctual performance of this agreement, extorted from him by neceſſity. He however received this benefit by it, that all the Princes and ſtates of Germany, as well Proteſtants as Papiſts, furniſhed him with a powerful aid, which inabled him to aſſemble an army of eighty thouſand foot, and thirty thouſand horſe.

The lodging which Francis was brought to, was moſt richly furniſhed with cloth of gold and tiſſue, imbroidered in ſome places with pearls and precious ſtones. There ſeveral ſervices were brought in a hundred and ſeventy diſhes, all of maſſy gold. The marchioneſs of Pembroke made them a curious and rich maſk, in which both Kings danced. advantage: but Sulyman haſtening his campain in Hungary, hindered him from thinking of means to prevent the miſchief he feared from the two confederate Kings. In effect, the Turks not only advanced into Hungary, but even into Auſtria, with deſign to give him battle: but he wiſely avoided it, ſince in loſing it he would have been without refuge, and Auſtria, with part of Germany, would inevitably have fallen under the Ottoman dominion; whereas by ſtanding, as he did, on the defenſive, with an army more than one hundred thouſand ſtrong, he prevented them from making any conſiderable progreſs, and obliged them to retreat into their own territory. When he had certain advice that Sulyman was on his march to Conſtantinople, he departed for Italy, whence he deſigned to return into Spain.

He confers with the Pope at Bologna. Guicciard.

About the middle of November he came to Bologna, where his Sanctity waited to confer with him. As their deſigns were very oppoſite, there was not that harmony between them as at their interview in the year 1529. Charles thought only of ſecuring Italy, and preventing the King of France's return. Clement, on the contrary, wiſhed to keep him always uneaſy on that account, as well to render himſelf neceſſary, as to be freed from a ſtate of dependance. The Emperor required his Holineſs to convene a council in Germany, otherwiſe he ſaw no poſſibility of finding a legal pretenſe to ruin the Proteſtants: but after what had paſſed at Conſtance and Baſil, the very name of a council was become ſo odious to the court of Rome, that Clement could not reſolve to call one. He recollected what had occurred to John XXII and Eugenius IV, and therefore had not the leaſt inclination to have his authority called in queſtion. The Emperor moreover demanded his Sanctity's conſent to a league he intended to form between all the ſtates of Italy, to which each ſhould contribute in proportion to their forces, in order to ſecure the country from all invaſion: that is to ſay, he would have in Italy an army maintained at the expenſe of others, and always ready to defend the Milaneſe, in caſe the French ſhould think of invading that duchy. Clement approved of this project, not with deſign to keep Italy in its preſent ſituation, ſince it was greatly to his detriment that the Emperor ſhould remain ſo powerful there, but to have a pretext to be rid of the German and Spaniſh troops, who were a terror to the Italians. He foreſaw that a league of ſo many parties, whoſe intereſts were different, could not long ſubſiſt, and that, after it was broken, he ſhould himſelf become more neceſſary and conſiderable: he deſired only that the Venetians ſhould come into the league, and bear their part of the charge. Finally, Charles farther required of the Pope, that he ſhould give his niece Catherine di Medicis to the duke of Milan; his aim being to ingage him, for his niece's ſake, in the defenſe of the Milaneſe, for fear, in the end, the King of France ſhould find a favorable opportunity to gain him to his intereſt. But againſt this propoſal Clement alledged, his ingagement with King Francis, who had done him the honor to demand Catherine for the duke his ſecond ſon. He repreſented to the Emperor, that he could not prefer the duke of Milan to the duke of Orleans, without making the King of France his irreconcileable enemy. So their whole negociation ended only in the projected league, in which the Venetians refuſed to be included; contenting themſelves with promiſing Charles a punctual performance of their ingagement with reſpect to the duchy of Milan. In fine, the Emperor having cauſed embaſſadors to come from Milan, Ferrara, and Mantoua, ſome time was imployed in indeavoring to ſettle the terms of the league: but the diſpute between Clement and the duke of Ferrara very much retarded the concluſion, because the duke would not accede to the league before he was ſecure of peace at home: however, after great pains, the Emperor prevailed on his Sanctity to allow the duke a year and half reſpite. This affair retarded ſigning the league 'till February in the year following.

Henry VIII. An' 1531.

Henry's late deportment towards the clergy, and his diſpoſition with regard to the Pope greatly incouraged thoſe who longed to ſee a reformation in the church. To conceive a right notion how the Engliſh ſtood affected in this reſpect, it is neceſſary to know the peoples ſentiments concerning religion. It may be undeniably affirmed, that as to the reformation of the Pope's exorbitant power, and the clergy's immunities, there was ſcarce one Engliſhman, if we except all or moſt of the eccleſiaſtics, who did not wiſh it moſt cordially. It was now three hundred years ſince parliaments firſt began to indeavor it, but without any effectual ſucceſs, becauſe it was contrary to the intereſt of the Kings: but as for a reformation of doctrine, thoſe who deſired it were very far from being a majority. Its well-wiſhers were not ſufficiently numerous to venture propoſing it openly, eſpecially as they were not countenanced by the King: but when the Pope's exceſſive authority, or the pride and riches of the clergy were exclaimed againſt, they boldly joined with the reſt of the people, without fear of being diſcovered, becauſe that was the general ſentiment, or at leaſt that of almoſt all the laity; yet really, in expreſſing their zeal againſt the clergy, their aim was to promote the reformation of doctrine, becauſe they knew the chief obſtacle would always proceed from the church's rulers. Here therefore they believed they ought to begin, in order to arrive at a thorough reformation: ſo, among thoſe who wiſhed to reduce within due bounds the Pontifical power, and the clergy's immunities, there were doubtleſs many who had no farther views, and imagined the reformation would there terminate. Others, on the contrary, hoped that, after making this advance, it would be impoſſible to ſtop, wherein they had for warrant what had happened in Germany: but they took care not to undeceive the reſt, for fear of cooling their zeal, by ſhewing them too ſoon the conſequences of this firſt ſtep taken towards a reformation.

How the Engliſh ſtood affected as to religion.

The commons are inclined to reduce the clergy's power Herbert. Hall.

The parliament meeting the fifteenth of January 1532, the commons were in a manner unanimouſly diſpoſed to redreſs the grievances ſo long in vain complained of, with reſpect to the Papal power, and the eccleſiaſtical privileges. No occaſion ſo very favorable had ever offered. When formerly the parliaments were inclined to make any attempt of this nature, the Kings were unwilling to concur with them, becauſe the ſtate of their affairs permited them not abſolutely to break with Rome: but the divorce buſineſs had ſet matters on another footing. Henry was diſſatisfied with his Holineſs, and conſidered the clergy, both ſecular and regular, as ſecret enemies, by reaſon of their attachment to the Roman court: ſo, his intereſt required, that the Pope and clergy ſhould be humbled, and diviſion ſown between them and the people; being ſenſible, that the former could hurt him only in proportion to their credit with the latter. As for what foreigners might do, he thought himſelf in no danger, ſo long as he maintained a ſtrict union with France, and the more, as Charles was then imployed by his war with the Turks, and the troubles of Germany.

All this being artfully inſinuated to the houſe of commons, they addreſſed the King, praying him to conſent to a reformation of ſundry grievances, occaſioned by the clergy's immunities. Henry replied, that before he gave his conſent to their requeſt, which ſeemed to him of great moment, he wiſhed to hear what the eccleſiaſtics had to ſay for themſelves; themſelves: but, under this ſhew of equity, his intent was to intimate to the clergy, how much they wanted his protection, ſince he could either promote or reſtrain the proceedings of the commons as he pleaſed. Some time after, the parliament paſſed certain acts, which only glanced at ſome of the clergy's privileges, againſt which the people had moſt reaſon to exclaim: but for that time the reformation was carried no farther: nay, care was taken to make the eccleſiaſtics amends, by paſſing an act to releaſe them from the payment of Annates (1), which was become a heavy burden. This act ran, that the kingdom was daily impoveriſhed by the great ſums paid to the See of Rome, for firſt-fruits, palls, bulls, &c.: that ſince Henry VII's time, * one hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds had been ſo imployed, and that more was ſoon like to be exported, by reaſon diverſe of the prelates were very aged: that beſide, the Annates were firſt introduced only as a contribution for the war againſt Infidels, to which however they were never applied; and therefore it was inacted, that all payments of Annates ſhould ceaſe for the future: that as for the bulls, there ſhould only be paid five pounds in the hundred, according to the clear annual value of the biſhoprics: that if, on account of this regulation, the Roman court ſhould refuſe granting bulls, the biſhop elect ſhould be preſented by the King to the archbiſhop of the province for his conſecration: that in caſe the archbiſhop ſhould deny doing it on pretenſe of wanting palls, bulls, and the like, any two biſhops appointed by the King ſhould perform this office, and the biſhop ſo conſecrated acknowledged for legal; nevertheleſs the parliament declared, that it ſhould be in the King's power to null or confirm the act within ſuch a time: and if in this interval he ſhould make any amicable compoſition with the court of Rome, it ſhould have the force and authority of a law: but, if, on this act, the Pontif ſhould pretend to vex the realm by excommunications or interdicts, ſuch cenſures ſhould neither be regarded nor publiſhed, and, all interdicts notwithſtanding, the prieſts might lawfully, without any ſcruples of conſcience, celebrate divine ſervice as before.

* Since his ſecond year.

Mean while, among the great number of repreſentatives in the houſe of commons, ſeveral of them were utterly averſe to a rupture with his Holineſs. They however foreſaw it would infallibly follow on the King's divorce; wherefore they uſed all poſſible indeavors to prevent it. One Temſe, a member of parliament, was ſo preſumptuous as to move, that the houſe ſhould go in a body and addreſs the King to take his Queen again. Henry hearing of this, ſent for the ſpeaker, and in his perſon ſeverely reprimanded the commons for ſuffering motions to be made concerning a matter which fell not under their cognizance (2).

Some days after Henry ſent again for the ſpeaker, and told him that, having compared the oath taken by the biſhops to the Pope with that they took to the King, it ſeemed to him they were but half ſubjects; and therefore he deſired the commons to examine this affair, and be mindful of the royal prerogative. But the peſtilence, which then raged at London, conſtrained the parliament to break up preſently after, and for that time prevented the commons from debating on this buſineſs.

He wills them to conſider the biſhops oaths. Burnet. Hall.

This power given Henry by his parliament to aboliſh the Annates, or make ſome amicable compoſition with his Sanctity, was a clear evidence that this act had been procured by intrigues of the court. Clement was thereat extremely offended: but when he complained to King Henry's agents, he was told, "That he might have ſaved himſelf that "vexation; and that there was ſtill a remedy, "ſince his Majeſty had power to repeal the act." This was a plain hint, for him to reſt aſſured that Henry would behave according as he had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his Beatitude's procedure.

Thomas More, who was lord chancellor, and a perſon of excellent judgment, already foreſaw that Henry's proceedings would in the end produce a total rupture with Rome. He would willingly have conſented that ſome abuſes ſhould be reformed: but he found, as matters were managed, the reformation would go much farther than he deſired. He made great difference between withdrawing intirely from the Pope's obedience, and retrenching ſome of his uſurpations: wherefore, being unwilling to be inſtrumental to ſuch rupture, he reſigned the great-ſeal on the ſixteenth of May. Some days after, the King made ſir Thomas Audley *, lord keeper of the great-ſeal, 'till the twenty-fifth of January 1533, when he was made lord-chancellor.

While Henry imployed various means to convince Pope Clement of the danger whereto he expoſed himſelf by his obſtinate refuſal of what he required, the Emperor was no leſs earneſtly indeavoring to obtain a ſentence in Queen Catherine's favor. The way theſe two Monarchs applied to his Sanctity, was not by reſpectful ſollicitations, but by menaces, which had the greater effect, as he was naturally timorous, and ſlow in determining on matters which required a ſpeedy reſolution. By theſe two ſo very oppoſite demands he in reality found himſelf between hammer and anvil, as he ſaid when the affair was firſt in agitation. On the other hand, by Henry's late proceedings, he evidently ſaw that England was in the direct road of being loſt to him and his ſucceſſors. This conſideration was very ſufficient to induce him to ſeek expedients to content that Monarch, without prejudice to the honor of the Holy See. He would thereby have preſerved a kingdom which had ever been devoted to the Popes, and from whence they had drawn large revenues: but, on the other hand, Charles had ſtill an army in Italy, and was able to revenge his refuſal. Clement, of all things, dreaded the loſs of Florence, which the Emperor could take from him with even more facility than he had procured him the poſſeſſion: it is therefore no wonder, if this apprehenſion, being the moſt imminent, prevailed: and as to the reſt, it would be ſtumbling into a notorious error were we to aſcribe to this Pope any motives of juſtice, equity, benefit of the church, or religion: all that, for ſome time, had ſerved only for preambles to bulls. His own and his family's intereſt was the ſole rule of his conduct: ſo, finding himſelf extraordinarily preſſed by the Emperor to paſs ſentence on Queen Catherine's appeal, he could no longer be excuſed from giving ſome ſatisfaction. He declared therefore to the Engliſh agents, that having long, tho' in vain, expected that their maſter would of himſelf return to the right way, he was obliged to cite him to Rome. Henry having thereof notice, ſent with all ſpeed Edward Karne, doctor of law, with the new character of Excuſator, to alledge the reaſons againſt a citation to which the King of England could not be liable.

He then was forty one years old, and at that age thoſe heats abate. liable. Karne arriving at Rome in March, Clement ſcrupled receiving him as excuſator, a character whereof there was no precedent to be found in the chancery: however, he commited the examination of this title to a congregation, which made no haſte to give their opinion, that the excuſator might not have power, before he was acknowledged, to oppoſe the reſolutions already taken.

A new delay granted the King. Burnet.

At length, in a conſiſtory the eighth of July, it was reſolved, that, without examining the King of England's reaſons for not appearing perſonally, he ſhould be intreated to ſend to Rome a proxy to defend his cauſe. Mean while, as the vacation, which was to laſt 'till the firſt of October, was then juſt commenced, a delay 'till that time was tacitly granted to King Henry. During this interval, his Holineſs ſent him a brief, requiring him to diſpatch away to Rome a proxy. At the ſame time he cauſed the following overtures to be made him:

"Firſt, that the affair of the divorce ſhould be "examined in any indifferent place, by a legate "and two auditors of the Rota; which done, the "Pope himſelf ſhould paſs ſentence. To theſe reaſons, he added, a proteſtation in form, declaring, that he was not obliged to appear at Rome, either in perſon or by proxy, and tacked to this proteſtation the determinations of ſome univerſities (1) he had conſulted: however, he propoſed to the Pope three things. Firſt, he required, that the cauſe ſhould be decided by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and two other biſhops, or elſe, by the whole clergy of the kingdom: but it muſt be obſerved, that the See of Canterbury had been vacant ſince Auguſt, by Warham's death, and if Clement had cloſed with this propoſal, Henry would not have failed to fill the See with a prelate devoted to him. His ſecond offer was, that the cauſe ſhould be judged by four arbitrators, one to be named by the King, another by the Queen, a third by the King of France, and that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be the fourth. Thirdly, he propoſed, that the cauſe, being judged by the archbiſhop, or by umpires, if the Queen ſhould think fit to appeal from the ſentence, her ſaid appeal ſhould be brought before three judges, whereof he would name one, the Pope another, and the King of France a third. To theſe propoſals Clement anſwered, That he perceived the King would not recede from his pretended rights, and therefore it muſt not be wondered at if he reſolved to preſerve his own.

He makes the Pope three offers, which are rejected.

All the obſtacles to the divorce come from the Emperor.

It is however certain, if the Pope durſt have ſatisfied Henry, he would gladly have done it, by reaſon of his apprehenſion of loſing England abſolutely. It was not the difficulties in the divorce buſineſs which obſtructed his proceeding. Had they been abundantly greater than they really were, he would have willingly overlooked them all: for, ſuppoſing the unlimited power aſſumed by the Popes, it was as eaſy for Clement VII to null Henry's marriage, as it was for Julius II to grant a diſpenſation; but he had to manage the honor of his See, and the intereſt of his Imperial Majeſty, who menaced him, and was able to execute his menaces. Had not Charles been concerned in the affair, his Holineſs had at hand a very eaſy expedient to ſatisfy Henry, without prejudice to the Pontifical authority. It depended only on his aſſuring this Prince, that the cauſe ſhould be decided in his favor, and he would willingly have agreed that his ſaid Sanctity ſhould have been the ſole judge: but Clement could not give him any ſuch aſſurance by reaſon of the Emperor's oppoſition; and therefore Henry could not reſolve to put the affair into his hands, at the hazard of being caſt. On this account it was that he propoſed infallible expedients to gain his cauſe: but on the other hand, the Pope could not accept of theſe expedients, without injuring his dignity; thus the affair was ſolely retarded by the Emperor's interpoſition. Had it not been for him, the Pope would have contented Henry, and that Monarch have ſubmited to his Holineſs, and remained, as before, a moſt obedient ſon of the Holy See. Hence therefore it may be infered, that King Henry's proceedings, as well in the late parliament as afterwards, flowed not ſo much from his real opinion that the Papal authority was uſurped, as from his ſeeing no other way to be delivered from his preſent difficulties, than by denying it to be in the power of any Pope to do what had been done by Pope Julius II. There is however much appearance that he was afterwards fully convinced of the truth of what he at firſt aſſerted thro' mere neceſſity. On the other hand, if the Pope paſſed ſentence againſt Henry, as we ſhall ſee preſently, it was not from a belief that his marriage with Catherine was legal, but ſolely to ſave the honor of the Holy See, and thro' fear of, and complaiſance for, the Emperor. And here who can forbear admiring the ſecret ways of Providence, which rendered utterly impoſſible a reconciliation between the Pope and King Henry, in order to produce what was to be attended with ſo momentous conſequences for England?

Henry is cited to Rome. Herbert. Burnet.

At length the vacation being over, Henry was cited the fourth of October to appear at Rome, either in perſon or by proxy, and Karne ſolemnly proteſted againſt the citation. What I have been reciting occurred before the Emperor's arrival at Bologna. Clement VII, who immediately after the citation prepared to go thither to confer with that Monarch, promiſed Karne, that all proceedings ſhould be ſuſpended ſo long as the Emperor was in Italy. This was the ſole favor Karne could obtain (2).

Affairs between England and Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert. Hall. Hollingſh.

While Henry ſeemed wholly imployed in the affair of the divorce, a quarrel aroſe between England and Scotland. Buchanan pretends that Henry, willing to take advantage of his union with France, and imagining that Francis would ſuffer him to oppreſs King James, made in-roads into Scotland (3), as if he intended to renew the war. He adds, that the only pretenſe of this rupture was, that the Scots had ſpoken ſome injurious words againſt the Engliſh. Howſoever this be, the Scotiſh King being prepared for his defenſe, Henry thought not fit to purſue his deſign: he choſe rather to agree, that the difference ſhould be decided by mediation of the King of France who, for that purpoſe, ſent an embaſſador to Newcaſtle. King James was ſo offended with Francis for eſpouſing his cauſe with ſuch luke-warmneſs, that he was on the point of leaguing with the Emperor: but matters were at length happily adjuſted, and the Kings of England and Scotland remained friends as before.

League concluded at Rome for the ſecurity of Italy. Guicciard.

It was not for Henry's intereſt to undertake a war againſt Scotland, when he was to prepare for his defenſe againſt the Emperor. Very ſeemingly, Pope Clement had not promiſed to judge Queen Catherine's appeal without being firſt aſſured that the Emperor, her nephew, would execute the ſentence. This was indeed that Monarch's real deſign; but the intervening diſturbances hindered his ingaging in that enterpriſe. He reckoned that the above-mentioned Italian league would be a ſure defenſe for the duchy of Milan: but he ſoon perceived himſelf made a mere tool by the politic Pontif. This league was at length ſigned at Bologna the twenty-fourth of February 1533, according to his deſires. Every Sovereign who had dominions in Italy, the Venetians excepted, ingaged to find a certain ſum monthly, to ſubſiſt the army which Antonio de Leva was to command as general of the league. Charles's intention was, that the ſaid army ſhould conſiſt of his own troops, and be conſtantly maintained: but the deſign of the confederates was very different. They had acceded to the league purely that Charles, having nothing to fear for Italy, might thence withdraw all his forces: but it was never their meaning, that thoſe maintained at their charge ſhould ſerve to keep them in ſubjection, which would neceſſarily be the caſe if the army on foot was continued under command of the Emperor's general. They therefore repreſented to him, that the league being only defenſive, it was not proper to continue an army without neceſſity, to ruin them in expenſes; but on the firſt motion of the French, they would not fail to perform their agreements. What arguments ſoever the Emperor alledged, it was not poſſible to bring them to what he deſired: he was therefore conſtrained to be ſatisfied with their promiſes, becauſe he was not in condition to maintain in Italy ſuch a body of forces at his own charge; wherefore he diſbanded part of his troops, and ſent the reſt to Naples and Spain. He departed from Bologna about the end of February, and came to Genoua, where he remained ſome time; after which, on the eighth of April, he imbarked for Spain, exceedingly diſguſted with his Holineſs, who with all his diſguiſes could not conceal his growing inclination to France: and, in effect, he was already agreed with the cardinals of Tournon and Grammont on an interview with Francis, and the marriage of Catherine di Medicis with the duke of Orleans.

Affairs of Germany. Sleidan. Herbert.

It was not on the affairs of Italy only that Charles was imployed. He had, as was obſerved, promiſed the Proteſtants a free council in Germany: but tho' the word Free was alike uſed by thoſe who demanded a council, and by him who promiſed it, the parties were far from having the ſame meaning. The Proteſtants, by that word, underſtood that a council ſhould be held in Germany where not only they might have free acceſs and full liberty to produce their reaſons, but alſo that the points in diſpute ſhould be decided ſolely by the word of God. On the contrary, Charles's deſign was, nominally to retain the word, and, by rendering his party ſuperior in council, to cauſe matters to be ſo decided that the Proteſtants ſhould be forced, either to revoke all their innovations, or reject the council's deciſions. In the latter caſe, which was moſt likely to happen, the Emperor plainly perceived, they would give him a pretenſe to attack them, which was the very thing he intended. But, in the execution of this deſign, one main obſtacle occurred: viz. a council, of what kind ſoever, was to his Holineſs a great terror. Tho' he was perfectly ſatisfied that Charles demanded not a council with intent to alter religion, yet he was afraid of being ſacrificed to the Proteſtants, if that Monarch's intereſt required it: beſide, the ſtrict alliance between Francis and Henry made him uneaſy. In ſhort, he could not reſolve to call a council, without being ſure of managing it as he would; and that could ſcarce be expected, as matters then ſtood in Chriſtendom. Since his being on the Pontifical throne, he had pleaſed neither the Emperor, the King of France, the King of England, nor the Potentates of Italy; nevertheleſs the council was chiefly to conſiſt of the ſubjects of all theſe Sovereigns. He was conſcious of his ſpurious birth, and that alone was ſufficient to depoſe him, in caſe his enemies were ſuperior in the council. What had paſſed at Conſtance and Baſil gave him juſt reaſon to dread that a council, held in a free city of Germany, might form the ſame deſigns. On all theſe conſiderations, when the Emperor deſired him, at the conference of Bologna, to call a council, he forbore to give a poſitive anſwer: he contented himſelf with commiting the examination of his requeſt to certain cardinals, under color of being informed of the reaſons pro and con. The Popes have a character to ſuſtain, which often throws them into great perplexity. In public, they muſt make ſhew of a great zeal for God's glory, for religion, and for the good of the church, and withal of a great diſintereſtedneſs for every thing which perſonally concerns them: but, for fear what they thus profeſs outwardly ſhould be taken literally, they muſt in private undeceive thoſe who treat with them, and diſcover to them that their own intereſt is the principal ſubject of the negociation; ſo, what they ſay publicly, is always juſt and right, and ſeems to tend only to the greater glory of God; but in the end it is too frequently perceived, that religion ſerves only for a cloak to their temporal concerns. On the preſent occaſion, a general council ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary to terminate the troubles raiſed thro' differences in points of religion in diverſe parts, and more particularly in Germany. The Pope not only agreed upon a council with the Emperor, but even feigned to wiſh it moſt cordially: nevertheleſs, as a council was contrary to his intereſts reaſons drawn from the good and advantage of religion were to be found, either wholly to reject it, or at leaſt defer the convening. This was put in practiſe by the commiſſioners, appointed to examine the Emperor's requeſt. They drew a memorial, wherein, after having ſet forth the great neceſſity of a council, they withal urged the inconveniences of admiting the Proteſtants to diſpute on matters already ſettled, and the uſeleſſneſs of the ſame council if they were not admited. This memorial being communicated to King Francis, he replied to it by another, demonſtrating, that the ſaid inconveniences ought not to obſtruct the calling a council. Moreover, he particularly pointed out the proper methods to baniſh all partiality. But this remonſtrance was not at all reliſhed by Charles, ſince it was not a free council he deſired, but a council which would afford him opportunity and pretenſe to attack the Proteſtants of Germany; after which, he deſpaired not of bringing alſo the Catholics under his yoke. Francis replied to the Emperor's

Emperor's objections againſt his remonſtrance; but ineffectually: it was in a manner utterly impoſſible that two Princes whoſe intereſts were ſo oppoſite, and who were ſo jealous of each other, ſhould ever agree in any one point. Parliament in England. Herbert. Burnet. Hall.

While Clement and Charles were confering at Bologna, the King of England aſſembled his parliament the fourth of February. As thitherto his Sanctity had not any way relaxed, except in delaying the excommunication wherewith he had menaced Henry, it was judged convenient not to proceed a ſtep farther, and ſhew him he was not in the leaſt dreaded. To begin, the parliament paſſed an act, expreſsly forbiding all appeals to Rome, on pain of incurring a Præmunire. This was to convince his Beatitude, that the Engliſh could do without him; ſince, at the very juncture the point in queſtion between him and the King was, to know whether his divorce affair ſhould be judged in England, that Prince's ſubjects were forbid to carry their cauſes to Rome. But there was another reaſon which induced King Henry to procure this act; namely, having intelligence King Francis was about allying himſelf with Clement, he imagined that for the future his ſaid friend would act but faintly in his behalf; and therefore he was now determined to have his cauſe tried at home, without giving himſelf any farther concern with regard to the Pope's proceedings againſt him. The archbiſhoprick of Canterbury being vacant by Warham's death, it was requiſite to fill that See, to have the ſentence given by the primate of England. To execute this function, Henry had caſt his eyes on doctor Thomas Cranmer, then in Germany (1): but, contrary to his expectation, he had found the doctor more averſe to accept, than others would have been eager to ſollicit for that high dignity. Six whole months paſſed before he could be prevailed on to load himſelf with that burden. His reluctance being finally conquered by Henry's perſeverance, he ſet out for London, tho' he journied very ſlowly, in hopes the King might alter his mind. However, as a farther delay was directly contrary to the meaſures King Henry had already reſolved to take, Cranmer could not any longer defer ſubmiting to his will. The King himſelf undertook to demand his bulls, which, tho' eleven in all, were rated at only nine hundred ducats. Pope Clement, of his own accord, forbore requiring the Annates, foreſeeing they would be refuſed. To inable Cranmer to be at this charge, Henry made him a preſent of the revenues of the archbiſhoprick, from the ninth of September laſt year. Theſe obſtacles being removed, there aroſe another much more conſiderable. Cranmer refuſed to take the uſual oath to the Pope, believing he could not do it with a ſafe conſcience. In his firſt voyage into Germany he had read Luther's books, which fully convinced him of the truth of many of the Proteſtant tenets, and particularly of the ſmall foundation, to be met with in Sacred Writ, for that ſpiritual power which the Pontifs aſſumed over the univerſal church: and conſequently, he could not reſolve to ſwear an obedience which, in his opinion, was not due to him. Mean while Henry, conſidering Cranmer as a perſon who, by his principles and reſolution, could effectually ſerve him in the deciſion of his divorce affair, whereof he would fain ſee the end, preſſed him ſo earneſtly to ſwear the cuſtomary oath, that, at length, by a certain expedient propoſed to him, he was perſuaded to do what the King deſired.

This affair being ended, King Henry required the convocation of the province of Canterbury to give their opinion on theſe two points. Firſt, whether Pope Julius's diſpenſation for the King's eſpouſing Catherine was ſufficient, and could render valid ſuch a marriage? Secondly, whether it was ſufficiently proved that Arthur had conſummated his nuptials with Catherine? Whereupon, the convocation declared, on the fifth of April, that the Pope had not power to diſpenſe contrary to the law of God, and that the conſummation of Arthur's marriage was proved, as far as a thing of that nature could be. The convocation of York made a like deciſion the thirteenth of May following.

While the eccleſiaſtics were buſied in debating theſe points, Henry wrote to Francis, deſiring him to ſend a truſty perſon to whom he might impart certain matters which he would not have known publicly. Hereupon Francis diſpatched over Guillaume du Bellay baron de Langeais, ordering him to acquaint King Henry, that he had concluded a match between his ſecond ſon the duke of Orleans, and Catherine di Medicis, and that the Pope and himſelf were to meet at Marſeilles, to celebrate the nuptials: that, in ſuch a juncture, he believed his preſenſe would be very neceſſary, perſonally to negociate his affairs with the Pontif; but in caſe he did not think proper to be at the interview, he would do well to ſend ſome perſon on his part. Langeais being come to London, the King told him, that Clement VII having obſtinately refuſed to appoint him judges in England, he had determined at length to proceed; and therefore had already eſpouſed Ann Boleyn, with a reſolution to have his former marriage nulled by the archbiſhop of Canterbury: that he would nevertheleſs keep his ſecond eſpouſals private 'till May, to ſee what the King of France could do with the biſhop of Rome; for ſo he ſtiled the Pope: but if he could not obtain any thing, his deſign was to withdraw himſelf abſolutely from the Papal authority. He then imagined, the Pope and Francis would meet in May, but it was not 'till October. He farther acquainted Langeais, that he had compoſed a treatiſe on the incroachments of the biſhops of Rome, and the prerogatives of Sovereigns; but would not publiſh it 'till he ſaw no hope of a reconciliation.

Not long after, King Henry's marriage with Ann Boleyn was publiſhed; which certainly was a moſt irregular procedure. As that Monarch had determined on having his firſt marriage nulled by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, he ſhould have poſtponed publication of his ſecond eſpouſals 'till ſentence was pronounced. All can be alledged in excuſe of this conduct, is, that the new Queen was four months gone with child, and her pregnancy could not eaſily be any longer concealed. But notwithſtanding this, the King might have got his firſt matrimonials nulled ſooner, or the ſecond to be publiſhed ſomewhat later, ſince there was only a month between the publication and ſentence. However this be, Henry, deſpairing to prevail with the Pope, and not much fearing him, reſolved to have no farther regard either for him or the public, being in a manner ſure of ſucceſs in whatever he undertook, conſidering how his people ſtood affected.

(1) Negociating the buſineſs of the divorce among the learned men of Germany. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 127.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1533.

In ſhort, being abſolutely fixed on terminating this affair, he ſo ordered that the archbiſhop of Canterbury demanded leave to ſummon Queen Catherine. Before he came to this extremity, he more than once attempted obtaining that Princeſs's conſent to the divorce: but all his indeavors proving ineffectual, he granted archbiſhop Cranmer the required licenſe. The Queen was therefore, May 20, cited to appear at Dunſtable, not far from the place where ſhe reſided (1): but, as ſhe refuſed to appear, that prelate, on the twenty-third of the ſame month, paſſed ſentence, declaring the King's marriage with Catherine null, as being repugnant to God's law. On the twenty-eighth, by another ſentence, he confirmed Henry's marriage with Ann Boleyn, and, on June the firſt, the new Queen was crowned.

Cranmer cites the Queen, and on her not appearing pronounces ſentence. Herbert. Burnet. Hall. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 462, 467. and confirms the King's ſecond marriage.

Thus ended this famous proceſs, the iſſue whereof afforded no leſs matter for diverſe reflections than the begining, every one reaſoning as ſwayed by prejudice or intereſt. Thoſe who were againſt the King, took notice of his error in marrying a ſecond wife, before his firſt eſpouſals were legally diſſolved: they moreover ſaid that, of all the prelates in England, Cranmer was the laſt who ſhould have been choſen for judge, ſince he had ſo openly declared againſt the firſt marriage: that his partiality was apparent, not only in his haſte to give ſentence, but alſo in confirming the King's ſecond nuptials, which had been conſummated while the firſt ſtill ſubſiſted.

Reflections on Henry's conduct. Burnet.

Thoſe who were for the King, affirmed, the ſentence was but a mere formality, which rendered not the marriage void, but only declared it ſo: that it ſufficed, the ſentence was conformable to the determinations of the Engliſh clergy, and all the univerſities in Europe, and to the ſentiments of the Pope himſelf, who would have nulled the marriage had he not been biaſſed by mundane conſiderations. They juſtified Cranmer, by alledging that, having changed his character ſince his declaring for the divorce, that declaration ought not to obſtruct his being a judge, any more than a lawyer, when he comes to ſit on the bench, is debared trying cauſes wherein he formerly gave counſel: that tho' there were ſome defaults in the form, it could not be denied the ſentence was juſt in itſelf which was ſufficient to quiet the conſcience of the King, who alone was concerned in that affair. As for the new Queen, no fault could be found with her conduct, ſince ſhe proved not with child 'till after her marriage, whether the King eſpouſed her in November laſt year, or in the January following. As for Queen Catherine, her maintaining the validity of her ſecond marriage ought not to be wondered at; but it was juſtly thought ſtrange that ſhe ſhould ſo obſtinately deny the conſummation of the firſt, which was proved by all poſſible evidence. But as moſt people were then biaſſed on one ſide or other (2), we are not to judge of this affair by what was publiſhed in thoſe days, but by reaſon and equity. Let us therefore briefly conſider it in that view, independently of all prejudices cauſed by the conſequences. It will not perhaps be unacceptable to the reader, to ſee here a ſhort recapitulation of the conduct of the chief actors in this ſcene. I ſhall confine my ſelf to this, without fully examining the proceſs, which is not ſo much the buſineſs of a hiſtorian as of a divine, or civilian.

Reaſons alledged for the King.

It is almoſt impoſſible to know poſitively, whether Henry, when he undertook the affair of his divorce, was convinced that his marriage was contrary to the law of God, or was, at leaſt, really diſturbed in conſcience on that account. All can be ſaid in his favor is, that he himſelf affirmed as much, and none but the ſearcher of all hearts can know whether he thought as he ſpake. It cannot be denied, that the ſole conſideration of ſuch a marriage is of itſelf capable of breeding thoſe ſcruples, eſpecially as the King's might be confirmed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury's and the biſhop of Lincoln, his confeſſor. But, on the other hand, it may be conjectured from ſeveral circumſtances, that it was only a pretext to put away Catherine, and marry Ann Boleyn. In the firſt place, he had cohabited with his Queen eighteen years, without ſhewing any ſcruple. In the ſecond place, if he was not inamored of Ann Boleyn when his ſcruples firſt ſeized him, it cannot be denied, he was very much ſo when with the utmoſt ardor he preſſed the affair of his divorce. So, it may be conjectured, that his paſſion might turn into a firm belief what at firſt was only a doubt. In the third place, there is abundance of probability that it was cardinal Wolſey who, either by himſelf or ſome other, firſt inſpired the King with theſe ſcruples, to be revenged on the Emperor and his aunt Queen Catherine. This bold and daring miniſter imagined, either the affair would eaſily ſucceed, conſidering his great credit at the Roman court, or, in caſe of oppoſition, it would not, more on this than on ſeveral other occaſions, be very difficult for him to induce the King to alter his mind: but Henry's love unexpectedly intervening, Wolſey found he had taken wrong meaſures; beſide, the univerſities determinations doubtleſs contributed not a little towards confirming Henry in his ſentiments. However, without farther inquiry, whether Henry was ſatiſfied of the equity of his cauſe, let us briefly examine how he behaved in a matter of ſuch nicety. He preſumed that Julius II could not grant a diſpenſation for his former eſpouſals, and conſequently the marriage was of itſelf null; and yet was of opinion he ſtood in need of Clement VII's bull to declare it ſo: herein was a contradiction which could not but greatly imbaraſs him. If, by divine law, Julius's diſpenſation was null, it was needleſs to revoke it; and if a revocation was neceſſary, it conſequently 'till then ſtood valid. Thus, Henry was bound, 'till it ſhould pleaſe his Sanctity to decide the point: wherefore, when Cranmer had inſpired him with a different idea of this affair, by intimating that, independently of the Pontif's aſſumed prerogative, the main article was to be aſſured of the right by conſulting the learned, he cried out in a tranſport of joy, "He had got at laſt "the right ſow by the ear;" that is, he found in Cranmer's advice a ſolution of thoſe difficulties he could not get clear of in following the doubtful principle of Papal power, ſince its extent was yet unſettled. He therefore determined on having recourſe to the univerſities for their reſpective opinions: but finally, weighing the conſequences of a rupture with Rome, he reſumed the original method, and again applied to his Holineſs. By this he greatly prejudiced his cauſe; for, in taking Remarks on the proceſs of this divorce, and the conduct of the principal parties. The King.

(1) The archbiſhop went to Dunſtable (about ſix miles from Ampthill where the Queen was) accompanied with Stephen Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, and the biſhops of London, Bath, and Lincoln, and ſat in court on the 10th of May, the King appearing by proxy, but the Queen not at all: whereupon ſhe was declared contumacious, and a ſecond and third citation were iſſued out. Then the evidences, which had been brought before the legates of the conſummation of the marriage with Prince Arthur, were read. After that, the determinations of the univerſities, divines, and canoniſts, with the judgments of the convocations of both provinces were produced, and the whole merit of the cauſe was opened. And then, on the 23d, with the advice of all who were preſent, it was declared, that the marriage had been only de facto, and not de jure, and conſequently null from the begining. One thing is to be obſerved, that the archbiſhop is ſtiled in the ſentence, Legate of the Apoſtolical See. Whether this went of courſe as one of his titles, or was put in to make the ſentence firmer, the reader may judge. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 131. Hall, fol. 210.

the Pope for judge, it was no longer in his power to limit the authority he conſented to acknowledge: but he was excuſable, ſince it was ſcarcely poſſible to throw off at once his prepoſſeſſion with regard to the Pontifical authority, whereof he had not at firſt ſuch clear ideas as afterwards. Then, finding the Pope acted only from worldly conſiderations, which prevented his giving him the ſatisfaction he required, he returned to the road he had quited: ſo building on ſelf-conſciouſneſs and the univerſities deciſions, he got his marriage declared void, without regarding Papal authority, which he was reſolved to renounce. I dwell not on the reaſons he alledged to urge the neceſſity of his divorce: that of conſcience was doubtleſs the beſt, if ſincere: that relating to the uncertainty of the ſucceſſion was proper to demand a ſentence, but not to ground the divorce upon, becauſe the divorce ſuppoſed the marriage void; which was the matter to be judged.

The Pope.

Let us now look into the conduct of his Holineſs, wherein we find nothing ſavoring of Chriſt's vicar. Clement VII never ſcrutiniſed the queſtion propounded to him by the maxims of religion, juſtice, or equity, but always with reſpect to his own or his family's intereſt. Had his attention turned only towards what religion required, he would have examined, whether Henry's marriage was contrary to the law of God, and whether, in that caſe, a Pontif had power to grant a diſpenſation. Had he been convinced that Julius II aſſumed a right not appertaining to him, he ſhould have readily granted Henry the bull he demanded: but if, on the contrary, he was perſuaded, the marriage was agreeable to divine law, or not being ſo it was in a Pope's power to diſpenſe with it, he ſhould have confirmed it, and, without ſeeking ſo many evaſions, have indeavored to remove the King's ſcruples. Such would have been the duty of a ſovereign Pontif: but inſtead of acting in this manner, he conſidered only what good or hurt might accrue to him from Henry's demand, independently of the juſtice or injuſtice of that demand. While he was priſoner in caſtle St. Angelo, or fugitive at Orvieto, and thought he ſtood in need of this Prince, he poſitively promiſed to content him: afterwards, he only amuſed him, 'till, by the Emperor's means, he had recovered Florence. No ſooner was he in poſſeſſion of that ſovereignty, which he had ſo ardently deſired, he avocated the proceſs to Rome, but, in all appearance, with intent never to decide it, if poſſibly to be avoided; becauſe, while the two parties remained uncertain of the deciſion, he rendered himſelf neceſſary to both. Can it therefore be ſaid, there was even the leaſt tincture of either juſtice or religion in his whole procedure? Moſt certainly, if Henry was blameable, as is pretended, in feigning ſcruples purpoſely to gratify his paſſions, Clement was no leſs ſo, in not attempting to reclaim him before the affair commenced, or contenting him in caſe his ſcruples were well-grounded. Even admiting Henry to have acted only thro' paſſion, which is however very uncertain, he would have been abundantly more excuſable than Clement, who, in his Pontifical ſtation, ought to have proceeded on very different principles.

With regard to the Emperor, he undoubtedly acted in this affair from motives of honor, intereſt, and policy, without juſtice or religion being at all concerned in his proceedings. He conſidered as a diſhonor to himſelf the repudiation of his aunt the Queen of England; which, added to the intereſt he had to imbaraſs Henry, then in ſtrict alliance with France, was but too capable of inducing him, to the utmoſt extent of his power, to obſtruct this divorce.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1533.

The Emperor.

Queen Catherine.

As for Queen Catherine, there is great appearance of her having acted with ſincerity. As ſhe ſtrongly believed the Pope's authority unlimited, ſhe thought herſelf the King's lawful wife, and in that belief deemed not herſelf obliged to reſign her right to another on pretenſe of her royal conſort's ſcruples, which were in her opinion groundleſs: beſide, ſhe could not own her marriage null, without greatly injuring Princeſs Mary her daughter. Tho' ſhe had been convinced her marriage was in itſelf illegal, ſhe was firmly perſuaded his Holineſs had power to render it valid, being however readily diſpoſed to ſubmit to the ſame authority, when it ſhould be declared: nevertheleſs ſhe may be juſtly ſuſpected of having forſworn herſelf to make her cauſe better.

Ann Boleyn.

Abundance has been ſaid againſt Ann Boleyn: but without inſiſting on Sanders's baſe invectives, which have been ſufficiently refuted (1), ſhe can, before marriage, be juſtly charged with only a ſingle fault; viz. her liſtening to the King before his marriage with Catherine was nulled; but it was no eaſy matter for a youthful perſon of her degree to have reſolution enough to reſiſt the temptation of being a Queen, if ſhe could be ſo lawfully, as, very probably, ſhe was by Henry made believe. It cannot however be ſaid that ſhe yielded up her perſon to the King's imbraces before matrimony. He eſpouſed her, at the very lateſt, in January, and ſhe was not delivered before September (2): ſo there is nothing in that which can give room for any ſuſpicion.

Clement's, Henry's, and Charles's agents.

As for the reſt who were concerned in this affair, as the cardinals, with Henry's and Charles's miniſters, it may be affirmed, they acted only from worldly views, without the leaſt regard to religion.

The univerſities.

It cannot be ſaid, that the univerſities of France and England decided the queſtions propoſed with intire freedom, ſince it is known what influence Sovereigns, in their own near concerns, have over the actions of their ſubjects. With reſpect to the univerſities of Italy, both parties accuſed each other of having corrupted them, the one by bribes, and the other by menaces. As for the Engliſh clergy, they had lately received ſuch a check, that they had reaſon to dread giving the King any freſh occaſion of diſpleaſure: but it may not be thence infered, that they decided contrary to their ſentiments, ſince it often happens that the truth is not oppoſite to our intereſt. The ſame may be ſaid of Cranmer, who being already tinctured with Luther's doctrine, could not look on Julius's diſpenſation as capable of rendering valid a marriage which, in itſelf, was null, being repugnant to God's laws: indeed, he might have eagerly imbraced this opportunity to give a mortal wound to the Papal authority, in order to promote the reformation: but it cannot be affirmed, Cranmer.

(1) Sanders has not ſcrupled to aſſert, that the King liking her mother, ſent her huſband ſir Thomas Boleyn embaſſador to France, and in his abſenſe begot Ann Boleyn on his wife. At his return, he ſued a divorce againſt her in the archbiſhop's court, but the King acquainting him ſhe was with child by him, he was, on the King's deſire, reconciled to his wife. Thus Ann Boleyn, tho' ſhe went under the name of ſir Thomas's daughter, yet was of the King's begeting. As he deſcribes her, ſhe was ill-ſhaped and ugly, had ſix fingers, a gag-tooth, and a tumor under her chin. At fifteen years of age, he ſays, both her father's butler and chaplain lay with her; and when in France ſhe led ſuch a diſſolute life, that ſhe was called the Engliſh Hackney. That the French King liking her, ſhe was called the King's Mule. But returning to England, ſhe gained the King's affection by the appearance of a ſevere virtue with which ſhe diſguiſed herſelf. The ſame author adds, that the King had likewiſe injoyed her ſiſter; with a great deal more to the diſgrace of this lady and her family. Hence we may ſee to what a height of rancor and malice, bigotry and blind zeal in religious matters are capable of carrying a man! Burnet, Vol. I. p. 41.

that he acted againſt his knowledge in pronouncing the ſentence of divorce: at leaſt, his whole future deportment was directly oppoſite to ſuch obliquities.

By what has been advanced, it may be eaſily perceived that, in this affair, which was properly a caſe of conſcience, very few of the actors had other than political views, without any great attention to the precepts of religion: nevertheleſs the Almighty, who directs all human actions, while the very actors, generally ſpeaking, are utterly ignorant of the tendency, drew from theſe proceedings of Henry, Clement and Charles, the end he deſigned, that is, the Engliſh church's reformation, as will be ſeen in the ſequel (1). If any one deſires fully to examine the caſe of Henry VIII's divorce, he would do well to caſt off all prejudice, and take care not to be miſled by the authors who have writ on this ſubject: but ſuch as will be ſatisfied with examining it hiſtorically, are to conſider only the political views of the principal actors.

Catherine remains inflexible. Burnet. Hall. Herbert.

The ſentence of divorce being publiſhed, Henry omited not ſending thereof notice to Catherine by lord Mountjoy, who tried to perſuade her to a ſubmiſſion; but in vain. She ſtill remained inflexible, affirming, ſhe would be the King's wife 'till the Pope had nulled the marriage. This anſwer being brought to the King, he ordered her to be ſtiled only Princeſs Dowager of Wales: but ſhe poſitively refuſed being ſerved by any who would not treat her as Queen, and the King thought not fit to remove ſuch as would ſhew her that reſpect (2).

She is to be ſtiled Princeſs Dowager. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 482.

Shortly after, he notified his divorce and new marriage to all the Sovereigns, and particularly to the Emperor, who coldly told the Engliſh embaſſador (3), he would conſider what he was to do in the caſe.

Henry notifies his marriage to the Emperor. Herbert. Burnet.

The news of King Henry's marriage, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury's ſentence having reached Rome, his Beatitude was highly inſenſed at Henry, and the more, as a copy of his book againſt the Papal authority had now appeared in Rome itſelf. The cardinals of the Imperial faction improving this occaſion, moſt importunately urged his pronouncing ſentence againſt that Monarch; remonſtrating to him, that the authority of the Holy See was arrived at its period, if he ſuffered ſuch inſults without due reſentment. Clement nulled the archbiſhop's ſentence, and declared, That the King himſelf was liable to excommunication, except he reſtored the cauſe to its former ſtate (4), before the inſuing September expired. He contented himſelf for this time with only threatening, becauſe he did not yet deſpair of reclaiming him by means of the King of France, with whom he was going to confer at Marſeilles.

Clement's deſign in the interview of Marſeilles.

The Pope's aim in this interview was, firſt, to celebrate the nuptials between his niece Catherine, and the duke of Orleans; ſecondly, to deviſe with Francis ſome expedient to adjuſt his differences with the King of England, or, if that could not be effected, to diſingage Francis from Henry's intereſt. Francis moſt cordially wiſhed that ſome method might be found to reconcile them, becauſe he hoped to join in a league with both, the more eaſily to recover the duchy of Milan. Henry had uſed his utmoſt indeavors to diſſuade him from this interview, being apprehenſive it would produce between Francis and Clement a union which could not but be to his prejudice (5). He had conſtantly depended, that Francis would act in concert with him to frighten the Pope, and that their menaces would finally induce him to give him the ſatisfaction he required: but, finding he could not prevail, he had publiſhed his marriage. He was thenceforwards abſolutely determined to widen the breach with Rome, except the Pope and King of France ſhould, during their interview, pitch on ſome ſatisfactory expedient, for which he was very willing to wait. Mean while he ſent the duke of Norfolk in embaſſy to Francis, with orders to accompany him to Marſeilles and ſee whether there was yet any hope of accommodation.

Henry's deſign.

He ſends the duke of Norfolk to Marſeilles. Hall. Herbert. Burnet. Hollingſh.

Norfolk, arriving at the French court, July the firſt, waited on the King who was then on his journey to Marſeilles (6), intending however to make ſome ſtay in Languedoc before he went to the congreſs. He attended him ſome time; but having, early in Auguſt, learned what was done at Rome againſt the King his maſter, would have returned, imagining his preſenſe would be of little ſervice at Marſeilles; nevertheleſs, at the King of France's ſollicitation, he contented himſelf with ſending lord Rochford for freſh inſtructions from King Henry, who inſtantly recalled him. However, Francis ſo artfully managed Henry, that he perſuaded him to ſend ſome perſon to Marſeilles, to be a witneſs of what ſhould paſs at the interview. Henry made choice of Stephen Gardiner, ſir Francis Brian, and Edmund Bonner (7); this latter a moſt proper perſon to execute the orders he gave him.

He recalls him.

Gardiner, Brian, Bonner, &c. ſent to Marſeilles.

The Pope and Francis met at Marſeilles the begining of October, and within a few days the duke of Orleans conſummated his marriage with Catherine di Medicis (8). This affair ended, Francis ſollicited the Pope in behalf of the King of England, and at length obtained from him a promiſe to give Henry intire ſatisfaction; but, to ſave the honor of the Holy See, he would judge the cauſe himſelf in a conſiſtory, from which the cardinals of Charles's faction ſhould be excluded. Thus far all went very well. But Bonner, to whom doubtleſs it was not thought fit to diſcover this ſecret, demanding audience of the Pope, acquainted him with the King his maſter's appeal to the next general council from the ſentence given, or to be given againſt him. The Pope told him, that, before he declared himſelf, he would adviſe with the cardinals there preſent. Some days after, having ſent for Bonner, he gave him for anſwer, that, according to the opinion of the cardinals, the appeal was unlawful. Bonner, without being ſurpriſed at this reply, acquainted him in the ſame manner with the like appeal of the archbiſhop of Canterbury from the ſentence which nulled his judgment for the divorce. This put the Pope into ſuch a rage, that he talked of throwing Bonner into a cauldron of boiling oil (9). Guicciardini ſays Francis was ſo offended with Bonner's inſolence,

The biſhop of Paris ſent to Henry with freſh expedients. Herbert.

Clement departed Marſeilles the twelfth of November, as much pleaſed with the King of France as he was diſſatisfied with Henry. Mean while, Francis not deſpairing yet to adjuſt this affair, ſent into England M. du Bellay, biſhop of Paris, to propound to King Henry ſome new expedients. This prelate, who had before reſided ſome time at the court of England as embaſſador, wrought ſo with Henry, that he at length obtained his concurrence to one of the expedients he propoſed (1). So, pleaſed with having prevailed even farther than he durſt have expected, he very readily undertook to carry this good news to his Holineſs, tho' it was then very late in December. He found Clement inclined to do all he could to terminate the affair amicably, and drew from him a poſitive promiſe, that the cauſe ſhould be judged at Cambray by perſons whom the King of England ſhould have no reaſon to ſuſpect. But his Sanctity, not truſting intirely to a verbal aſſurance, deſired to have it under the King's own hand, that he approved of what was concerted: moreover, to avoid all delays and evaſions, he fixed a day for the return of the courier who was to be ſent into England.

Clement requires the King's approbation in writing; and fixes a day for his anſwer.

This weighty affair being thus on the point of concluſion, the Emperor's agents were very urgent with Clement to revoke his ingagement; but he told them he had given his word. However, they repeated their inſtances with ſuch earneſtneſs, that finally they got him to promiſe, that if Henry's anſwer came not by the time prefixed, he ſhould deem himſelf diſingaged. The courier not returning on the day appointed, the Imperialiſts preſſed his Holineſs to pronounce ſentence againſt Henry, repreſenting to him, that he was amuſed, and menacing him with the Emperor's reſentment: in ſhort, they ſo ardently ſollicited him that, tho' the biſhop of Paris only deſired a delay of ſix days, he could not obtain it. Clement, terrified by the Imperialiſts threats, was ſo intirely at their devotion, that what, according to the uſual forms, ſhould have been done in three conſiſtories, was done in one: in a word, the Pope, without ſtaying for a reply from England, publiſhed a ſentence, declaring Henry's marriage with Catherine legal and valid, and requiring him to take his wife again, with denunciation of cenſures in caſe of diſobedience. Two days after came the courier with ſuch powers for the biſhop of Paris as Clement had required. Several cardinals moved his Holineſs to revoke what had been done; but the Emperor's party preſſed him ſo cloſely, that the motion was rejected. Thus Pope Clement who had, for ſix ſucceſſive years, amuſed the King by affected delays, could not be perſuaded to grant him ſix days, and by this precipitation occaſioned the Roman church utterly to loſe the kingdom of England.

Remark on Henry's conduct.

It muſt however be confeſſed, that it is very difficult to conceive what might be King Henry's view in the agreement he pretended to make with his Beatitude. Can it be ſuppoſed he deſigned to relinquiſh his newly-acquired title of Supreme Head of the Church of England? No, he appeared ſo exceſſively jealous, during the reſidue of his days, of this ſupremacy, which greatly awed the eccleſiaſtics, whereas before, the clergy depended more on the Pope than on him, that there is no likelihood he would think of parting with this prerogative. And yet, how could the King's ſupremacy ſubſiſt in caſe he agreed with the Pope? Or how could the Pope reſolve to content him with reſpect to his divorce, without requiring him to reſign his ſupremacy? Certainly it is impoſſible to reconcile theſe two oppoſites; which leaves room to ſuſpect that Henry acted not with ſincerity in his pretended accommodation with Clement, and after having juſtified his divorce by the ſentence he would have obtained from him, intended there to drop him and withdraw from his obedience. This ſuſpicion is confirmed by what paſſed in England, at the very inſtant when Henry diſpatched his courier to Rome with the ingagement his Holineſs had required. I have obſerved that the biſhop of Paris went poſt from London towards the cloſe of December; that on his arrival at Rome he ſent a courier to acquaint King Henry with what he had obtained of Clement; and that the King ſent back the ſame courier with his approbation. Now what ſpeed ſoever the biſhop and courier could make, it is impoſſible the courier could return to Rome before the middle of January: but at the very time Henry diſpatched this courier, he held at Weſtminſter a parliament, where acts were paſſed directly contrary to the agreement he ſeemed to deſire (2).

Henry VIII. An' 1533.

Burnet, Vol. I. p. 92.

The parliament meeting the fifteenth of January 1534, opened the ſeſſion with repealing the ſtatute of Henry IV againſt heretics. This was not with deſign to exempt them from the penalties in that ſtatute, ſince it was in this inacted that they ſhould be burned, but only to hinder the clergy from being ſole judges in cauſes of this nature. This was the real intent of the new act, whereby, for the future, heretics were to be proſecuted and tried according to the national laws, without any regard to the canon law (3).

An' 1534. Parliament. Herbert. Hall. Burnet.

Act to take from the clergy the cognizance of hereſy.

By another ſtatute, which the parliament likewiſe then paſſed, it was inacted: firſt, that all ſubſequent convocations ſhould convene by the King's writ: ſecondly, that the King ſhould name thirty-two perſons, ſixteen of both houſes of parliament, and a like number of eccleſiaſtics, to examine the canons and conſtitutions of the church, with power to abrogate or confirm ſuch as they judged requiſite. As it is certain the parliament acted by directions from court, it may eaſily be conceived King Henry had no very ſtrong inclination to agree with the Pope, tho' by the ingagement he ſent to Rome he ſeemed reſolved.

Another ſtatute, whereby the King is impowered to name thirty-two commiſſioners to reform the canons.

Here is another argument of the ſmall regard this Prince had for his Beatitude, even when he was on the very point of obtaining all his deſires. Before news came to England of the ſentence againſt King Henry, the parliament paſſed an act of attainder againſt Elizabeth Barton, generally ſtiled The Holy Maid of Kent, who pretending to be inſpired foretold, that if the King married Ann Boleyn he should not be King a month longer. This nun having been wrought upon and instructed by a certain curate, counterfeited the propheteſs, and mixed with her predictions invectives againſt the King's proceedings in the affair of his divorce, and threats againſt his chief counſellors. Diverſe Franciſcans countenanced her pretended revelations, ſo that ſhe was in great repute with the people; nay, archbiſhop Warham, ſir Thomas More, and John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, were in the number of thoſe who ſuffered themſelves to be deceived. But at length, this nun and her accomplices being apprehended by Henry's order, the affair was ſo carefully examined, that the whole contrivance was diſcovered, and the counterfeit propheteſs ſentenced to death, together with her corrupters: however, as this buſineſs had made great noiſe, the King was pleaſed it ſhould be brought before the parliament, to render their condemnation more authentic. Sanders would fain reckon this nun and her accomplices for martyrs, tho' their own confeſſions ſufficiently juſtified their condemnation. Had Henry really deſigned to be reconciled to the court of Rome, nothing could be more unſeaſonable than to paſs this act, when the divorce affair ſeemed to be on the point of being adjuſted to his ſatisfaction.

(2) This year, on June 24, died Mary Queen dowager of France, and wife of Charles Brandon duke of Suffolk. Hall, fol. 217.

(3) By the ſtatute of Henry IV, biſhops might, on ſuſpicion of hereſy, commit any perſon to priſon, without preſentment or accuſation, contrary to what was practiſed in all other caſes. Therefore the ſtatute of Henry IV was repealed, but thoſe of Richard II, and Henry V, were left ſtill in force, with the following regulation: that heretics ſhould be proceeded againſt upon preſentments, by two witneſſes at leaſt, and then commited, but brought to anſwer to their indictments in open court; and if found guilty, and would not abjure, or were relapſe, to be adjudged to death; the King's writ De hæretico comburendo being firſt had. It may eaſily be imagined how acceptable this act was to the whole nation, ſince it was a very effectual limitation of the eccleſiaſtical power, in one of the moſt uneaſy parts of it. And this regulation of the arbitrary proceedings of the ſpiritual courts was a particular bleſſing to the favorers of the reformation. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 147.

Burnet.

While the parliament was imployed in theſe matters, Henry received news of the ſentence given and publiſhed againſt him at Rome, with all the circumſtances, demonſtrating the little regard the Pope had for his perſon and dignity. Theſe haſty proceedings convincing him there was nothing more to be expected from Rome, he no longer delayed executing his reſolution to break off all correſpondence with the Roman court: nor was the parliament leſs offended than King Henry with his Sanctity's conduct; ſo, the whole legiſlature being in the ſame mind, it was reſolved utterly to aboliſh the Papal authority in England. After what Clement had done, there was no other way; it was neceſſary either to withſtand him vigorouſly, or prepare to indure all the ſeverities and indignities to which England lay expoſed in the reigns of Henry II, and John Lack-land: but the times were altered. The Engliſh were no longer diſpoſed to ſubmit to ſuch ſervilities as the Roman Pontifs required of their anceſtors, neither was the King's intereſt different from that of his ſubjects: thus all being alike tired of the Pontifical yoke, it was deemed more honorable to demoliſh at once that formidable power, under which the kingdom had ſo long groaned, than vainly to expect it would of itſelf be reduced within due bounds. It may be eaſily judged, the favorers of the new religion were not ſparing of their pains to reduce matters to this ſtate; nor was it long before what had been determined on was put in execution. In a few days an act was paſſed containing ſundry articles, all tending to the ſame point.

The King and parliament offended at the Pope's ſentence. Herbert.

Statute c. 20.

Act aboliſhing the Papal authority.

The firſt confirmed the ſtatute for aboliſhing annates, or firſt-fruits.

By the ſecond it was inacted, that thenceforwards the Pope ſhall have no hand in nominating or preſenting biſhops; but that, when any epiſcopal See ſhall become vacant, the King ſhall ſend the chapter a Congé d'elire, and in caſe the election ſhall not be over within twelve days after the licenſe, it ſhall belong to the King; that the biſhop elect ſhall ſwear fealty to the King, and then be recommended by his Majeſty to the archbiſhop to be conſecrated: that if the biſhop elect or archbiſhop refuſe to obey the contents of this act, they ſhall be liable to the penalty of Præmunire. Moreover, all perſons were expreſly forbid applying to the biſhop of Rome for bulls, palls, or any other thing whatever relating to religion.

Henry VIII. An' 1534.

By another act, were aboliſhed Peter-pence, all procurations, delegations, expeditions of bulls, and diſpenſations coming from the Roman court; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury was appointed to grant all ſuch diſpenſations, &c. as ſhould not be contrary to divine ordinance, on condition that part of the money thence ariſing ſhould be paid into the King's exchequer (1). Moreover, all religious houſes, exempt and not exempt, ſhould be ſubject to the archbiſhop's viſitation (2).

Statute c. 21.

By another act, it was inacted, that the King's marriage with Catherine, relict of his brother Prince Arthur, ſhould be held null and void, and that ſhe ſhould be reputed only Princeſs Dowager of Wales. On the contrary, the King's marriage with Ann Boleyn is declared valid, and the ſucceſſion to the crown ſettled upon their iſſue. Moreover, it is ſaid, that any perſon of what quality ſoever, who ſhall ſpeak or write againſt the King's marriage, ſhall be adjudged a traitor to King and ſtate, and that all the King's ſubjects, without diſtinction, ſhall be obliged to ſwear, they will obſerve and maintain the contents of this act. After this, follows a liſt of the marriages prohibited by God's law, among which is that of a man with his brother's widow; and it was inacted that, for the future, no ſuch marriages ſhould be allowed, and that ſuch as were then in being ſhould be diſſolved.

Statute c. 22.

Thus was the Papal authority aboliſhed in England by act of parliament; indeed, few biſhops and abbots were preſent when the act paſſed. However, only a ſingle biſhop refuſed to ſet his name to it, becauſe they made great difference between ſubmiting to a ſtatute paſſed by lawful authority, and giving their vote for it. The generality of the people expreſſed great joy to ſee themſelves freed from a yoke which neither they nor their forefathers could patiently indure. None but the monks exclaimed againſt it, which they did very clamorouſly, and drew on themſelves the King's indignation, the effects whereof they afterwards taſted. Thoſe who wiſhed for reformation, were highly pleaſed to ſee the main obſtacle removed, believing the reſt would quickly follow: but this ſo impatiently expected reformation made not, in this reign, all the progreſs they imagined might reaſonably have been hoped.

The people expreſs their joy.

abbots and fryers of all orders to this effect: "That "they would be faithful to the King, the Queen, "their heirs and ſucceſſors: that they acknow- "ledged the King for ſupreme head of the church "of England: that the biſhop of Rome has no "more juriſdiction than any other biſhop: that "they renounced his obedience: that they would "ſincerely preach doctrines agreeable to the holy "Scriptures: that in their prayers, they would "pray firſt for the King, as ſupreme head of the "church of England, then for the Queen*, and "laſtly for the archbiſhop of Canterbury (1)." Some time after, Lee archbiſhop of York certified, by a writing dated the fifth of May, that in the convocation of his province it was declared, "That "the Pope had no more power in England than "any other biſhop." Only John Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſir Thomas More late chancellor, refuſed to ſign the act of parliament, which, as has been ſeen, contained three principal articles, viz. the ſucceſſion of the crown: the nullity of the King's firſt marriage, with the validity of his ſecond; and the aboliſhment of the Papal authority. They offered to ſign the firſt article; but for the other two, they ſaid, their conſcience would not ſuffer them to conſent to them: whereupon they were commited to the Tower (2).

Fiſher and More refuſe to take the oath, and are ſent to the Tower. Herbert. Strype.

While theſe oaths were adminiſtering throughout the whole realm, Henry ſent the archbiſhop of York and biſhop of Durham to tell Catherine, ſhe muſt forbear aſſuming the title of Queen, and lay before her the reaſons which moved the parliament to deprive her of it: but ſhe replied, She believed her marriage with the King good and lawful, and ſhould hold it as ſuch to her dying day: that ſhe had never conſummated her marriage with Prince Arthur; and they who affirmed it, ſpoke not the truth: that ſhe was not bound to ſubmit to the archbiſhop of Canterbury's ſentence, ſince his Holineſs had nulled it, and decreed the contrary (3): that the King's marriage with Ann was not valid, as being made during the appeal: that ſhe was not obliged to ſubmit to the parliament's ordinances, not being King Henry's ſubject, but his wife: that beſide, theſe acts were made by the King's ſubjects on a matter wherein himſelf was party.

Negociation between Francis and Henry fruitleſs. Herbert.

Tho' Henry would have been extremely glad of Catherine's ſubmiſſion to what the parliament had inacted, it was not her obſtinacy which gave him the greateſt uneaſineſs. The Emperor having undertaken to execute Pope Clement's ſentence, Henry was naturally to expect being attacked by that potent adverſary. In order therefore to prevent him, or to put himſelf in a defenſible condition, he deſired to make a league with the King of France, by a new treaty, which ſhould render their union more effectual for their common defenſe. Francis ſeemed very ready to comply, but deſigned that all the terms ſhould be to his advantage, and to make Henry ſubſervient to his views elſewhere. He had ſtill his eye fixed on the duchy of Milan, as on what appertained rightfully to him, and had been unjuſtly taken from him, and deſigned to recover it, tho' he had expreſly renounced it by the treaty of Cambray. To this end he had ſacrificed the honor of his houſe, in matching his ſecond ſon to a baſtard-branch of the Medicis family, by reaſon he believed he could not proceed without Clement. But, on the contrary, he was apprehenſive of loſing the fruit of that alliance, by uniting too cloſely with the King of England, whom that Pontif could now conſider no otherwiſe than as a profeſſed enemy. In this perplexity, he indeavored to perſuade Henry to act only privately, by ſending large ſums to the German Proteſtants, to foment the diſſenſion between them and the Emperor, and imbroil him ſo as to hinder him from thinking of Italy. This propoſal Henry did not abſolutely reject. He was very willing to aſſiſt the Proteſtants with a good ſum of money; but pretended withal, that Francis ſhould attack Navarre with a powerful army, while on his part he carried war into Flanders: but Francis could not reſolve to join ſo openly with England, for fear of offending the Pope; beſide, he turned all his thoughts to the Milaneſe, whither, towards the end of laſt year, a certain accident afforded him opportunity to carry his arms. As this ſaid event was the occaſion or pretenſe of a new war between Charles and Francis, it is requiſite we make ſome brief mention thereof.

The duke of Milan beheads Merveilli the King of France's envoy. Du Bellay. Mezerai. P. Daniel.

Franceſco Sforza was no ſooner reſtored to Milan, on very hard conditions, but he impatiently longed to be freed from Charles's yoke, and the obligation of paying him the ſums exacted. Francis having ſome knowledge of Sforza's diſpoſition, was of opinion he ought to cheriſh it, in hopes of one day reaping ſome advantage: but, as Sforza greatly dreaded giving the Emperor any umbrage, and conſequently the affair was to be managed very privately, Francis found means to keep a miniſter at Milan who could not be ſuſpected. He choſe for that ſervice a Milaneſe gentleman, named Merveilli, who having been formerly baniſhed Milan by Ludovico Il Moro, had reſided ever ſince in France. The troubles of the Milaneſe having intirely ceaſed by the peace of Cambray, Merveilli

(1) Gardiner wrote to Cromwell, from Wincheſter, the ſixth of May, that lord Audley and others, with all the abbots, priors, wardens, and curates within the ſhire had taken the oath. The forms in which they did it are not known, for tho' they were inrolled, yet in Queen Mary's days Bonner and others were commiſſioned to examine the records, and raze out all things done either in contempt of the See of Rome, or the defamation of religious houſes. However, two of the ſubſcriptions of religious orders, dated May 4, 1534, eſcaped their diligence. One is by ſix abbies, and others by the prioreſs and convent of the Dominican nuns at Deptford. See Burnet's Coll. Vol. I. No. 50.

(2) At a meeting of the privy-council at Lambeth, many were cited to take the oath. More was firſt called, and the oath being tendered him, he replied, "After having conſidered the act, he would neither blame thoſe who made, nor thoſe who "ſwore the oath, but for his part, tho' he was willing to ſwear to the ſucceſſion, if he might be ſuffered to draw up the oath "himſelf, yet for the oath offered him, his conſcience ſo moved him, that he could not, without hazarding his ſoul, take it." Upon which, being deſired to withdraw, others were called on, and did all take the oath except Fiſher, who anſwered in almoſt the ſame manner as More had done. Then More was again brought in, and they ſhewed him how many had taken it; he ſaid, "He judged no man for doing it, only he could not do it himſelf." Being aſked the reaſon, he replied, "He feared it "might provoke the King the more againſt him if he ſhould offer reaſons, which would be called diſputing againſt law: "but however, if the King would command him to do it, he would put them in writing." Cranmer urged him with this argument, "That ſince he blamed not others for taking it, it ſeemed he was not perſuaded it was a ſin, but was doubtful in the "matter: but he did know certainly he ought to obey the King and the law; therefore he was obliged to do that about which "he was certain, notwithſtanding his doubtings." He anſwered, "Tho' he had examined the matter very carefully, yet his "conſcience leaned poſitively to the other ſide, and offered to purge himſelf by oath, that it was purely out of conſcience that "he refuſed it." The abbot of Weſtminſter preſſed him, with an argument too often uſed in the like caſes, "That he might "ſee his conſcience was erroneous, ſince the great council of the realm was of another mind." Cranmer in a letter to Cromwell, earneſtly preſſed to accept the oath as More and Fiſher offered; for if they once ſwore to the ſucceſſion, it would quiet the kingdom, ſince all others would acquieſce and ſubmit to the judgments of ſo great men. But this ſage advice was not followed. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 156. Strype's Mem. Vol. I. p. 174.

returned home with a letter of credence for Sforza, which credentials that Prince anſwered, receiving the gentleman as envoy of France, tho' in public he treated him not as ſuch. However ſecret Merveilli's negociation might be, the Emperor had thereof ſome intelligence, and made great complaints to the duke, who, to remove all ſuſpicion, reſolved to ſacrifice to him this envoy. Accordingly he ſuborned a perſon to quarrel with Merveilli, which ended in the murder of the party imployed, who was killed by Merveilli's ſervants, without however their maſter's being preſent. Hereupon Merveilli was hurried to priſon, none ſuffered to ſpeak with him, and within two days after beheaded. Francis underſtanding this, wrote a menacing letter to the duke, and informed all his allies of the affront he had received. Sforza would have excuſed himſelf, by denying that Merveilli was at Milan as envoy. What he alledged was true in reſpect to the public: but he could not diſavow his own letter to the King, in anſwer to that agent's credentials. When the French embaſſador acquainted Charles with the outrage commited at Milan on Merveilli, that Monarch coldly replied, "He "could not well conceive, how the King of France "ſhould be affected with the death of one of the "duke of Milan's ſubjects, whom his Sovereign "had chaſtiſed anſwerably to his demerits." This anſwer created in Francis a belief that the Emperor was concerned in Merveilli's death, which was a freſh cauſe of diſguſt, and inflamed his deſire of revenge. But on the other hand, he was not ſorry the ſatisfaction he demanded was refuſed, becauſe he thence deſigned to take occaſion of entering the Milaneſe ſword in hand. To that purpoſe, he ordered a levy of Landſquenets in Germany, and requeſted the duke of Savoy to grant him paſſage thro' his ſtate, that he might chaſtiſe the duke of Milan: but that Prince fearing to diſpleaſe the Emperor, thought fit to decline complying with his demand. On this refuſal, Francis, who could not enter the Milaneſe but by paſſing thro' the Savoyard territories, reſolved to make war upon that duke, uſing for pretenſe certain claims he had, in right of Louiſa his mother, to the duke of Savoy's inheritance. While preparations were making to commence this war, he imployed this whole year in diverſe negociations, tending to create the Emperor troubles, and diſable him from aſſiſting the duke of Savoy.

Francis takes occaſion to carry war into the Milaneſe. He demands a paſſage of the duke of Savoy; and on his refuſal declares war againſt him.

Clement VII's death. Paul III ſucceeds him. Guicciard.

While Francis was thus buſied, the ſituation of the affairs of Italy was ſomewhat changed by the death of Clement VII, who was carried off by a fit of ſickneſs the twenty-ſixth of September. The twelfth of October following, cardinal Farneſe was elected Pontif, and aſſumed the name of Paul III.

Affairs of Germany. Sleidan.

This year produced alſo in Germany certain alterations, which put the affairs of the Proteſtants in a tolerable ſituation. The landgrave of Heſſe defeated King Ferdinand's army, commanded by the count Palatine, and reſtored the duke of Wirtemberg to his dominions. Ferdinand, no longer able to make head againſt the landgrave, was obliged to agree to that duke's reſtoration; but withal obtained, that both the duke and landgrave ſhould own him for King of the Romans. Soon after, the elector of Saxony likewiſe acknowledged him, having firſt got from Ferdinand a promiſe, that he would not ſuffer any perſon to be moleſted in the Empire on account of religion.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1534.

Clement VII's deceaſe occaſioned not any change in the meaſures taken by the Engliſh court abſolutely to ſhake off the Papal yoke. Matters had been carried too far ever to recede: beſide, the King, having not much to fear from abroad, by reaſon of the troubles Charles was like to be involved in, and his ſubjects being inclined to ſupport him, it would have been imprudent to neglect ſo favorable a juncture, and leave his work unfiniſhed. Wherefore the parliament meeting the third of November, paſſed ſundry material acts, whereof it will ſuffice to relate the ſubſtance, in order to ſhew they wholly tended to one and the ſame point, namely, to break all the bonds which had ſerved to hold the Engliſh in ſubjection to the Roman Pontifs.

Henry determined on abiding by the rupture with Rome. Herbert. Burnet. Hall. Hollingſh.

Diverſe acts paſſed on that ſubject.

The firſt act confirmed the King's title of ſupreme head of the Engliſh church, already given him by the clergy (1). Tho' Henry had very willingly accepted from the eccleſiaſtics this title, nay, had not left them the liberty to deny it him, he ſeemed however dubious whether he ſhould or ſhould not receive it when offered by the parliament. He would firſt adviſe with his council, and conſult ſome of the prelates, whether he did ſo thro' ſcruple, or to ſhew it had not been extorted. They whom he conſulted having aſſured him, that the authority aſſumed by the biſhop of Rome over the whole church had no foundation in Scripture, he baniſhed all his ſcruples (if it be true he had any) and from thenceforwards took all occaſions to improve the prerogatives which flowed from this new title.

I. act confirms Henry's title of Head of the Church.

By a ſecond act, it was declared treaſon to ſpeak, write, or imagine any thing againſt the King or Queen (2).

II. Treaſon to ſpeak evil of the King.

The third debared perſons accuſed of treaſon, of the benefit of ſanctuary.

III. Concerning ſanctuaries.

By a fourth, the parliament preſcribed a form of oath concerning the ſucceſſion, to be taken by all the King's ſubjects, and annulled all former oaths on that head.

IV. Form of oath.

The fifth was exceſſively grievous to the clergy, as it gave the King all annates and firſt-fruits of benefices; whereas by the act already paſſed, the eccleſiaſtics were in hopes of being ever freed from that burden. This act moreover intitled King Henry to the annual product of the tenth of all livings (3).

V. Grants the firſt-fruits and tenths to the King.

By a ſixth ſtatute, proviſion was made for twenty-five ſuffragan biſhops, each to depend on his dioceſan, who muſt preſent to his Majeſty two, for him to chuſe one. Thus was revived in the church of England the uſe of Chorepiſcopi, introduced into the primitive church, but afterwards diſcontinued for ſeveral centuries.

VI. Suffragan biſhops.

Laſtly, the parliament condemned Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſir Thomas More, to perpetual impriſonment, and confiſcated their whole ſubſtance, Fiſher and More condemned by parliament. Burnet.

(1) And declared, That the King, his heirs and ſucceſſors, ſhall have full power and authority to viſit, reform, and reſtrain all ſuch errors, hereſies, abuſes, and offenſes, which by any manner of ſpiritual juriſdiction ought to be reformed. See Statut.

(2) Or to call the King heretic, ſchiſmatic, tyrant, infidel, or uſurper, of which opprobrious names ſome inſolent fryers were very liberal.

(3) To be paid between Chriſtmas and the firſt of April. It was ordered in this act, That the chancellor of England ſhould direct into every dioceſe in the realm commiſſions in the King's name, under his great ſeal, as well to the archbiſhop and biſhop of every dioceſe, as to ſuch other perſons as the King ſhould appoint; to examine, ſearch, and require, by all ways and means, the true, juſt, and whole yearly value of all the manors, lands, tenements, hereditaments, rents, tithes, offerings, emoluments, and all other profits, as well ſpiritual as temporal, belonging to any archbiſhoprick, biſhoprick, archdeaconry, deanery, hoſpital, college, prebend, cathedral, or collegiate church, parſonage, vicarage, free chapel, or any other benefice or promotion ſpiritual. Accordingly, ſeveral commiſſioners were appointed for each county, with whom were joined the biſhops of the reſpective dioceſes, and a certain number of auditors. The valuations which were thus taken by theſe commiſſioners, were all returned to Cromwell, maſter of the rolls; and according to them have the firſt-fruits been paid ever ſince. Strype's Mem. General pardon. Burnet.

Before the parliament broke up, Henry granted a general amneſty, from which however Fiſher and More were excluded.

Proclamation againſt the appellation of Pope. Stow. Herbert.

Not long after, the King iſſued a proclamation, inhibiting the name of Pope to be given the biſhop of Rome, and commanding that appellation to be eraſed in all books, to deſtroy the very remembrance thereof, if poſſible. Then the biſhops voluntarily ſwore to renounce expreſly all obedience to the biſhop of Rome. Gardiner, already biſhop of Wincheſter, was not the laſt to take this oath, tho' in his ſoul he abhorred it as moſt ſacrilegious; but a blind condeſcenſion for the King in this reſpect was then the only means to preſerve his favor: beſide this prelate was thereby inabled, on other points, to thwart the reformers, who daily gained ground (1).

Progreſs of the reformation in England. Burnet.

It was not only in Germany that the reformation had made ſome progreſs, but alſo in many other places. In England it had been in ſome meaſure countenanced by cardinal Wolſey, as, during his miniſtry, no perſon was proſecuted for hereſy, tho' the clergy wanted not occaſions to exerciſe their wonted rigor, had they been ſuffered to do as they pleaſed. After Wolſey's diſgrace, ſir Thomas More being made chancellor, perſuaded the King, that what did him moſt injury at the court of Rome, was the report of his being a favorer of the innovators, and to remove this falſe imputation, the moſt infallible way was to ſhew a zeal for religion. Henry, following this advice, ordered the laws againſt heretics to be rigorouſly executed, and very ſtrictly prohibited the importing any of their books: but this prohibition ſufficed not to prevent diverſe of Luther's performances from being brought into England, with the Engliſh tranſlation of the New Teſtament by Tindal, who was retired into Flanders. The biſhop of London having thereof notice, cauſed ſome copies to be ſeized, and publicly burned by the hangman: but this was ſo far from injuring the reformation, that it rather turned to its advantage. Many perſons, full of indignation at this impious act, infered that Sacred Writ was repugnant to the religion generally profeſſed, ſince the eccleſiaſtics were ſo ſedulous to hinder the Bible from being read; and that alone raiſed their deſire to read it: alſo the diſlike Henry's ſubjects had taken to the Pope greatly increaſed by their reading Luther's writings.

Perſecution in England. Burnet. Fox.

As the reformation gained ground, its adverſaries zeal flamed more and more againſt ſuch as imbraced it. While More was chancellor, he ſpared no pains to effect their utter extirpation. Many ſuffered martyrdom with wonderful conſtancy, which greatly contributed to animate and fortify their brethren. At length, the King having to manage the German Proteſtants, becauſe he might afterwards want them, ſuſpended the perſecution which More had excited. On the other hand, Ann Boleyn very much mollified the King in that reſpect; archbiſhop Cranmer contributed to it likewiſe to the utmoſt of his power, and Thomas Cromwell, now in great eſteem with Henry, ſeconded their indeavors as far as he was able. But they had a ſtrong party againſt them, conſiſting of the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter, Longland biſhop of Lincoln, almoſt all the eccleſiaſtics who had any acceſs at court, and thoſe who, when they preached before the King, ſtuffed their ſermons with invectives againſt the reformation. All theſe had gained Henry's confidence by their compliance in the affairs of his divorce and ſupremacy; tho' in the latter they acted contrary to their ſentiments. By this condeſcenſion, they were inabled effectually to oppoſe the reformers in all ſuch articles as concerned not the Pope, and eſpecially in that of tranſubſtantiation, or the real preſenſe, which Henry then and always believed unqueſtionable. In ſpite of all this, the chiefs of the reformed deſpaired not of inclining him by degrees to a farther reformation, becauſe of the connection the articles of religion have with each other: beſide, their party grew daily ſtronger by the junction of ſuch as read the holy Scriptures and the religious books which were handed about, notwithſtanding the King's prohibition. Nothing better evidences the number and ſtrength of that party, than the readineſs wherewith the parliament paſſed the acts which tended to leſſen the clergy's power, and ſhake off the Papal yoke.

Cranmer and Cromwell ſupport the reformation. Strong party againſt them. Burnet.

Put a ſtop to.

The reformation made likewiſe ſome progreſs in France: the King himſelf expreſſed not any diſinclination for the Proteſtants doctrine, which was privately countenanced by his ſiſter Margaret Queen of Navarre: but the cardinals of Tournon and Lorrain, who were in great credit with him, diſſuaded him from it ſo earneſtly, that they finally gained him, nay, made him a violent perſecutor.

Francis I ſeems to favor the reformation.

Before I cloſe what relates to the events of the year 1534, I muſt not omit mentioning, that a twelve-month's truce concluded the laſt year between England and Scotland, was improved to a formal pacification, the eleventh of May this year. By this treaty, the peace was to laſt 'till the death of one of the two Kings, and Henry might, without breaking it, retain the Douglaſſes in England.

An' 1535.

Early in 1535, King Francis ſent embaſſadors to Henry, under color of diſcharging the duty of a good friend and ally, but in reality to attempt deceiving him, by feigning to acquaint him with his ſecrets, and aſk his counſel. What occaſioned the ſaid embaſſy was this. The Emperor having reſolved to carry his arms into Africa, was deſirous of amuſing Francis, leſt, in his abſenſe, he ſhould attack the duke of Savoy, and ſo open a way to the duchy of Milan, as was ſeemingly his deſign. With this view, he had diſpatched to him embaſſadors, with orders to propoſe a match between his third daughter and Philip Prince of Spain; and another between the Dauphin and Mary, daughter of Henry and Catherine of Aragon: moreover, he had offered him a penſion of one hundred thouſand crowns for the duke of Orleans, on the duchy of Milan, and the duchy itſelf after the deceaſe of Franceſco Sforza, who had no iſſue. It was evident, theſe overtures were intended merely to amuſe Francis, who alſo conſidered them not in any other light: nevertheleſs, he imagined they would ſerve to procure him ſome advantage from Henry, if he let him know he was courted by the Emperor. To this end, he diſpatched over to England admiral Chabot, baron de Brion, on pretenſe of conſulting King Henry on theſe offers: but his chief aim was to give him uneaſineſs, and induce him to make ſome advantageous propoſitions, and it afterwards appeared that he would have ingaged him in affairs extremely remote from his intentions. The admiral having diſcharged his commiſſion, Henry anſwered, "He much wondered that the Emperor ſhould "pretend to marry his daughter, over whom he " neither had nor ever ſhould have any right or " power: that it was manifeſt, he only ſought to " break the union between France and England, " and therefore he hoped the King of France would " not be ſo much his own enemy, as to liſten to " ſuch overtures." Shortly after, he ſent orders to his embaſſadors at Paris, to tell Francis, he would give Elizabeth his daughter and heir to the duke of Angoulême, his third ſon, on the following conditions: That Francis himſelf, his three ſons, the Princes of the blood, the principal nobility of France, the parliaments and univerſities ſhould ſolemnly promiſe to cauſe to be revoked the ſentence given againſt him by the biſhop of Rome: that the duke of Angoulême ſhould be ſent into England to be educated: that, in caſe by his marriage he ſhould accede to the crown of England, the duchy of Angoulême ſhould be independent of the crown of France. Theſe conditions were afterwards mitigated, and Francis ſeemed to agree thereto: but he required, in his turn, that Henry ſhould aſſiſt him in the war of Savoy, and forgive him the perpetual annuity of one hundred thouſand crowns, which he was bound to pay by a treaty. Henry, perceiving Francis's inſincerity, told the admiral, that, inſtead of forgiving the penſion, he expected the King his maſter ſhould pay the arrears, and clear by the time appointed all his other debts. This anſwer put a period to the negociation which, very ſeemingly, was undertaken purely to ſound Henry concerning the penſion.

Francis's demand.

Henry demands payment of what was owed him by Francis.

Francis's grand deſign was to recover the Milaneſe, under pretext of revenging the affront done him by Sforza: but to execute this project, it was neceſſary to raiſe the Emperor troubles which ſhould obſtruct his aſſiſting that duchy. From four different quarters he hoped to imbroil the Emperor. Firſt, from the Pope and other Italian Princes. Secondly, in Germany, by means of the league of Smalcald. Thirdly, by fomenting diſcord between Charles and the King of England. Laſtly, by drawing the Turks into Germany. In order to all this, he had married his ſon the duke of Orleans to Catherine di Medicis; lodged in the duke of Bavaria's hands a hundred thouſand crowns to be ready on occaſion; perſuaded Henry to terminate the affair of his divorce in the manner we have ſeen; and had at Conſtantinople ſecret agents, to treat of an alliance with Sulyman the Ottoman Emperor. But moſt of theſe expedients, which he thought infallible, had proved unſucceſsful. The firſt had miſcarried by the death of Clement VII, and by the election of a new Pontif who would not eaſily be prevailed on to eſpouſe his intereſt. The King of the Romans had fruſtrated the ſecond, by agreeing with the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the duke of Wirtemberg. As for the third, he could not thence hope much, becauſe the King of England's intention was not to make war upon the Emperor, but only to ſtand on the defenſive: conſequently it was in the Emperor's power to keep him quiet, by not attacking him firſt. The Turks therefore alone could properly be ſubſervient to his deſigns: but, to rely on them, it was neceſſary to commence the war in Italy, otherwiſe it was not likely Sulyman would be perſuaded to begin it in Hungary. On this account, he continued at Conſtantinople a negociation, which was diſcovered by a letter intercepted by the duke of Urbino, who inſtantly ſent it to the Emperor. Mean while, Francis ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution to attack the duke of Savoy, and open a paſſage to the Milaneſe. He reckoned, the peace of Germany could not long ſubſiſt; that the Emperor and Henry would never agree; and that, when once a war was commenced, not only the Pope, and other Italian Potentates, but alſo the King of England, would readily aſſiſt to reduce within due bounds the Auſtrian power: above all, he depended on the Princes of the league of Smalcald, fancying they would imbrace this opportunity to free themſelves from their uneaſineſs, occaſioned by that family's advancement. To this end, he continued his intrigues with them, and pretended to be ſo far inclined to their religion that he deſigned to invite Melancthon into France, to confer with him: but withal, he plainly ſhewed he acted only on political views, ſince in France he ſentenced to the flames ſuch as ſeparated from the church of Rome. Mean while, as there was ſome differences between Luther and Calvin about religion, and as thoſe burned in France were Calviniſts, the rigid Lutherans, not conſidering them as their brethren, imagined Francis might treat them with the utmoſt ſeverity without loſing his regard for the Lutheran religion. Francis being determined on imploying his indeavors to re-conquer the duchy of Milan, attacked the duke of Savoy, and in the firſt campain took from him Savoy and La Breſſe.

Henry VIII. An' 1535.

P. Daniel.

While Francis was laboring to accompliſh his deſigns, Charles V was forming vaſt projects, which tended to no leſs than eſtabliſhing his dominion over all Europe. Indeed, France and England, being cloſely united, might ſtrongly have oppoſed his ambition: but he deſpaired not of diſuniting them in the end; that was his chief care, while on one hand he excited the Iriſh to a rebellion, and the King of Scotland to a rupture with England: but while he was attempting to imbroil his adverſaries, wherein he hoped to find his account, he was himſelf not free from uneaſineſs with regard to Sultan Sulyman, who menaced Germany, under color of ſupporting the intereſts of John Zapol, whom he cauſed to be crowned King of Hungary. On the other hand, he beheld with extreme concern the great progreſs of Heyradin Barba-roſſa, the famous corſair, who, after expeling Mulei Haſſan, had made himſelf King of Tunis. Such a neighbor could not but diſquiet him, becauſe, to hinder him from ravaging the coaſts of Spain, Naples, and Sicily, it would have been neceſſary conſtantly to maintain a fleet in the Mediterranean, which could not be done without a vaſt expenſe, and this would have diſconcerted his other projects. So conſidering the war he had reſolved to undertake againſt Heyradin as his moſt urgent affair, he made this ſummer an expedition into Africa, where he took the fort Goletta, after which he poſſeſſed himſelf of Tunis, and reſtored Mulei Haſſan.

The Emperor's expedition to Africa. Mariana. Herbert. Hiſt. of Alg.

Henry gladly ſaw the Emperor ingaging in wars which would, very probably, keep him long imployed: wherefore he reſolved to improve this interval, to complete the regulation of his domeſtic affairs, which were yet in a very doubtful ſituation. He had aboliſhed the Papal authority, and been by acts of parliament declared ſupreme head of the church of England: but tho', by the conſtitution of that government, theſe acts ſeemed to ſurpaſs all contradiction, it was however but too true this was not ſufficient. As religion was concerned and conſciences are not to be forced, thoſe very ſtatutes wanted to be ſupported by authority to make them obeyed at leaſt externally. That uniformity which appeared in the determinations of the parliament and clergy was, moſt certainly, in many rather the effect of fear than of any internal conviction: nay ſome, as Fiſher and More, were ſo daring as publicly to diſapprove theſe ordinances, and notwithſtanding the ſeverity exerciſed on them, ſtill perſiſted in the ſame opinion. It is true, theſe inſtances of rigor to perſons of ſuch diſtinction made people ſilent, but ſufficed not to convince them of the reaſonableneſs of the ſtatutes. Thus, tho' King Henry found not any open oppoſition, he might readily readily judge that obedience proceeding from fear could laſt no longer than compulſion ſubſiſted. On the other hand, he beheld with concern the triumph of the Proteſtants, who imagined that, after aboliſhing the Pontifical authority, he was going to renounce all the errors they combated, tho' nothing was farther from his thoughts. Mean while, it was every where publiſhed, that he was on the point of forſaking the ancient religion; ſome aſſerting it out of malice, to render him odious; and others, becauſe they wiſhed it. To clear himſelf therefore from theſe imputations, at the very time he refuſed to recognize the Pope's authority, he ordered thoſe who were called Sacramentarians to be burned. By this conduct, he made himſelf hateful to both Catholics and Proteſtants. As for the Proteſtants, he bore their ill-will without much concern: beſide that, he feared them not, he approved in their doctrine only thoſe articles which oppoſed the Papal authority, and their ſentiments of the fryers, againſt whom he was extremely inſenſed becauſe they labored with all their power to alienate from him the affections of his people. It is true, he valued and loved Cranmer and Cromwell, with ſome others who countenanced the reformation; but he looked not on them as Proteſtants. He believed them men of ſolid virtue and piety, who, preſerving the eſſential doctrines of religion, were deſirous of reforming the abuſes introduced into the church: but as, among theſe abuſes, he himſelf acknowledged only what concerned the Pope and the fryers, he imagined the reformers kept within the ſame bounds. They who perfectly knew him, took care not to diſcover all their ſentiments; but, by conforming themſelves to his opinion with regard to theſe two articles, they hoped to induce him by degrees to advance the reformation, when by their aſſiduous indeavors he ſhould become more inlightened; for which reaſon the reformation began in England with theſe two points: as to the others, which had no relation to theſe, they were not meddled with during this reign, or at leaſt, but ſlightly. The reaſon is, becauſe Henry would never ſuffer his ſubjects to go greater lengths than himſelf: but, to ſpeak the truth, his underſtanding was always directed by his intereſt. If all the changes made in religion in his reign be examined, they will be found to concur directly to eſtabliſh a deſpotic authority over his ſubjects: that was ever the principal, and perhaps the ſole motive of his proceedings immediately on his perceiving the rupture with Rome to be ſo admirable a method to attain ſuch power. Hence the enemies of the reformation take occaſion to ſay, it was eſtabliſhed in England on political views: this may be true, if the perſon of Henry VIII be only conſidered; but it follows not that they who promoted and imbraced it acted on the like motive. Beſide, what was the reformation in Henry VIII's days? Only a bare renouncing the Pontifical power, while thoſe were burned who would have carried it farther: ſo, let what will be ſaid of Henry's perſon, and his motives to throw off the Papal yoke, I cannot perceive that the Proteſtants are abundantly obligated to undertake his defenſe.

Henry, finding that many of his ſubjects approved not his conduct, would have been very glad to take from them the pretenſe they uſed, of the ſentence publiſhed againſt him by the Pope. To this purpoſe, he would have ingaged all France to join with him in procuring a revocation: but that method was impracticable, and a reconciliation with the court of Rome no leſs ſo. He could never have reſolved to part with the title of Head of the Church of England, and the Pope would never have conſented to any accommodation except matters were reſtored to their ancient ſtate; ſo Henry, ſeeing himſelf conſtrained to purſue his point, reſolved by violence to overcome the obſtinacy of ſuch of his ſubjects as refuſed to ſubmit to the laws lately inacted. But on the other hand, deſiring to purge himſelf of the imputation of Hereſy, wherewith he was charged, he affected to puniſh with extreme ſeverity thoſe who imbraced the new opinion: in this ſort of medium, which pleaſed neither party, he paſſed the reſidue of his days. But this is ſaying too little: it muſt be farther added, that, conſidering himſelf as a pattern for his ſubjects, he conſtrained them to keep within the ſame bounds, and would not ſuffer them to believe more or leſs than himſelf.

Henry VIII. An' 1535.

It was impoſſible that, after ſuch a reſolution, Henry ſhould not live in a continual miſtruſt of his ſubjects, which obliged him to have always his eye on what paſſed in the kingdom. Moreover, he had likewiſe to guard againſt attacks from the Emperor, by whom he was loudly menaced. He was very ſenſible, that were he once ingaged in a war, thoſe who dared not look him in the face during his proſperity, would not ſcruple declaring againſt him, if his arms were unſucceſsful. The King of Scotland his nephew was the perſon moſt to be feared. As for the King of France, who profeſſed himſelf his friend, and indeed owed him many obligations, he had ſo evidently manifeſted the ſelfiſhneſs of his friendſhip, that he could not on him repoſe much confidence. They both intended to imbroil the Emperor, but with different views. Each deſigned to make his ally ſubſervient to his own particular ends, and to improve the advantages which ſhould flow from this union. Thus Henry ſaw no reſourſe but in his own ſubjects, among whom however there were many malecontents: but as he had long deported himſelf moſt magiſterially, he found if he relaxed on this occaſion, it would certainly be aſcribed either to his ſcruples, or to a ſenſe of his weakneſs, than which nothing could be more to his detriment. This conſideration, joined to his ſtern and haughty diſpoſition, rendered him altogether untractable: he thenceforward became fierce, cruel, inſenſible of his peoples calamities, and executing without mercy the laws dictated by himſelf to his parliament. In ſhort, he may in ſome manner be ſaid to be no longer the ſame Prince who had hitherto ſwayed the Engliſh ſcepter. All can be alledged in his juſtification is, that he was often provoked by perſons who, indeavoring to alienate the hearts of his ſubjects, attacked him in the moſt ſenſible part, becauſe his whole reliance was on the aſſiſtance of his people.

Reaſon of the great ſubmiſſion of the Engliſh to Henry.

It will doubtleſs, be ſurpriſing to ſee in this reign the Engliſh ſo patient and ſubmiſſive to their Sovereign's pleaſure, that we ſcarce find, from the begining of the divorce affair, that the parliament refuſed him any one thing, tho' ſome of his demands were very extraordinary: but the reaſon is eaſily to be comprehended. Religion was the ſole cauſe. Henry, as was obſerved, kept a ſort of medium with reſpect to religion: but as none could believe it poſſible for him to remain long in that ſituation, thoſe who deſired a reformation, imagined they could not do better than comply with him in all things, to induce him to advance it by degrees. In like manner, the friends of the old creed, ſeeing ſuch beginings, were apprehenſive he would advance, and their oppoſition but make him finiſh his work the ſooner: and ſo the reſult of both parties thus ſtriving to gain him to their intereſt was, the procuring him a far more extenſive authority than any of his predeceſſors had ever injoyed, and which he could not have uſurped in any other circumſtances, without hazarding his ruin: but the two parties were alike deceived. Henry kept in the ſume medium the whole remainder of his life, and made them both feel the effects of that abſolute power they had ſo eaſily ſuffered him to aſſume. It is true, he was always ſo circumſpect as not to act contrary to law: but he imployed his authority to procure ſuch laws as he pleaſed, and then executed them moſt unmercifully, as will too frequently be ſeen in the ſequel: but, having thus laid open King Henry's character, and the motives which induced him to act, we muſt alſo recite his actions, which will confirm what has been advanced.

The monks become odious to the King.

Tho' the act concerning the King's marriage, and the Papal power bore the ſeal of public authority, they were very far from being univerſally approved. As they were not aſcribed ſo much to the two houſes as to the King, on him it was the whole blame was caſt. Of all the male-contents, the monks were thoſe who took moſt care to diſtinguiſh themſelves by their open attempts to blacken him in the eyes of his people. They could not digeſt his having ſet himſelf up in the room of his Holineſs, whom they had always conſidered, and ſtill did conſider as their true Sovereign, notwithſtanding the ſtatutes made againſt him. Theſe were the perſons who induced the pretended Kentiſh propheteſs to affirm, "That if the King put away Queen "Catherine, and re-married, he ſhould not ſurvive "it a month; and his end ſhould be tragical." A Franciſcan, named Peto (1), preaching before the King (2), was ſo audacious as to tell him to his face, "That God's judgments were ready to fall "upon his head: that he was always ſurrounded "with a croud of lying prophets, who foretold "him good ſucceſs. But for himſelf, like another "Micaiah, he warned him that the dogs ſhould "lick his blood, as they had done Ahab's." The fryer's inſolence, and the daily reports of the invectives which were every where ſpread againſt him, provoked him extremely againſt them, as well as againſt thoſe who had the boldneſs to ſpeak opprobriouſly of the acts of parliament. He was however very patient for ſome time, imagining theſe turbulent ſpirits would at length be calmed: but when he found they ceaſed not aſperſing him with the groſſeſt of calumnies, he called a council to conſider how he ſhould behave towards thoſe who affected to contradict his laws, and calumniate himſelf. Some of the council were for his winking at all offenſes of this kind, leſt any exceſs of rigor ſhould have a quite contrary effect to what he deſired (3): but others repreſented to him the ill conſequence of ſuch connivance. They ſhewed him, that the driſt of theſe men was to ſtir up the people againſt him, to give the biſhop of Rome opportunity to aſſert his pretended authority, and therefore they were for puting the laws in execution with the utmoſt ſeverity. Of this opinion was alſo Henry himſelf, as moſt agreeable to his fierce and ſtern temper, which could not bear contradiction: beſide, he foreſaw the event, if his enemies ſucceeded in their deſign to render him odious to his people; it is not therefore much to be wondered at, conſidering his provocations, that he reſolved to treat with rigor perſons who, to the utmoſt extent of their ability, labored to effect his ruin.

Priors and monks executed with ſome Proteſtants. Hall. Stow. Burnet. Strype. Hollingſh. Fox.

The reſolution being taken of executing the laws without mercy, certain priors, monks, and others, who had been too free with the new ſtatutes, were apprehended, tried, convicted and executed, according to the utmoſt rigor of the ſame laws (4): but at the ſame time Henry, apprehenſive leſt this ſeverity ſhould be aſcribed to the inclination he was charged with for the new religion, affected to uſe the ſame rigor to thoſe who had openly imbraced the reformation, and put them to death with the others. Next, to keep all people in awe by an example which ſhould make the boldeſt tremble, he reſolved to deliver up to the rigor of the law, Fiſher and More, then priſoners in the Tower (5). To this end, Fiſher was required to take the oath of ſupremacy, it being ſuppoſed he would refuſe it, as was indeed the caſe. About the ſame time, Paul III actually confered a cardinalate on this prelate, tho' he had declared, that were a cardinal's hat laid at his feet, he would not ſtoop to take it up. But his Sanctity, whoſe aim was to incourage ſuch as oppoſed King Henry, failed not exalting him to that dignity, with this pompous elogy; "That he conſidered him as the cardinal of car-"dinals." This unſeaſonable honor did, very probably, accelerate the fate of this biſhop, who, being condemned, was executed the twenty-ſecond of June, a month after his being created cardinal, and ſome days before the hat, ſent him by his Holineſs, reached London (6). After that, ſir Thomas More, being required to take the ſame oath, refuſed to anſwer, ſaying, "The act of parliament "is like a ſword with two edges, for if a man an-"ſwer one way, it will deſtroy the ſoul, and if he "anſwer another, it will deſtroy the body." On his refuſal he was condemned and executed. He was a man of great learning, and excellent parts, but ſo addicted to jeſting, that even the preſenſe of death could not make him lay aſide his uſual facetiouſneſs (7). When, on the point of being executed, having laid his head on the block to receive the mortal blow, he perceived his beard was got under his chin: whereupon, haſtily riſing up, he bid

The King bore Peto's inſolence patiently; but, to undeceive the people, procured doctor Curwin to preach the next Sunday, who juſtified the King's proceedings, and condemned Peto, as a rebel, a ſlanderer, a dog, and a traitor. Peto was gone to Canterbury, but Elſton, another fryer of the ſame houſe, interrupted him, and ſaid, "He was one of the lying Prophets, who ſought by adultery to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion to the crown." Paul III excommunicates Henry without publiſhing the bull. Herbert. Burnet.

While theſe things paſſed in England, Pope Paul III ſtill kept ſome correſpondence with ſir Gregory Caſſali, who was at Rome, tho' without character. That Pontif paſſionately wiſhed, that ſome expedient might be found to heal the breach made by Clement VII's too great precipitation, and confered from time to time with Caſſali: but when he underſtood that thoſe monks, Fiſher and More had been executed for denying the King's ſupremacy, he deſpaired of ſucceeding. He perceived no farther ceremony was requiſite on his part, ſince all regard for him was thrown off in England, and a ſettled deſign ſhewn of maintaining what had been done: ſo, in order to ſupport the honor of his See, he drew up a thundering bull, excommunicating Henry, and abſolving his ſubjects from their oath of allegiance: moreover, he injoined all the eccleſiaſtics to depart his dominions, and the nobility to take arms againſt him. He put the kingdom under interdict, and prohibited all Chriſtians to have any commerce with the Engliſh. He annulled all the treaties made by foreign Princes with Henry before his marriage with Ann Boleyn, declaring their iſſue already born, or to be born, illegitimate. Mean while, as he was ſenſible theſe ſpiritual thunders would not produce any great effect if not ſupported by temporal arms, which were not yet ready, he defered the publication of this bull to a more convenient ſeaſon.

Embaſſy to the Proteſtants of Germany. Herbert. Burnet. Vol. III. p. 111. Strype.

But tho' the bull was not publiſhed, as no great care was taken to conceal it, it ſoon reached the ears of King Henry, who thereupon reſolved to join with the Proteſtants of Germany (2), and find Charles imployment in thoſe quarters. He therefore diſpatched Edward Fox to the league of Smalcald, while King Francis ſent on a like errand Guillaume du Bellay baron de Langeais: but it was very difficult for a good and hearty union to be formed between theſe two Monarchs and the German Proteſtants. The views of thoſe Proteſtants tended only to preſerve the liberty of profeſſing their religion unmoleſted, whereas the ſole aim of Francis and Henry was to excite them againſt the Emperor, without any regard to the reformed religion, which in their reſpective realms they were perſecuting. It is true, to gain the Proteſtants, they feigned ſome inclination for their creed, and a deſire to eſtabliſh it in their dominions: nay Henry very much improved the conformity of his ſentiments with theirs concerning the Papal authority; but the rigor wherewith theſe two Monarchs treated ſuch of their ſubjects as had imbraced the new religion, deſtroyed whatever their embaſſadors could ſay, and for this reaſon the Proteſtants conſtantly inſiſted on ſettling the points which concerned religion, and continued to require that Henry ſhould openly declare for the Augſburg confeſſion, that their union might be grounded on a ſolid foundation. Henry feigned to approve of what they propoſed, and, to gain with them the greater credit, wiſhed them to ſend ſome of their divines to confer with thoſe of England: but he never really intended to conform himſelf to their notions; he rather wanted the Germans as well as the Engliſh to learn of him what they were to believe, and for this cauſe the project of the propoſed union was never put in execution. However, this negociation failed not giving great uneaſineſs to the Pope and Charles, who plainly ſaw that, in attacking Henry there was danger of ingaging him actually to join the league of Smalcald.

Henry VIII. An' 1535.

But Henry depended not ſo much on foreign aſſiſtance as on his own ſtrength. Mean while, as his ſubjects were daily corrupted by the monks, who inſinuated to them, that he was haſtening utterly to ſubvert the Catholic religion, he reſolved to take all poſſible precautions to fruſtrate the pernicious deſigns of theſe dangerous adverſaries. To this end, he had it moved in council, whether it would not be proper to ſuppreſs at once all the monaſteries. This queſtion was debated with great warmth, by reaſon of the two contrary parties in the council. Cranmer and Cromwell looked on the ſuppreſſion of all monaſteries as a grand ſtep towards a reformation. But, on the other hand, the duke of Norfolk, the biſhops of Wincheſter, Lincoln and others, who had with reluctance ſubſcribed to what had been done againſt the Pope, could not reſolve on conſenting to this ſuppreſſion. They were very ſenſible, after that, the kingdom would be irrecoverably loſt to the Pope, without reckoning that the diſſolution of monaſteries might produce yet greater effects with regard to religion. Henry, having heard the arguments on both ſides, found he ſhould not be able to ſuppreſs the monaſteries all at once, without giving offenſe to the majority of his ſubjects; and ſo reſolved with himſelf to do it gradually, and therefore to begin with a thing abſolutely neceſſary, namely, to remove peoples prepoſſeſſion in favor of the monks. To this end, he ordered a general viſitation of the monaſteries, to know perfectly the titles of their revenues, the behavior of the fryers and nuns, how the rules of each order were obſerved, and other matters of a like nature. He queſtioned not this viſitation would diſcover ſeveral conſiderable abuſes which, being made public, would ſenſibly diminiſh peoples veneration for the religious, and pave a way to his deſign. He was highly exaſperated againſt the monks, whom he conſidered as the greateſt diſturbers of his repoſe. On the other hand, undoubtedly the hope of profiting by their eſtates did not a little contribute towards his puſhing this affair with great earneſtneſs (3). Thomas Cromwell was choſen to manage this inquiry, by the name of viſitor-general. This choice was a plain indication of Henry's intent, ſince he imployed a perſon who was utterly averſe to the monks. Cromwell, having appointed ſubſtitutes or commiſſioners, gave them very particular inſtructions under eighty-ſix articles; and the viſitation began in October. It

(1) On the firſt of July, ſir Thomas More was brought to his tryal, and beheaded on the ſixth, in the fifty-third year of his age. Tho' he was afterwards ſuperſtitiouſly devoted to the intereſt and paſſions of the Popiſh clergy, and even aſſiſted them in all their cruelties, yet in his youth he had freer thoughts of things, as appears by his Utopia, where he ſeems to borrow the diſguiſe of a romance, only to declare his mind with greater freedom: he tells us, the Utopians allow liberty of conſcience, and force not their religion on any; that they hinder none from a ſober inquiry into truth, nor uſe any violence on the account of a different belief. His peculiar excellency in writing was, that he had a natural eaſy expreſſion, and preſented all the opinions of Popery, with their fair ſide to the reader, diſguiſing the black ſide of them with neat art; and had on all occaſions great ſtore of pleaſant tales, which he applied wittily enough. But for juſtice, contempt of riches, humility, and a true generoſity of mind, he was an example to the age in which he lived. HENRY VIII. AN' 1535.

may be eaſily judged that, among ſo great a number of monaſteries as were in the kingdom, moſt of which had never been viſited but very negligently, many were found abounding with irregularities, as well in reſpect of the fryers and nuns behavior, as in obſervance of rules and management of the temporalities. The viſitors, who were not their friends, and doubtleſs had orders to frighten them, failed not giving out, that they were on the brink of being expoſed to his Majeſty's utmoſt ſeverity, and the rigor of the law. Then, they ſuggeſted to them, that to ſave themſelves harmleſs, and withal to hide their diſorders, the beſt way was to reſign their houſes to the King (1), who on that conſideration, would take care to provide for each in particular. A good number of priors, being terrified by the viſitors, choſe to follow their advice, their monks agreeing to it, ſome to avoid puniſhment, others to injoy their liberty, and ſome for want of reſolution to reſiſt (2). The reports of the commiſſioners were publiſhed, that all might be ſatisfied the King had not without reaſon and neceſſity ordered this general viſitation. The truth is, in ſome monaſteries were diſcovered monſtrous diſorders and horrible crimes, not only with reſpect to the debaucheries of the fryers and nuns, but chiefly on account of images and relicts, for which a ſhameful trade was driven to inrich the monaſteries, by cheriſhing peoples ſuperſtition (3). This occaſioned an ordinance of the King, who, as ſupreme head of the church of England, diſcharged from their vows ſuch as were profeſſed under the age of twenty-four years, and allowed all the reſt to quit their houſes, and live like ſeculars, if they pleaſed (4): but as the majority of them had been inured to a life of idleneſs, and perceived, when they forſook their monaſteries, they ſhould be forced to work for their livelihood, the liberty given them by the King produced no great effect; beſide, there were doubtleſs many who, out of conſcience, thought not proper to uſe it: ſo Henry was obliged to take other meaſures.

Henry tries to perſuade the King of Scotland to renounce the Pope. Buchanan. Herbert.

Among all the King's enemies, or enviers, none gave him more uneaſineſs than his nephew the King of Scotland, and not without reaſon. During the whole time of that Prince's minority, Henry had fomented the troubles of Scotland, and even ſhewn that his deſigns tended towards poſſeſſing himſelf of that kingdom. James was thereof fully informed; and tho' he expreſſed a very great regard for the King his uncle, he however let him ſee he did not conſider him as a friend. Henry was therefore in danger that, if the innovations in religion cauſed diſturbances in the kingdom, the King of Scotland would take occaſion to be revenged, by aſſiſting the male-contents. This apprehenſion was by ſo much the juſter, as the Emperor, no ſtranger to the Scotiſh King's diſpoſition, had already labored to inſpire him with ſuſpicions and jealouſies of France and England: nay, as has been obſerved, he would have concluded with him a league, had not Francis broken his meaſures, by procuring a peace between England and Scotland; yet, notwithſtanding this peace, Henry was always in diſtruſt of that quarter, wherefore, to make himſelf eaſy, he formed the project of inſpiring his nephew with the reſolution to follow his example, and renounce the Pontifical obedience. He conſidered this as a ſure means to preſerve between the two kingdoms a ſtrict union, which would be to Henry extremely advantageous in his then ſituation. He wrote therefore a long letter, declaring the reaſons of his conduct with regard to the Pope; and afterwards he diſpatched an embaſſador to propoſe an interview: fancying that a conference with him would produce a greater effect than whatever he ſhould ſay to him by letter or embaſſy. Nevertheleſs, tho' the reformation had already made its way into Scotland, James had no inclination to imbrace it; ſo the eccleſiaſtics about his perſon eaſily diſſuaded him from accepting the interview, whereat they apprehended ſome matters might occur not very advantageous to their religion. Mean while, James, not being willing openly to refuſe the conference deſired by the King his uncle, gave him hope of his conſent, after the removal of certain difficulties, which were purpoſely ſtarted: but, at the ſame time, demanded of the Pope a brief, to forbid his having any interview with the King of England. When the brief came, he thereof gave notice to the King his uncle, who having prepared for his journey was highly offended at his refuſal. Hence aroſe between them a quarrel, which I ſhall have occaſion to mention hereafter.

James excuſes himſelf on account of the Pope's prohibition.

Before I conclude the year 1535, I muſt not omit relating a certain event which extremely altered the countenance of affairs in Europe: I mean the death of Franceſco Sforza, duke of Milan, which happened in the month of October. As this Prince left no iſſue by Catherine of Denmark the Emperor's niece, whom he had eſpouſed not long before, the duchy of Milan, as fief of the Empire, devolved to Charles, to be diſpoſed of as he pleaſed: ſo the fears and jealouſies of the Pope, King of France, and Venetians were revived on this occaſion; each of theſe Potentates having cauſe to fear the Emperor would keep Milan for himſelf, or give it to his brother the King of the Romans. In that caſe, Italy would of courſe fall again into ſlavery, and the King of France loſe his hopes of recovering that duchy. To make them eaſy, Charles declared he had no deſign to keep Milan,

(3) They found great factions in the houſes, and barbarous cruelties exerciſed by one faction againſt another, as either of them prevailed. They were all extremely addicted to idolatry and ſuperſtition. In ſome they found the inſtruments and other tools for multiplying and coining. But for the lewdneſs of the confeſſors of nunneries, and the great corruption of that ſtate, whole houſes being found almoſt all with child; for the diſſoluteneſs of abbots, and the other monks and fryers, not only with harlots but married women; and for their unnatural luſts and other brutiſh practiſes: Theſe (ſays Burnet, Vol. I. p. 191.) are not fit to be ſpoken of, much leſs inlarged on in a work of this nature. The full report of this viſitation is loſt; yet Burnet ſaw an extract of a part of it concerning one hundred forty-four houſes, which contains abominations in it equal to any in Sodom.

An' 1536. Death of Queen Catherine. Herbert. Stow. Burnet.

Queen Catherine ended her days the begining of the year 1536 (2). Tho' her virtue had gained her univerſal eſteem, ſhe died however little lamented by the public, becauſe ſhe equally imbaraſſed her friends and enemies. Before ſhe expired, ſhe dictated a very tender letter to the King, who ſeemed to be extremely moved with it (3): but, in all appearance, his grief was of no long continuance. He was very fond of her when firſt married, her mild and modeſt deportment having a greater influence on him than ſhe could expect from her beauty, which was far from being extraordinary. In time, his affection abating, he treated her with indifference, tho' ever with much civility. At length, after he had reſolved to put her away, her obſtinate refuſal to comply with his will made him conſider her as his enemy. Accordingly he uſed her rigorouſly when the ſentence of divorce was pronounced, even to the not ſuffering her to keep ſervants who treated her as Queen: at leaſt, he forbid her aſſuming that title publicly, tho' he found himſelf obliged to connive at her diſobedience.

Parliament meets.

The parliament meeting the fourth of February, finiſhed the work begun, by aboliſhing whatever related to the Pontifical power, not to leave the leaſt pretenſe to acknowledge his Sanctity's authority. But Henry had a farther view, namely, to ſuppreſs the monaſteries, as well to be revenged on the monks and prevent their evil deſigns, as to poſſeſs himſelf of their eſtates. In all appearance, the late viſitation of monaſteries had convinced him that the monks were as unſerviceable to religion as prejudicial to his affairs in his preſent circumſtances.

Reaſons of altering the eccleſiaſtical conſtitutions.

As among the conſtitutions obſerved in the church of England, there were not a few which had a manifeſt relation to the Papal authority, it was abſolutely neceſſary to annull them and make others which ſhould have for foundation the King's ſupremacy. The parliament had already paſſed an act, impowering King Henry to nominate thirty-two commiſſioners to examine ſuch as were to be aboliſhed: but the King had not haſtened this nomination, becauſe by this confuſion his authority was conſiderably more extenſive. Indeed, the Pontifical power was aboliſhed by act of parliament, and yet it ſtill ſubſiſted in the conſtitutions, which, not being abrogated, threw the clergy into great perplexities, becauſe they knew not how to proceed. But this was what Henry deſired, that the eccleſiaſtics might be more at his devotion, ſince he could equally proſecute them as guilty, whether they did or did not obſerve them. The parliament taking this contrariety into conſideration, would have cured it by confirming the power formerly given the King to appoint commiſſioners to alter theſe conſtitutions. This was a ſort of reproach for his negligence in that reſpect: but he feigned not to mind it, and left the affair in the ſame ſtate it was (4).

Act for ſuppreſſing the leſſer monaſteries. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 575.

He had another thing in his thoughts which affected him much more, namely, to execute his deſign upon the monks. In this ſeſſion, he repreſented to the parliament, that the great number of monaſteries in the kingdom were a burden to the ſtate, and earneſtly deſired them to remedy the evil by ſuch means as they ſhould judge proper. Whereupon it was inacted, That all religious houſes of two hundred pounds per annum and under, ſhould be ſuppreſſed, and their effects given to the King (5). Of this ſort there were three hundred ſeventy-ſix, and a yearly revenue of thirty-two thouſand pounds fell to the crown, with more than a hundred thouſand pounds worth of plate, furniture, church-ornaments, and the like. A new court was erected, named the Court of the Augmentations of the King's Revenue, which was to take cognizance of all matters concerning this new acquiſition. The erecting a court for ſo ſmall a revenue, was a clear evidence the King had no deſign to ſtop there, but intended to ſeize the revenues of every monaſtery in the Kingdom.

Reſolution to let the people have the Bible in Engliſh. Burnet.

The convocation ſiting, as uſual, at the ſame time with the parliament, it was there moved, that there ſhould be a tranſlation of the Bible in Engliſh *, and the motion was approved. It muſt be obſerved, the King's intent was only to ſhew his people, there was nothing repugnant to Scripture in what was done againſt the Pope. But Cranmer, Cromwell, and others of the reformers had much farther views. They hoped, when the Bible was in every hand, people would ſee their error in many other matters which hitherto had been deemed eſſential to religion: but they took care to hide their deſigns from the King, knowing how contrary they were to his. Henry was abſolutely againſt all reformation of doctrine, and conſequently they were to bring him inſenſibly and by degrees to what they deſired. They partly ſucceeded, but they fell extremely ſhort of what they had at firſt expected. However, they thought it very conſiderable to obtain his conſent that it ſhould be moved in the convocation to give the people the Bible in Engliſh, and to have cauſed the motion to be approved. As there was then no other Engliſh verſion of the Bible but Tindal's, made at Antwerp without

She was a devout and pious Princeſs, and led a ſevere life. The parliament diſſolved Burnet.

Henry having obtained of the parliament all he deſired, thought it time to diſſolve it, which he did the fourteenth of April, after having continued it ſix years. Never had parliament held ſo long ſince the monarchy began.

The care Henry took to ſecure himſelf from the cabals of the monks, and his other domeſtic enemies, prevented him not from being attentive to his foreign affairs, and ſtudying means to avoid the Emperor's attacks. Francis was invading Savoy, and it was but too manifeſt that his intent was to open a paſſage into the Milaneſe: but as this was a very grand enterpriſe, conſidering the then ſituation of France, the Emperor could not believe he had ingaged in it without being firſt ſure of Henry's aſſiſtance; wherefore he reſolved to imploy his beſt indeavors to break their union. From the death of Sforza, he had continued a private negociation with Francis, to reſign the duchy of Milan to one of his ſons, and acted therein with ſuch addreſs that the treaty ſeemed to be very near a concluſion. This could not but inſpire Henry with jealouſy. He was ſenſible that, if the negociation ended to the ſatisfaction of Francis, that Prince would not abundantly regard his intereſts.

On the other hand, Charles no ſooner heard of the death of his aunt Queen Catherine, but he offered Henry to renew their alliance, with a mutual oblivion of whatever had paſſed between them: but leſt he ſhould be taken at his word, he required three conditions, which left him the liberty to prolong the affair as much as he pleaſed, his aim being only to ſow diviſion between Francis and Henry, by making them ſuſpicious of each other. The firſt of theſe conditions was; that Henry ſhould be reconciled to the Pope, to which end he offered his mediation. By the ſecond, he demanded a powerful aſſiſtance againſt the Turks. By the third, that, purſuant to their treaty in 1518, he ſhould join with him in the defenſe of Milan, againſt the attacks of the French King. Henry replied; that with regard to what had been done againſt the Pope, there was no revocation: that as ſoon as Chriſtendom ſhould be in peace, he would act againſt the Infidels as became a Chriſtian Prince: that he was ready to renew his alliance with the Emperor, provided it was done without prejudice to the King of France his ally; that being friend of both, he might be better inabled to labor their reconciliation, or if he could not ſucceed, to aſſiſt him who ſhould be unjuſtly attacked: that as to the reſt, he refuſed not to agree with his Imperial Majeſty, provided he would own the rupture came from him. The Emperor perceiving Henry was on his guard, thought not fit to puſh this affair any farther. Indeed Henry could eaſily ſee his aim was to ſet him at variance with France, ſince in this very interim, Francis imparted to him the private negociation concerning the duchy of Milan: moreover he warned him, that Charles deſigned to force him to return to the Pope's obedience, and it was only on that condition he offered to reſign the Milaneſe.

Henry is for ſiding with the league of Smalcald. Sleidan. Herbert. Burnet.

All theſe proceedings of the Emperor convincing Henry that he ſought occaſion to attack him, he reſolved to purſue his negociation with the Proteſtants of Germany, to make in that country a diverſion, which ſhould break his meaſures with regard to England. To this end, he had ſent Edward Fox to them laſt year: but they would not be his dupes, not imagining, as he would fain have made them believe, that he was inclined to their creed, while he cauſed their brethren to be burned in England. So, to prevent their being, merely by faint hopes, ingaged to be ſubſervient to his deſigns at their expenſe, they delivered to his embaſſador the terms on which they were willing to enter with him into a ſtrict union. The terms were; that he ſhould imbrace the Augſburg confeſſion, and defend it with all his power in a free council: that he ſhould approve of no place for holding the council without their conſent: that if the Pope called a council at his own pleaſure, Henry ſhould join with them in proteſting againſt it: that he ſhould accept the title of Protector of the league: that he ſhould never return to the Pope's obedience: that he ſhould not aſſiſt their enemies: that he ſhould find a hundred thouſand crowns for the occaſions of the league, and two hundred thouſand if the war laſted any time. Laſtly, they added, that when he ſhould have declared himſelf on theſe articles, they would ſend embaſſadors and agree with him upon the reſt.

He is imbaraſſed on that account.

Theſe propoſals threw Henry into ſome perplexity. He ſaw, the ſole aim of the Proteſtants was to ſupport their religion; yet this was what gave him the leaſt diſquiet. He was by no means ſatisfied with the Augſburg confeſſion, and yet he perceived, in caſe he openly rejected it, there was no likelihood of his being able to join with the league of Smalcald. On the other hand, it was his intereſt to continue this negociation, as well becauſe the Proteſtants might be ſerviceable to him, as to keep the Emperor in awe by that conſideration; ſo his intereſt required that he ſhould favorably hear theſe propoſitions: but withal he reſolved to inſert in his anſwer ſomething which ſhould afford him occaſion to break, if he thought proper. He replied therefore; that he was willing to furniſh the ſums required, in caſe a league, of which he would treat with their embaſſadors, ſhould be concluded between him and the Proteſtants: that tho' he was ſenſible to what the title of Protector of the league would expoſe him, he was content to accept it, provided there were between him and them a conformity of doctrine, otherwiſe he could not ingage to defend a faith of whoſe truth he was not convinced; that therefore he deſired them to ſend commiſſioners, with powers to mitigate ſome articles of the Augſburg confeſſion, which he could not approve. Moreover as to the ſupplies, he required that the ingagement ſhould be mutual, whether he or they were attacked: finally, he demanded their formal and authentic approbation of his divorce, and their promiſe to juſtify its validity in a council. The propoſals on both ſides were of a nature to keep a treaty long on foot: but, tho' the members of the Smalcald league ſaw no great likelihood of a ſtrict union, they however appointed Sturminus, Draco, Bucer, and Melanćthon to go and confer with Henry and his divines. It was eſpecially provided in their inſtructions, that nothing ſhould be concluded to the prejudice of the Emperor or Empire. This negociation was interrupted by the death of Ann Boleyn, which happened ſhortly after, and which very much altered the face of affairs, as well as the King's mind in reſpect to the reformation which ſhe openly countenanced.

ons; a violent love for Jane Seymour, maid of honor to the Queen, and a moſt exceſſive jealouſy of his wife. Very likely, the latter was a conſequence of the former. When Ann Boleyn's enemies found ſhe had loſt that place which ſhe once poſſeſſed in the King's heart, far from being afraid to accuſe her of unfaithfulneſs to her royal conſort, they believed they ſhould rather do a pleaſure to her ſaid conſort (who began to be himſelf unfaithful) if they furniſhed him with ſuch pretext as might authoriſe his change. It is certain Henry no longer bore his Queen that affection which made him ſurmount ſo many obſtacles to poſſeſs her; whether injoyment had quenched this firſt flame, or her indiſcretions given him room for ſuſpicion, he ſo gave himſelf over to jealouſy, that it was not in his power to overcome it; or perhaps he never much indeavored it. However this may have been, the fact ſtands thus: Queen Ann held a very friendly correſpondence with lord Rochford her brother, but could not indure his wife, who lived very ill with her huſband, and had a moſt ſcandalous character, as in the ſequel will evidently appear. It was this lady who whiſpered in Henry's ear the firſt report of Queen Ann's being unfaithful to him, and particularly of her holding a criminal converſation with her own brother lord Rochford. Theſe ſeeds fell on a ſoil not unprepared to receive them. Henry, already prejudiced by his paſſion for Jane Seymour, was overjoyed to find, in the Queen's pretended unfaithfulneſs, a means to attain poſſeſſion of her he loved. As ſoon as Queen Ann's enemies ſaw how the King ſtood affected towards her, they took care to ruin her quite in his favor, by accuſing her of ſundry intrigues with her domeſtics. Theſe enemies were the ſame with thoſe of the reformation. They imagined, ſhe had put King Henry upon all his proceedings againſt the Pope, on purpoſe to favor the new religion: but, even had ſhe not done this, it was ſufficient to make them hate her that ſhe had been the cauſe, by inſpiring the King with love, ſince that had occaſioned Catherine's divorce, and conſequently all the innovations in religion. Policy might alſo bear ſome part in their ſcheme. They were very ſenſible that, while Queen Ann lived, ſhe would be an invincible obſtacle to a reconciliation with Rome, whereas if ſhe no longer exiſted, they were in hopes that all obſtructions would be remedied without much difficulty. The duke of Norfolk inwardly burned with a deſire to ſee religion re-eſtabliſhed on the ſame footing it was before theſe alterations, tho' like a good courtier, he took great care not to diſcover it to his maſter. His quality, zeal and credit had made him head of the old religion's partiſans; and, as he had the King's ear, he could eaſily do ill offices to the adverſe party. The King's jealouſy of his Queen was a too fair occaſion to be neglected, ſince he could at once ſerve the faction he would favor, and make his court to his Sovereign; ſo the common opinion is, that this nobleman contributed moſt to Queen Ann's ruin becauſe, of all her adverſaries, he had moſt acceſs to the King: but, be it by him or by others, King Henry was ſome how inſpired with a jealouſy which threw him into a ſort of fury; neither is this much to be wondered at, conſidering his temper, the moſt impetuous and moſt impatient ever known in any. In ſhort, Ann was charged with holding a criminal correſpondence not only with lord Rochford her brother, but alſo with Norris, Weſton, Brereton, and Smeton, her domeſtics (1). It muſt be acknowledged, ſhe had ſome indiſcrete ways, which the King never regarded while he was not prejudiced, but which, ſince his prepoſſeſſion, were but too ſufficient to confirm his ſuſpicions: beſide, as ſoon as he gave ear to what was ſaid againſt her, there is very great appearance that her adverſaries became extremely diligent in giving ſiniſter turns to even the moſt innocent of her words and actions. Henry was undoubtedly tormented with jealouſy ſome time before he divulged it: but finally the flame took vent at a turnament ſolemniſed at Greenwich, whence he ſuddenly withdrew with tokens of exceſſive anger, whereof none could divine the occaſion. Seemingly, he had obſerved ſomething which confirmed his ſuſpicions, of which none but himſelf took notice. Sanders ſays, the Queen droping her handkerchief, one of her gallants took it up and wiped his face with it: but that writer is the only perſon who mentions this circumſtance. However this be, no ſooner had Henry left the juſts, but he ordered lord Rochford, Norris, Weſton, Brereton and Smeton to be arreſted; and at the ſame time Queen Ann was put under confinement in her chamber, and next day conveyed to the Tower: but what demonſtrably evidenced the deſign of her enemies to deſtroy her, was their procuring orders for the archbiſhop of Canterbury to retire to his palace at Lambeth, for fear, if he could ſpeak with the King, he would find occaſion to ſay ſomewhat effectual in her juſtification.

It is not ſurpriſing that this Princeſs, under ſuch circumſtances, ſhould be confuſed, and, having none to adviſe with, fall into the ſnares laid by her enemies. Her uncle's wife, lady Boleyn, with whom ſhe was greatly at variance, was appointed to lie in her chamber: and from this lady, who was placed there to watch her, it came to be known that, during her confinement, ſhe uttered certain expreſſions which helped to confirm Henry's ſuſpicions. However, on her examination, ſhe poſitively denied her ever having been falſe to her royal conſort: only, when ſhe was told that Norris, Weſton, Brereton and Smeton had accuſed her, tho' ſhe might have eaſily ſeen it was purely to draw from her ſome confeſſion; ſhe believed ſhe ought not to conceal certain things which had paſſed between her and them. She ſaid concerning Norris, that aſking him one day, why he did not go on with his marriage; he replied, there was no haſte: whereupon ſhe ſaid, ſhe plainly ſaw he was in hopes of having her, in caſe the King died. This ſeems to argue there was ſome familiarity between her and Norris: otherwiſe, admiting the fact to be true, it is hard to conceive that a Queen ſhould think of talking thus to one of her domeſtics.

liberty to tell her, he loved her, and that ſhe thereupon bid him defiance (1).

But, after all, the queſtion is to know, whether the regiſters whence this examination is taken are authentic, or whether the examination was impartially written. Indeed, this doubt alone is not ſufficient to clear the Queen: but then, when it is conſidered ſhe had for adverſary a huſband who was Sovereign, and jealous even to madneſs, very likely, they who were imployed to examine her gave her words ſuch a turn and ſenſe as favored the King's deſigns, by pretending to ſet down the ſubſtance of her anſwers inſtead of her genuine words.

Depoſition of the complices. Idem. and Vol. III. 118.

When the other four perſons were examined, Norris ſwore, he believed the Queen innocent, and perſiſted in his aſſeveration to his lateſt breath. Smeton confeſſed, he had thrice known the Queen carnally; but he was never confronted with her: nay, he was condemned before her trial, that he might not be a witneſs. This makes very much for the Queen, ſince it is not likely ſuch evidence would have been voluntarily neglected, had it been deemed as good as it appears to be: but, very ſeemingly, it was feared Smeton would retract, or the Queen confound him if brought face to face with her. The reſt pleaded not guilty; but were however condemned and executed.

She is condemned with lord Rochford. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh. Burnet. Herbert.

Three days after, the Queen and lord Rochford, her brother, were tried by their peers, the duke of Norfolk being lord high-ſteward for that occaſion. The Queen was accuſed of proſtituting herſelf to her brother and four other men, and conſpiring the King's death: but this laſt charge being without any foundation, it was not thought proper to inſiſt on it. The Queen and lord Rochford pleaded not guilty, and yet were condemned without its being ever known on what evidence the ſentence was grounded. Judgment was given, that lord Rochford ſhould be beheaded and quartered. As for the Queen, ſhe was condemned to be burned alive, or beheaded, at the King's pleaſure.

Remarks on the ſentence.

There is abundance of probability that King Henry believed the Queen guilty, and, under his then prepoſſeſſion, ſigns and tokens were to him as good proofs. But can the ſame be ſaid of the peers who condemned her? Did their conſcience permit them to condemn a Queen to death on bare ſurmiſes? I ſay ſurmiſes, ſince had there been ſolid proofs, they would very likely have been publiſhed, in order to juſtify a ſentence of this nature, which was unprecedented in England. Such reſerve was not afterwards uſed with reſpect to another of Henry's Queens, who was really guilty of the like crime. All can be urged in favor of thoſe who paſſed ſentence on Ann Boleyn is, that their dread of turning againſt themſelves the King's fury, if they complied not with his humor, led them to conſider appearances as real proofs. It is obſervable, only twenty-ſix peers were preſent at the trial, tho' there were then fifty-three in England, as appears by the ſummons to parliament directed to them very ſoon after. This gives occaſion to conjecture that, according to the method introduced by Wolſey in the duke of Buckingham's condemnation, care was taken to remove thoſe who were ſuſpected not to have ſo much complaiſance as to gratify the King's paſſion at the expenſe of their conſcience. As for Dr. Burnet's ſaying, in his hiſtory, that Ann Boleyn's father was among her judges, it is well known he retracted it afterwards.

The ſentence was executed the nineteenth of May. Ann ſuffered death with great conſtancy, after a ſhort ſpeech to thoſe preſent, wherein ſhe neither confeſſed nor denied the crime for which ſhe was condemned. She contented herſelf with acknowledging her obligations to the King, with praying for him, and deſiring the peoples prayers for herſelf (2). It is generally believed, that her dread of drawing King Henry's anger on her daughter Elizabeth, prevented her from inſiſting on her own innocence. As ſhe was perfectly well acquainted with that Prince's diſpoſition, and could not vindicate herſelf without charging him with injuſtice, ſhe feared Elizabeth would become the ſacrifice of her royal father's reſentment. However, this was the tragical cataſtrophe of Ann Boleyn, whom ſome have vehemently defamed, and whoſe conduct others have as carefully juſtified, without any poſſibility of hitherto knowing for certain whether ſhe was guilty or innocent. The enemies to her daughter Elizabeth and the reformation have blackened her character as far as they were poſſibly able, imagining thereby to give a mortal wound to the Proteſtant religion. For a contrary reaſon, the Proteſtants have forgot nothing might conduce to give of her a quite different idea. But both have reaſoned on a falſe principle, ſince the goodneſs of a religion depends not on the life and converſation of the profeſſors. For my part, if I may deliver my own private opinion, I can never believe the peers her judges had ſufficient evi

(2) Her behavior the day ſhe died will beſt appear from the following original letter of ſir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower, to Cromwell.

SIR,

"THIS ſhall be to advertiſe you, that I have received your letter, wherein you would have ſtrangers conveyed out of the "Tower; and ſo they be, by the means of Richard Greſham, and William Loke, and Withepole. But the number of "ſtrangers paſt not thirty, and not many hothe [other.] And the embaſſador of the Emperor had a ſervant there, and honeſtly "put out: ſir, if we have not an hour certain, as it may be known in London, I think here will be but few, and I think a "reaſonable number were beſt, for I ſuppoſe ſhe will declare herſelf to be a good woman for all men but for the King, at the "hour of her death. For this morning ſhe ſent for me, that I might be with her at ſuch time as ſhe received the good Lord, "to the intent I ſhould hear her ſpeak as touching her innocency always to be clear. And in the writing of this ſhe ſent for "me, and at my coming ſhe ſaid; Mr. Kingſton, I hear I ſhall not die afore noon, and I am very ſorry therefore, for I thought "to be dead by this time, and paſt my pain. I told her, it ſhould be no pain, it was ſo little. And then ſhe ſaid, I heard "ſay the executioner was very good, and I have a little neck, and put her hands about it, laughing heartily. I have ſeen many "men and alſo women executed, and that they have been in great ſorrow, and to my knowledge this lady has much joy and "pleaſure in death. Sir, her Almoner is continually with her, and had been ſince two o'clock after midnight. This is the "effect of any thing that is here at this time, and thus fare you well."

She was beheaded a little before noon, on the green within the Tower. There were preſent the dukes of Suffolk and Richmond, the lord chancellor Audley, and ſecretary Cromwell, with the lord mayor, the ſheriffs and aldermen of London. Her head was cut off by the hangman of Calais, as being more expert at his buſineſs than any in England: her eyes and lips were obſerved to move, after her head was cut off, as Spelman writes. Her body was thrown into a common cheſt of elm made to put arrows in, and was buried in the chapel within the Tower before twelve. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 203. Hall, fol. 227. Stow. Strype.

dence to condemn her as guilty of defiling the bed of her royal conſort: nevertheleſs, it cannot be denied that, by certain familiarities little becoming a Queen, ſhe gave her adverſaries too much advantage over her. As ſhe was young and beautiful, ſhe doubtleſs was not diſpleaſed at ſeeing the effect of her charms on all ſorts of men, imagining that the love wherewith ſhe inſpired them greatly inhanced her merit: we ſee too many females obnoxious to this infirmity. However this may be, certain it is that the ſpirit of party has not a little contributed to the diverſity of ſentiments concerning this Queen: had ſhe not countenanced the reformation, ſhe would have undoubtedly fewer calumniators among the Catholics; and had ſhe led the King to perſecute the reformed, not many of theſe would undertake her juſtification. Thus goes the world: people are innocent or culpable according to the party they are of. But beſide this general cauſe, a particular reaſon may alſo be found in the carriage of Ann Boleyn: ſhe was of a very gay temper, which had charmed the King, but which, after ſome years of injoyment, ſerved only to raiſe his jealouſy. On the other hand, it cannot be denied, ſhe had very good qualities, and was in particular exceedingly charitable to the poor, among whom, a few days before her diſgrace, ſhe had diſtributed two thouſand pounds (1). A circumſtance in the ſtory of her death evidences her being likewiſe very tender-conſcienced: after her condemnation, ſhe fell on her knees to lady Boleyn, her ſiſter-in-law (2), and conjured her, for God's ſake, to tell Princeſs Mary, ſhe begged pardon for the rigors ſhe had ſhewed her. This charity, and this tenderneſs of conſcience would little become a woman who ſhould have had a ſhameful and criminal commerce with four men and her own brother; but they would not be very inconſiſtent with great indiſcretion and a little coquetry.

Henry nulls his marriage with Ann Boleyn. Hall. Herbert. p. 195, Burnet. Strype.

Notwithſtanding Henry had got his Queen condemned, he was not yet ſatisfied. He thought fit, before her death, to give her a freſh mortification, by annulling their marriage. To this end, he cauſed her to be ſifted ſo many different ways, that ſhe finally acknowledged a previous contract between her and Percy, newly become earl of Northumberland, tho' that noble peer proteſted, on his ſalvation, there never had been between them any formal promiſe of marriage. This confeſſion was ſuppoſed drawn from her, by intimations that the King would on no other condition be prevailed with to mitigate that cruel part of her ſentence of being burned alive, into that milder one of being beheaded. However this be, on her ſaid confeſſion, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was conſtrained to paſs a ſentence of divorce between the King and her, and declare their daughter Elizabeth illegitimate. What is moſt ſtrange in King Henry's procedure, is the artifice he uſed in cauſing the Queen to be condemned before her marriage was nulled. Had the ſentence of divorce been paſſed before the trial, ſhe could not have been condemned for adultery, ſince her marriage with the King muſt have been conſidered only as a concubinage: but Henry had acquired over his ſubjects a ſway ſo deſpotic, that juſtice and law were no longer meaſured out but according to his will and pleaſure: nay, he ſo little regarded the public and his own reputation, that he eſpouſed Jane Seymour the very day after Ann Boleyn's execution, wherein he expreſſed a paſſion which ſerved greatly to juſtify the deceaſed Queen.

The King marries Jane Seymour. Hall. Stow. Burnet.

Henry VIII. An' 1536.

The death of Ann Boleyn revived the hopes of Mary, the King's daughter by his firſt wife Catherine. Her attachment to the Queen her mother, and her obſtinate refuſal to ſubmit to the late acts of parliament, had quite thrown her out of favor with the King, who could not bear contradiction: but the late event inducing the friends of Rome to imagine Henry might be reconciled to his Holineſs, they adviſed Mary to temporiſe, for fear of their loſing the fruit this change might produce. As nothing now obſtructed King Henry's union with the Emperor, it was hoped the act which declared her illegitimate might be repealed, in caſe ſhe ſubmited to her royal father. To this end, ſhe reſolved to write a very humble and reſpectful letter to the King, proteſting for the future ſhe would have no other ſentiments but his: but Henry, not ſatisfied with a ſubmiſſion expreſſed in ſuch general terms, inſiſted, before he reſtored her to favor, on her ſigning certain articles which ſhe had hitherto rejected; namely, the ſupremacy, the renunciation of the biſhop of Rome, and the unlawfulneſs of her mother's marriage. Mary tried all poſſible means to be excuſed: but at length, finding the King remained inflexible, ſhe ſigned them, tho' contrary to her opinion, in hopes that the evil ſhe commited in acting againſt her conſcience, might be productive of much good (3). As for Princeſs Elizabeth, then about three years old, ſhe was diveſted of the title of Princeſs of Wales, which ſhe had injoyed from her birth: nevertheleſs Henry ſtill continued to educate her at court with a paternal care, not failing on all occaſions to expreſs for her a ſingular regard and tenderneſs.

Princeſs Mary reconciled to the King. Herbert. Burnet. Burnet. Herbert. Strype.

A new parliament meeting the eighth of June, an act paſſed to ſettle the ſucceſſion, that made after the marriage being void by the ſentence of divorce between the King and Ann Boleyn. By this new act the other was repealed, and the iſſue of the King's two firſt marriages declared illegitimate, and diſabled from ever inheriting the crown: moreover the act confirmed Ann Boleyn's ſentence as being grounded on moſt juſt and equitable cauſes and ſettled the crown, after King Henry's deceaſe, on the iſſue of Queen Jane, or of any other Queen whom he might afterwards eſpouſe. Finally, they inveſted his Majeſty with full power to declare the ſucceſſion to the crown, either by his letters patent under the great ſeal, or by his laſt will ſigned with his hand, and declared traytors thoſe who ſhould maintain the lawfulneſs of his former marriages. Hence it may be eaſily gueſſed with what abſolute ſway Henry then ruled, ſince, without any examination, the parliament approved all his actions, and granted him even more than he deſired, by giving him power to ſettle the order of his ſucceſſors. It was thereby in the King's power to replace Mary and Elizabeth in ſuch order as he pleaſed, or exclude them intirely. This is clear evidence, that the parliament had not juſtice and equity ſo much in view as pleaſing this King.

When Paul III heard of Ann Boleyn's death, he entertained hopes of a revocation of what had been done in England. close with any expedients which should be judged convenient to procure a good agreement between the King and him. But Henry, who some few years before would have done much to obtain the Pontif's favor, was no longer in that sentiment. Nothing was capable of inducing him to dispossess himself of the authority acquired over the ecclesiastics, as well as over the rest of his subjects, and which rendered his power more extensive than he at first expected. On the contrary, intirely to destroy his Beatitude's hopes, he caused the parliament, by two new acts, to confirm whatever had been done against the Papal power. By the first, all persons were to incur the penalties of a Præmunire who attempted restoring in England the bishop of Rome's authority; and all magistrates were strictly injoined, under severe penalties, to punish those who should dare to violate this statute. The second nulled and abolished all dispensations, immunities and privileges flowing from the court of Rome, saving to the archbishop of Canterbury the power of confirming what should not be contrary to the law of God, or common decency (1).

Statute against the Pope. Burnet. Statut. c. 10.

c. 16.

In this session two considerable acts were also passed, but which related not to religion. By the first, it was forbid, under rigorous penalties, to marry in the next degrees of the blood-royal, without the King's license first had: this was made on account of Thomas Howard, the duke of Norfolk's brother, to whom Margaret Douglass, the King's niece, had plighted her faith, without acquainting the King her uncle: Henry, offended at their boldness, sent them both to the Tower, and to prevent the like for the future, procured this act. By the second it was provided, that all parliamentary usurpations on the prerogative royal, before the King was twenty-four years of age, might be repealed by letters patent under the great seal. Thus both houses of parliament imployed their whole authority to give the Sovereign a power which his predecessors had never injoyed, as if for that purpose only they had been assembled.

The clergy approve of the King's late divorce. Burnet.

But it was not solely with regard to civil government, that the bounds of the royal authority were inlarged. The clergy, unwilling to yield to the parliament in that point, used the like indeavors to become agreeable to his Majesty, by approving all his proceedings.

The convocation being met at the same time, confirmed the sentence of the invalidity of King Henry's marriage with Ann Boleyn, on the same ground which had served to procure it, namely, a pre-contract with lord Percy, tho' it was upon oath denied by that nobleman.

Complaints against the reformers. Burnet.

Some few days after, the lower house of convocation sent to the upper house sixty-seven opinions, which they judged worthy to be condemned; and at the same time the deputies made great complaints against those who were for making innovations in religion. These complaints were leveled at Cranmer, Cromwell, Shaxton, Latimer, and some others who were noted as heads or promoters of the reformation, tho' they were not named (2). Care was taken to mix with these sixty-seven opinions, mostly drawn from the doctrine of the Lutherans, several tenets of the old Lollards and the Anabaptists, to insinuate, that those who were complained of imbraced them all alike. The enemies of the reformers hoped to make them forfeit the favor of King Henry, who affected a great rigor against such as were termed heretics. Since Ann Boleyn's execution, they scarce doubted that all whom she had loved or protected would share in her ruin: but they were disappointed in their expectations. Cranmer and Cromwell were never more in the King's favor; and presently after Henry gave Cromwell a fresh mark of his esteem, by constituting him his vicegerent in all ecclesiastical matters: so, the convocation's complaints, instead of being prejudicial to the reformation, or reformers, seem rather to have increased the credit of those two chiefs of the party. Of this their adversaries were speedily convinced, when it appeared that they had persuaded the King to advance the reformation, by retrenching, in the public-worship, such ceremonies as were not founded on the word of God. This resolution taken, Henry told the convocation, he wished them to examine those ceremonies, that such as were useless might be retrenched.

Cromwell made vicegerent. Herbert. Stow. Hollingsh.

But those who were against the reformation had a much greater cause to be alarmed when, some days after, Cromwell brought into the upper house of convocation articles drawn by himself, containing sundry alterations in the doctrines, with orders to examine them, and report the result of their debates to his Majesty. Then it was that the two parties openly divided, one to promote, and the other to oppose, the reformation. Cranmer was at the head of the first, being supported by Goodrich bishop of Ely, Shaxton of Sarum, Latimer of Worcester, Fox of Hereford, Hilsey of Rochester, Barlow of St. David's. Lee archbishop of York, was chief of the second; and with him were Stokesly bishop of London, Tonstal of Durham, Gardiner of Winchester, Longland of Lincoln, Sherburn of Chichester, Nix of Norwich (3), Kite of Carlisle. These, who were private favorers of the Pontif's interest, still hoping a reconciliation with Rome, strenuously opposed all innovations, for fear the breach should become wider: but this party lay under a great disadvantage, as Cromwell and Cranmer, who had the King's ear, suggested to him, that most of the abuses which they desired to be abolished, directly tended to support the Pope's usurpations. Finally, after many debates, the convocation agreed on certain articles which were digested in form of constitutions, whereof this is the substance.

I. The holy Scriptures are laid down as the foundation of faith, jointly with the three creeds, the Apostles, the Nicene, and the Athanasian, and the four first general councils.

II. In the second is established the necessity of baptism, which likewise forbids its being repeated.

III. In the third, the necessity of penance was owned, consisting of contrition, auricular confession, and amendment of life.

IV. The fourth establishes, as a fundamental doctrine, the real presence of Christ's body in the eucharist (4).

V. In the fifth it is said, that justification is attained by regeneration, which consists of contrition, faith, and charity.

VI. It is appointed in the sixth, that images should stand in the churches, but that in incensing, kneeling, and offering to them people should not do it to the image, but to God and his honor.

VII. In the seventh, saints are to be honored, but without believing at their hands are to be obtained ſuch things as belong only to God to beſtow.

VIII. In the eighth, ſaints are to be prayed to, provided it be done without ſuperſtition: the days ſet apart for their memories are to be obſerved, except his Majeſty pleaſes to retrench their number; which if he does, it muſt be obeyed.

IX. The ceremonies uſed in the church are to be retained, as the veſtments of prieſts, holy-water, holy-bread, bearing candles on Candlemas-day, giving aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, bearing palms on Palm-Sunday, creeping to the croſs on Good-Friday, and kiſſing it, hallowing the font, and other exorciſms and benedictions.

X. The tenth declares it good to pray for the dead, but that it is neceſſary to correct the abuſes advanced under the pretenſe of purgatory, the Pope's pardons, maſſes ſaid in certain places, or before certain images: in fine, that ſince the ſtate and place of ſouls after death are unknown, they ought to be recommended, in general terms only, to God's mercy.

The King approves them.

Theſe conſtitutions, being preſented to the King, who corrected them in ſeveral places (1), were ſigned by Cromwell, Cranmer, ſeventeen biſhops, forty abbots and priors, and fifty archdeacons and proctors of the lower houſe of convocation, among whom was Polydore Virgil, author of a hiſtory of England, publiſhed afterwards by the King's order. Their publication occaſioned great variety of cenſures. Thoſe who wiſhed a reformation had gained ſome ground, with reſpect to images and purgatory, but chiefly in that Scripture was made the ſtandard of faith, becauſe they hoped from that principle to draw one day very great conſequences: but the determinations concerning auricular confeſſion, and the real preſenſe of Chriſt's body in the euchariſt, troubled them extremely. Not only were theſe articles directly contrary to their ſentiments, but they ſaw how difficult it would be to meddle with them again, by reaſon of the prepoſſeſſion of Henry who believed them inconteſtable. The adverſe party were in a terrible conſternation, at finding tenets ſo long ſince determined brought under examination, the Papal authority aboliſhed, and the exiſtence of purgatory called in queſtion. Thus theſe conſtitutions pleaſed neither party: the one thought the reformers had acted too faintly, in not advancing the reformation, and could not forbear blaming their compliance, in ſuffering doctrines ſo repugnant to truth to be eſtabliſhed: but it was replied, that all could not be effected at once, and that it would have been imprudent obſtinately to require that errors whereof the people were not yet ſenſible ſhould be retrenched ſuddenly. Their adverſaries were very angry alſo with the biſhops, for ſo baſely abandoning truths imbraced for ſo many ages by the Catholic church: but, in reality, it was not in the power of either party to act otherwiſe. The King himſelf managed the whole, having ſettled in his cabinet-council what he thought fit to alter, reject or retain: but there was not any in this council who durſt directly contradict his opinion, or who judged it adviſeable to be any way obſtinate in diſagreeing from him in ſentiment, for fear a too ſtrenuous oppoſition ſhould produce a quite contrary effect; all could be done was, gently and inſenſibly, to indeavor illuminating the mind of their Sovereign, without attempting peremptorily to bring him, by a ſort of compulſion, to what was deemed reaſonable.

Opinions of the two parties on theſe articles. Burnet.

Before the convocation diſſolved, Henry communicated to both houſes a ſummons he had received to a council, which was to aſſemble at Mantoua. His Holineſs, without conſulting him, had called this council in concert with the Emperor, and was to preſide by his legates: ſo Henry might well expect to loſe his cauſe before ſuch a council, had he been ſo unwiſe as to ſubmit to its deciſions. Indeed, he had appealed from the Pope to a general council; but there were many queries to be reſolved, in order to know whether this called at Mantoua was legitimate and corroborated by ſufficient authority. Mean while, before he anſwered the ſummons, he thought fit to adviſe with his eccleſiaſtics, who, after mature deliberation, preſented him a writing to this effect, viz. That a true and legal general council was a very excellent method to preſerve the peace and union of the church; but, before a council was called, it was neceſſary to conſider; firſt, who had authority to call it: ſecondly, whether the reaſons for calling it were weighty: thirdly, who ſhould aſſiſt as judges: fourthly, what ſhould be the order of proceeding: fifthly, what doctrines were to be diſcuſſed. Then, it was declared that neither the Pope nor any Prince in the world had power to call a general council, without conſent of all the Sovereigns in Chriſtendom. Purſuant to this declaration, Henry publiſhed a proteſtation againſt the council which was to meet at Mantoua, ſpeaking very plainly and freely of his Sanctity's deſigns and conduct. He concluded with ſaying, that he could not conſider as free and general a council, where the biſhop of Rome ſhould preſide, which ſhould aſſemble in a ſuſpected place, and which muſt be compoſed only of a ſmall number of prelates, 'till the war between the Emperor and France was concluded.

The eighteenth of July, the parliament was prorogued, after a ſeſſion of only forty days, wherein however ſeveral important acts were paſſed.

The parliament prorogued.

At this time, cardinal Pole was in high repute for his learning and eloquence. His name was De la Pole, but every where except in England he is ſo well known by that of Polus, that he cannot, without danger of confounding readers, be named otherwiſe *. He was deſcended of Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, and favorite of Richard II. From that time, this family had been continually advanced, ſo that in the reign of Henry VI, the earl of Suffolk was honored with the title of duke. After that, a lord of this ſame family married a daughter of the duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. Of this marriage was born, among other children, Reginald de la Pole, or Polus, the cardinal I am ſpeaking of, who conſequently was the King's couſin (2). Being a younger brother, he was deſigned for the church, for which alſo his natural indowments and qualifications rendered him extremely proper. In his younger years, he made ſuch extraordinary progreſs in all the ſciences, that Henry intending to raiſe him to the higheſt dignities of the church, confered on him the deanery of Exeter, with ſeveral other benefices, that he might go abroad and finiſh his ſtudies. He went firſt to Paris, where he continued ſeveral years, and forfeited, in ſome meaſure, the King's favor, for refuſing to concur with his agents in procuring the determina-

* He means not Engliſh readers.

(1) The King did not correct the ingroſſed and ſigned articles, as M. Rapin, and others have been led to imagine, by miſunderſtanding Burnet's words, in his Vol. I. p. 217. For his meaning was, (as he explains it in Vol. III. p. 123.) that there are ſeveral draughts of theſe articles which are in many places corrected by the King's own hand, ſome of which corrections are long and very material. Of theſe he ſpake, and not of the ingroſſed articles ſigned by the convocation.

(2) This is one of the greateſt miſtakes, concerning families, M. Rapin has made. Cardinal Pole was no way related to De la Pole duke of Suffolk. The cardinal's father, ſir Richard Pole, knight of the garter, was a native of Wales, and married Margaret daughter of the duke of Clarence.

tions of the French univerſities in the divorce affair. He nevertheleſs returned to England, where he aſſiſted, as dean of Exeter, at the convocation which acknowledged the King ſupreme head of the church of England (1) : there is even reaſon to preſume he was not of the number of thoſe who oppoſed this new title, becauſe he held his ſaid deanery ſeven years after. At length he traveled into Italy, and reſided ſome time at Padoua, where he contracted a friendſhip with Bembo, Sadoletti, and other celebrated wits. The reputation he acquired in that country made Henry deſirous to recall him, intending to reward his univerſally-acknowledged merit : but Pole ſtill found ſome pretext to decline complying with the King's deſire. Finally, perceiving delays could prevail no longer, he was forced to write to the King the true reaſon of his refuſal, which was, he could not approve either of this divorce or ſeparatioa from the apoſtolic See. Henry, who was extremely deſirous to gain him, ſent him a writing, containing his apology, and the reaſons of his proceedings againſt the Pope. Pole thereupon wrote his book De Unitate Eccleſiaſticâ, in which he takes the liberty to ſpeak of the King in very offenſive terms, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar, and exhorting the Emperor and other Potentates to turn their arms againſt him : neither was he ſatisfied with ſending him his book in manuſcript, but he even cauſed it to be printed and publiſhed (2). Henry inſenſed, as may be eaſily ſuppoſed, at ſuch a violent and diſreſpectful behavior, tried to decoy him over to England, by writing to him, how much he eſteemed his book, deſiring him withal to come and explain verbally certain difficult paſſages, Pole took care not to be thus inſnared : ſo Henry, finding this artifice took not effect, diveſted him of all his dignities, the loſs whereof was amply repaired by the Pope and Emperor. Some time after, he was rewarded with a cardinal's hat. He thereby became ſtill more attached to the Pope's intereſt, and a greater enemy to the King, who, not being able to reach his perſon, made his family and kindred feel the effects of his indignation.

Suppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries. Burnet. Vol. I. Coll. p. 143.

The ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries, inacted in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, was not executed 'till Auguſt, tho' the commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe had received their inſtructions in April: very probably, Henry deſired to ſee the iſſue of the next ſeſſion, before they proceeded. As their report was ſuppreſſed in the reign of Queen Mary, it cannot poſitively be ſaid what it contained. Thus much is certain, the adherents of the Pope and the old religion accuſed them of commiting numberleſs extortions and robberies, and of making falſe reports of what they diſcovered in this viſitation, in order to extenuate the horror conceived of their violent oppreſſions. This may be partly true: nay, it is not unlikely that theſe men, either from a deſire to make their court to the King, or from a greedineſs to inrich themſelves, exceeded their inſtructions. On the other hand, it is alſo probable, their accuſers highly agravated the crimes laid to their charge. However this be, vaſt numbers of people were extremely diſpleaſed at the ſuppreſſion of ſo many religious houſes, which were held in high veneration. All the fryers of theſe ſuppreſſed houſes who wiſhed to become ſeculars, had a diſpenſation from the King, and the reſt were removed to the larger monaſteries, which were untouched. The churches and cloiſters were demoliſhed, and the materials ſold to the King's profit.

Abundance of people diſcontented. Burnet.

It may be eaſily judged the monks ſpared no pains to excite the people to rebel. They found it the more eaſy, as great diſcontents reigned every where. The nobility and gentry took it extremely ill, that the King ſhould have the lands of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries, moſt part whereof were founded by their anceſtors : beſide, they were deprived of the conveniency of providing for their younger children, when they had too many, and of lodging, as they traveled, in theſe houſes, where they were always well entertained. The poor murmured ſtill louder, becauſe multitudes lived by the alms which were daily diſtributed in theſe houſes. In ſhort, the devout bigots thought the ſouls of their anceſtors muſt now lie in purgatory, ſince ſo many maſſes which were ſaid for their deliverance were aboliſhed by ſuppreſſing the monaſteries.

The diſorders of the ſuppreſſed houſes publiſhed, Burnet.

The court informed of theſe murmurs, indeavored to compoſe them, by publiſhing the diſorders diſcovered in theſe houſes : but this availed not. Beſide that theſe reports were thought greatly agravated, it was ſaid, why were not theſe abuſes ſeverely puniſhed and reformed, without deſtroying whole houſes for ever? At length, Cromwell found a certain expedient in ſome meaſure to aſſuage theſe diſguſts, by counſeling King Henry to ſell the lands of thoſe ſuppreſſed monaſteries at very eaſy rates, and oblige the purchaſers, under ſevere penalties, to keep up the wonted hoſpitality (3). But this expedient ſufficed not intirely to appeaſe peoples murmurs, tho' the King ſtrove to give them ſatisfaction by re-indowing thirty one of theſe houſes.

The King ſells their lands at eaſy rates.

Injunctions laid on the eccleſiaſtics. Hall. Burnet. Herbert. p. 204.

While people were in this fermentation, King Henry, in the vicegerent's name, publiſhed ſome injunctions to regulate the behavior of perſons in holy orders, many of whom led very irregular lives. Theſe injunctions contained nothing but what had been ordained by diverſe ſynods, and yet the eccleſiaſtics were extremely offended, becauſe they could not bear the thoughts of being ſubject to the orders of the vicegerent, by whom, they ſaid, they were going to be inſlaved abundantly more than by the Pope. Thus the inferior clergy, the monks and the bigots, being equally concerned in what already was, and in what, very ſeemingly, would ſtill be done, inſpired thoſe on whom they had any influence with a ſpirit of rebellion which failed not of ſoon having its effects.

Inſurrection in Lincolnſhire. Herbert. Burnet. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The firſt riſing was in Lincolnſhire (4), where doctor Mackerel, prior of Barlings, drew after him a great multitude of the populace, whom he headed under the appellation of captain Cobler. The commiſſioners, as was but juſt, paid all the debts of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries: but when relics happened to be pawned, it ſeems they refuſed to redeem them. they acknowledged his ſupremacy, and were content he ſhould injoy all tenths and firſt-fruits of the livings, but withal prayed him to adviſe with his nobility concerning the redreſs of their grievances. This was indirectly taxing the King with following the counſels of Thomas Cromwell, who was of a very baſe and mean extraction. Theſe grievances were, "That he had ſuppreſſed a great number of "monaſteries: that large ſubſidies had been granted by parliament without any occaſion: that he "admited into his council perſons of mean birth, "whoſe ſole view was to inrich themſelves, inſtead "of conſulting the good of the ſtate: that diverſe "prelates had relinquiſhed the ancient creed, and "imbraced novel doctrines, at all times condemned by the church: that having ſeen ſo many religious houſes plundered, they were apprehenſive "the like would befall the churches."

King Henry's manifeſto. Hall. fol. 229. Burnet. Speed.

The King anſwered theſe grievances by a very ample manifeſto (1): but, as his reaſons were grounded on principles not admited by the male-contents, the manifeſto had no great effect. Mean while, Henry found himſelf extremely imbaraſſed; his troops were few, and he had certain advice that a like inſurrection was gathering in Yorkſhire and other neighboring counties. He however ordered the duke of Suffolk to march, tho' with a very ſlender force, and attempt obſtructing the rebels progreſs: but the duke, finding himſelf too weak, thought it more adviſable to indeavor appeaſing the commotion by way of negociation than by arms; ſo when he ſent to the male-contents the King's anſwer to their grievances, he took occaſion to let them know, they needed not to deſpair of pardon. Thereupon ſome of their chiefs privately ſent him word, they had joined the rebels purely to reclaim them, wherein they hoped to ſucceed, provided the King would be pleaſed to grant them a general amneſty. The duke diſliked not this overture, which furniſhed him with a good opportunity of writing to the King, and ſolliciting him in their behalf, offering however to march againſt the rebels, if commanded. At the ſame time, Henry received intelligence that thoſe of Yorkſhire were in arms; and, as he feared the others would join them, he ſpeedily iſſued out a proclamation, granting abſolute pardon to all who ſhould return to their homes. The proclamation ſucceeded according to expectation: the rebels inſtantly diſperſed, and thereby freed Henry from great perplexity. Some however choſe rather to join the Yorkſhire rebels than accept the amneſty.

A more dangerous rebellion in Yorkſhire. Hall. Stow. Herbert.

The Yorkſhire inſurrection was conſiderably more dangerous than that of Lincolnſhire. This latter ſeemed to have been accidental and ſudden. The other was in purſuance of a ſettled deſign, wherein were concerned ſeveral perſons of note, who, in order to declare, waited only 'till they were ſomewhat better informed of the nation's general diſpoſition. One Robert Aſke, a man of good judgment, headed the male-contents of thoſe quarters, where the diſtance of the court, and the neighborhood of Scotland rendered the people bolder than elſewhere, beſide that the monks had ever been in more credit in thoſe northern counties than in any other part of the kingdom. Since July, Aſke had tried to gain lord Dacres, who had amuſed him ſome time with hopes that his negociation would ſucceed. Very ſeemingly, it was this nobleman who ſent King Henry the firſt notice of this conſpiracy. At length the male-contents took arms, and aſſembled in very great multitudes, towards the cloſe of Auguſt, ſoon after the Lincolnſhire rebellion broke out. Finding themſelves ſtrong enough, they would not ſuffer the nobility and gentry to remain neuter at home, but conſtrained them either to flee, or join with them, and ſwear fidelity to the cauſe for which they intended to fight. This cauſe was properly religion, as they plainly intimated by the crucifixes in their banners (2): beſide, they re-eſtabliſhed the monks in ſome of the ſuppreſſed monaſteries. As they met with no oppoſition, becauſe the King's forces were imployed againſt the rebels of Lincolnſhire, they made great progreſs at firſt, and ſtill much greater, after Richmondſhire, Lancaſhire, the biſhoprick of Durham, and the county of Weſtmorland ingaged on their ſide. George Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, was the only perſon who ventured to take arms for the King, without being commiſſioned ſo to do, tho' he was not ignorant that, at ſuch a juncture, his procedure might be miſinterpreted: but, as his meaning was good, he hoped the King would forgive a fault commited purely for his ſervice; and in effect, it was not long before King Henry ſent him a commiſſion, conſtituting him his lieutenant againſt the rebels. At the ſame time, he ordered the duke of Suffolk not to ſtir from Lincolnſhire, leſt the male-contents there ſhould think of joining thoſe of the north. He likewiſe gave commiſſions to diverſe other peers to levy troops, while on his part he aſſembled as many as poſſible, in order to form an army, the command whereof he deſigned for the duke of Norfolk: but, either thro' the peoples backwardneſs, or for ſome other reaſon, the royal army was not ſufficiently numerous to make head againſt the revolters.

While King Henry was making his preparations, Aſke neglected not his own affairs. He approached Pontefract caſtle, wherein were the archbiſhop of York and Thomas lord Darcy, and forced them to ſurrender that fortreſs. As theſe two grandees were deemed well-affected to his Holineſs, many believed them not diſpleaſed the want of proviſions furniſhed them with a pretenſe to deliver Pontefract to the rebels, and march with them in their other expeditions. Soon after, Aſke took alſo York and Hull, and by fair or foul means obliged all the nobility of the country to join his army (3). Thus this affair grew daily more important, and the court became apprehenſive that the whole kingdom would follow the northern counties example. This apprehenſion was the more juſt, as at the ſame time there were in all parts men who made it their buſi-

(2) Their march was called the Pilgrimage of Grace, and to inveigle the people, ſome prieſts marched before them with croſſes. In their banners they had a crucifix with the five wounds and a chalice, and every one wore on his ſleeve as a badge, an emblem of the five wounds of Chriſt, with the name of Jeſus wrought in the midſt. All who joined them took an oath, "That they "entered into this Pilgrimage of Grace, for the love of God, preſervation of the King's perſon and iſſue, purifying the "nobility, and driving away all baſe-born and evil counſellors; and for no particular profit of their own, nor to do diſpleaſure "to any, nor to kill any for envy, but to take before them the croſs of Chriſt, his faith, the reſtitution of the church, and the "ſuppreſſion of heretics, and their opinions." The King tries to amuſe the rebels.

Mean while, Henry choſe to amuſe the rebels, 'till his army was ready. The twentieth of October, he ſent a herald with a proclamation to be read to the troops. Aſke gave the herald audience, ſiting in ſtate with the archbiſhop on one hand, and lord Darcy on the other: but when he heard the contents of Henry's proclamation, he ſent him away without ſuffering him to perform his errand. Henry, finding this matter took a very bad turn, diſpatched the duke of Norfolk with what troops he had aſſembled, which were to be joined by thoſe under command of the earl of Shrewſbury, and ſome others levied in haſte by the marquis of Exeter: but theſe three ſmall bodies bore no proportion to the forces of the rebels: ſo Henry found himſelf obliged to publiſh a proclamation, commanding all his nobility to meet him the ſeventh of November *. During this, Aſke, at the head of thirty thouſand men, advanced towards Doncaſter, where the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Exeter, and the earl of Shrewſbury lay incamped with five thouſand men only, and having no other refuge but to defend the paſs of that river between the two armies: but as it was fordable in diverſe places, they undoubtedly muſt have been extremely imbaraſſed, had not a very great rain, which fell moſt ſeaſonably, made the river unpaſſable. This was certainly a very fortunate accident for the King: for had his troops been defeated on this occaſion, as was very probable conſidering their ſmall number, it would have done him unſpeakable damages.

Accident which prevents the royal army's defeat. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

I have already obſerved, that the duke of Norfolk approved not of the alterations made in religion; and therefore, it could not but be very diſagreeable to him to command the King's army againſt people who had taken arms in a cauſe which he could not diſlike. Mean while, he found himſelf in a moſt dangerous ſituation, ſince he was as much afraid of conquering as of being conquered. In the firſt caſe, a victory over the rebels would infallibly ruin the party he ſecretly favored. In the ſecond caſe, he ran the riſque of being ſuſpected by the King, and forfeiting his favor. Happily for him, his inability to hurt the rebels freed him from this imbaraſſment, by affording him a pretext to proceed with them by way of negociation. As he held intelligence with ſome of their leaders, he by their means ſo ordered that they determined on addreſſing his Majeſty with a moſt ſubmiſſive petition. This agreed on, they acquainted the duke with their reſolution, intreating him to ſecond it with his intereſt. The duke readily granted their requeſt; but told them, that to obtain from the King a favorable anſwer, there muſt be a ceſſation of arms, during which he took upon him to go himſelf and preſent their petition. This propoſal being accepted, the ceſſation was concluded, and the duke departed for London. At ſuch a juncture, this ceſſation was extremely advantageous to the King, becauſe his army being very weak, he wanted time to raiſe more forces. For this very cauſe, many of the rebels ſeeing that, contrary to all reaſon, the King had leiſure given him to aſſemble his troops, and imagining they were betrayed by their leaders, withdrew to their homes.

Sentiments and conduct of the duke of Norfolk.

A truce very advantageous to the King. Herbert.

This diſcord which began to ſpread among the rebels, gave the King ſome hopes of coming off upon eaſy terms; and therefore he delayed returning any anſwer to their petition, expecting their army would diſperſe by degrees: but the leaders at length perceiving that the court purpoſely prolonged the negociation, and that thoſe delays muſt utterly ruin their affairs, renewed their hoſtilities, and once more concluded on attacking the royal army. Had this reſolution been executed, it would, very probably, have greatly changed the face of affairs; but another prodigious ſtorm of rain ſo ſwelled the river which parted the two armies, that it was not poſſible for them to paſs it. Henry thereof having notice, judged it neceſſary to give them ſome kind of ſatisfaction, leſt they ſhould execute their reſolution before he was in readineſs. To this effect, he diſpatched away his anſwer to their petition; but it was couched under ſuch general terms, that they could not lay any ſtreſs on what was therein promiſed. At the ſame time, he propoſed, that if they would depute three hundred of their number, and ſend them to Doncaſter, commiſſioners ſhould there meet them in order to negociate a pacification. His aim was to gain time, in hopes the three hundred deputies would diſagree, and their diſſenſion, by prolonging the negociation, give him time to prepare his army. Some few days after, the duke of Norfolk returning to Doncaſter, ſent to inform the rebels, that he had brought them a general pardon, ten only excepted, ſix of whom were named, and four not. But this pardon was unanimouſly rejected, becauſe the ſix perſons named were ſome of their chiefs, and every one was in dread of being one of the four whom the King had reſerved: and, in reality, Henry had no other view but to ſow diſcord among them, and make way for the treaty at Doncaſter, which they finally accepted, and ſent thither their three hundred deputies (1). The court had expected theſe deputies would never agree about their demands, and ſo would afford the time wanted: but, as it was eaſy for the leaders to diſcover the court's intention, they gave the deputies their inſtructions in writing, whence abſolutely they were not to depart. The inſtructions contained ten demands, which the deputies made at the conference held at Doncaſter the ſixth of December.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1536.

As the deputies had not power to qualify theſe demands, ſo the King's commiſſioners were not authoriſed to grant them. Henry took care not to deſtroy in a moment the work of ſeveral years. Thus the conference ended without any fruit. The duke of Norfolk was extremely concerned to find the affair was like to be decided by arms. He moſt cordially wiſhed his Majeſty would grant the rebels all their demands, but was too well acquainted with his humor and character to venture on making him ſuch a propoſal. Mean while, he was not a little imbaraſſed. He muſt either betray his Sovereign's intereſt, or reſolve to fight the rebels, contrary to his own inclination, and with great danger of a defeat: at leaſt, he could not, purſuant to the court's intention, avoid prolonging the affair 'till the King was ready to march, and then he ſaw the ruin of the rebels was inevitable. In this perplexity, he choſe to write to the King, that the number of the rebels daily increaſing, there was danger of their making ſome attempt which it would be difficult to reſiſt; and therefore, to prevent the threatened miſchief, it was his opinion, if his Majeſty pleaſed, that ſome of their demands ſhould be granted. On this letter, the King impowered him to offer them a general pardon without exception, and promiſe them in his name, that the next parliament ſhould be held in the north: but withal, he ordered him not to make uſe of theſe remedies except in extremity, and when there was no other reſourſe. The duke receiving theſe powers, thought proper to uſe them without delay, ſince it was the ſole means of freeing him from his preſent imbaraſſment. He would not openly betray the King's intereſts, and, on the other hand, was moſt unwilling to be inſtrumental to the deſtruction of thoſe revolters whoſe ſentiments he approved, tho' he durſt not ſhew it: ſo, after having, by his correſpondents, prevailed with their leaders to comply with the King's offers, the agreement was concluded, and every man returned to his home, to the exceſſive grief and and reluctance of the monks and bigots, who had expected quite different matters from their efforts to excite the people to rebel. But this agreement hindered not the fryers and eccleſiaſtics of thoſe quarters from continuing to foment among the people a ſpirit of rebellion, which produced ſome effects, whereof notice ſhall be taken in the ſequel. Somewhat now muſt be ſaid of Charles V's affairs with the King of France, wherein all Europe was concerned.

Affairs between the Emperor and Francis.

Du Bellai. P. Daniel.

When, towards the cloſe of the preceding year, King Francis commenced the Savoyard war, the Emperor was in Sicily, on his return from his Tunis expedition, but unable to aſſiſt the duke of Savoy. This induced him to attempt cooling the King of France's ardor by a negociation, 'till he could aſſiſt his ally. The death of Franceſco Sforza, which occurred in this interim, furniſhed him with a fair opportunity. He intimated to the French embaſſador reſiding at his court, that he would not diſpoſe of the duchy of Milan, 'till he knew the King of France's ſentiments. Francis being thereof informed, demanded the duchy for his ſecond ſon the duke of Orleans, and the Emperor put him in hopes he would give it to his third ſon the duke of Angoulême, on certain conditions, which left it in his power to prolong the negociation as much as he pleaſed: and, in effect, he thus amuſed him 'till April 1536, one while inſiſting on the duke of Angoulême, another while ſeeming inclined to confer the Milaneſe on the duke of Orleans. Francis, willing to terminate this affair, and knowing the Emperor intended to go to Rome, ſent the cardinal of Lorrain for a poſitive anſwer; but leſt the events of the war ſhould bring ſome obſtacle to this negociation, he ordered admiral Brion, who commanded in Piedmont, to ceaſe hoſtilities.

Negociation about the duchy of Milan.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1536.

While the cardinal of Lorrain was on his journey, the Emperor arriving at Rome, went ſoon after to a public conſiſtory, which was aſſembled at his requeſt. There, before his Beatitude and the cardinals, he exclaimed againſt the King of France, affirming him to have been ſole author of the wars wherewith Europe was afflicted ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne. He thence took occaſion to ſay, that inſtead of ſheding ſo much innocent blood, it would be better to decide their quarrel by ſingle combat with ſword and poignard*, in ſome iſland, or in a boat. But the French embaſſador aſking him on the morrow, Whether he deſigned to challenge the King his maſter? he replied, He had no ſuch intention; only meaning, that the expedient he propoſed ſeemed to him more reaſonable than a war.

He prepares his forces.

Charles being, not long after, at Sienna, the cardinal of Lorrain waited on him, and in his audience diſcovered, that he had never deſigned to give the Milaneſe to a Prince of the royal family of France. He therefore wrote to the King, that he was to expect war: and, in effect, the Emperor was now aſſembling his whole ſtrength, propoſing to bring into the field three armies; one in Piedmont, which he intended to command perſonally; another in Picardy; and a third in Champagne. This was already ſo public, that Francis could not thereof be ignorant: wherefore judging that Charles's view was to make his moſt powerful effort in Picardy, he recalled the greateſt part of his army in Piedmont, having ordered Turin and his other conqueſts in that country to be well ſtored with ammunition.

Francis forms two armies.

The French quiting Piedmont, Charles cauſed Turin to be inveſted, and, during the ſiege, headed his army and marched towards Provence. Francis, who was then at Lyons, ſpeedily provided Marſeilles with neceſſaries, and ordered two camps to be fortified, one at Cavaillon, under command of marſhal de Montmorency, the other at Valence, whither he himſelf repaired. There he received the ſhocking news of the death of his ſon the Dauphin, poiſoned by Montecuculli.

The Emperor beſieges Marſeilles, and raiſes the ſiege, and returns into Spain.

The Emperor having entered Provence, took Aix, and then ſat down before Marſeilles, which ſiege commenced the twenty-fifth of Auguſt, and was raiſed the ninth of September. He had ſo ill taken his meaſures, that not knowing how to ſubſiſt his army in Provence, he was forced to retire in the utmoſt diſorder, not without danger of being defeated in his retreat, if Francis had thought proper to attack him. He got to Genoua the ſecond of October, and there imbarked for Spain. This ſucceſs had his Provence expedition, which he had been long meditating, and by means of which he hoped to give a mortal wound to France.

The King of Scotland eſpouſes Magdalen of France.

Francis returning towards Paris with unſpeakable ſatisfaction at having diſappointed Charles's deſigns, met on his route James V, King of Scotland, who came to demand his daughter Magdalen. He was not without great difficulty prevailed with to grant his requeſts, becauſe the Princeſs being ſickly, it was thought matrimony would but ſhorten her days: however, as the Scotiſh King expreſſed a moſt earneſt deſire for the marriage, it was concluded in December, and the nuptials were celebrated the firſt of January 1537. Let us now return to the affairs of England.

The northern rebellion was appeaſed, but in such a manner that the cauſe ſtill ſubſiſted, the male-contents having received no redreſs of their grievances, except only that the King had promiſed to call a parliament in the north, which promiſe he never deſigned to perform. The pretenſe he uſed was their having left in the monaſteries the monks they had reſtored: but this excuſe was ſtrained and precarious, if any was ever ſo, ſince turning them out was not their buſineſs, but the King's, who had the power in his own hands, whereas they had nothing more to ſay after quitting their arms. Henry, not ignorant how the northern people ſtood affected, ordered the duke of Norfolk * to remain there with his army, to keep them in awe. The duke's imployment, for ſome time, was making perſons of all conditions ſwear fidelity to the King (1); a very improper remedy for thoſe kinds of evils, ſince the ſame compulſion which extorts oaths from a diſcontented people, ſerves alſo for pretext to break them when occaſion offers. Mean while Aſke, who had headed the revolters, was ordered to court, where he was well received; but lord Darcy, who had not ſo readily obeyed a like ſummons, was ſent to the Tower on his arrival at London.

Muſgrave had the good fortune to eſcape; but Tilby, and ſeventy four others taken with him, were hanged over the walls of Carliſle. Theſe attempts exaſperated the King ſo far, that he put to death Aſke and lord Darcy, notwithſtanding the amneſty he had granted to appeaſe the firſt inſurrection. Lord Darcy accuſed the duke of Norfolk of favoring the rebels; which was perhaps too true. But the duke cleared himſelf, or rather Henry judged it not proper ſtrictly to ſcrutiniſe this accuſation. Mean while, as he knew, the Emperor was contriving ſome plot in Ireland, he ordered that Thomas Fitz-gerald, ſon of the late earl of Kildare, and five of his uncles, after a long impriſonment at London, ſhould ſuffer death for a terror to the Iriſh: but the earl of Kildare's youngeſt ſon had the good fortune to eſcape, and fled for refuge to cardinal Pole.

Henry determines on ſuppreſſing all the monaſteries. Burnet. Herbert.

Henry could not be perſuaded but that it was the monks who moſt contributed towards fomenting the peoples diſcontents. He conſidered them as the chief authors of the late inſurrections, and conſequently as his perſonal enemies. He believed to diſcern in their behavior that, if they had power, they would not ſpare him, and therefore he projected ruining them, in order to prevent their deſigns. He was ſenſible two very conſiderable advantages would thence accrue, the one to rid himſelf of his adverſaries, and the other to reap their ſpoils: nor is it to be doubted this latter conſideration had alſo a good ſhare in his project of vengeance upon them. The ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries having only ſharpened his appetite, he reſolved to ſuppreſs all the reſt and ſeize their immenſe poſſeſſions. To ſucceed with greater eaſe, he uſed the ſame means he had practiſed to ſuppreſs the leſſer monaſteries; that is, he appointed a very ſtrict viſitation of thoſe remaining, not queſtioning but the diſcoveries which ſhould be made would promote his deſign.

The twelfth of October the Queen was delivered of a Prince, whom they named Edward. But this birth proved fatal to his mother, who died two days after her delivery (2). As Henry had cauſed his two daughters by his former marriages to be declared illegitimate, nothing could be more acceptable than the birth of a ſon, who put the ſucceſſion of the crown out of all diſpute: and therefore, in a few days, he confered on him, as his heir apparent, the title of Prince of Wales, duke of Cornwal, and earl of Cheſter. The affairs of religion daily grew more important in a great part of Europe, by reaſon of the reformation's conſiderable progreſs. Thoſe who had imbraced it, wiſhed only to live in quiet with liberty of conſcience: but this was what the old religion would never allow them. The glory of God, and zeal for the intereſts of holy mother church, ſerved for pretexts to this refuſal: but the real cauſes were, firſt, the pride of the generality of mankind, who cannot bear being told that they err in opinion: ſecondly, the temporal intereſt of eccleſiaſtics who, wherever the reformation was eſtabliſhed, ſaw themſelves deprived of their rich benefices; the church revenues being by the reformed applied to uſes very different from thoſe in which they had been thitherto imployed: thirdly, the intereſts of his Beatitude the Pope, who daily loſt his ſubjects, his revenues, his credit, and his authority. There was in Germany another particular cauſe, which inflamed the troubles occaſioned by religion, and that was, the Emperor, with his brother Ferdinand King of the Romans, had formed a deſign of advancing their own affairs under pretext of forcing the Proteſtants to re-enter the church's pale; and therefore, inſtead of healing, they fomented the diviſions to the utmoſt of their power. The Proteſtants, among other grievances, complained, that a council was convened at Mantoua, contrary to the expreſs promiſe given that it ſhould be in Germany: beſide, they ſaid, their meaning was not to ſubmit to the deciſions of a council where the Pope preſided, and which, as they perceived, would be far from being free. The Emperor amuſed them with evaſive anſwers, 'till matters ſhould be ripe for attacking them. Mean while, the Pope, having defered opening the council from May to November, charged in that interval the cardinals Contarini, Sadoletti, Pole and Bembo, all perſons of high reputation, to examine wherein the church wanted reformation. Theſe able divines found nothing amiſs as to the doctrines: they only drew up, as to diſcipline, a liſt of ſundry trifles, which in their opinion merited ſome rectification. To theſe alone they thought the reformation ought to be confined.

His Holineſs orders commiſſioners to examine the ſtate of the church and religion.

Mean while, his Imperial Majeſty was very ſeriouſly meditating on the affairs of Germany, tho' he took ſingular care to conceal from the Proteſtants his deſigns. In order to free himſelf from all other incumbrances, and attack them with advantage, he had concluded the truce with Francis, in hopes it would ſoon be followed by a complete pacification. He evidently perceived, the Smalcaldic league would be a perpetual obſtacle to the execution of his vaſt projects, thro' the efforts Francis and Henry were making to gain it to their intereſts: his chief aim was therefore to diſſolve that league, that he might afterwards proceed againſt England with the whole power of Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands (1).

The Emperor's deſigns.

An' 1538. Henry's final reſolution to ſuppreſs all the monaſteries. Herbert. Burnet.

Henry readily foreſaw that Charles and Francis had agreed to a truce only in order to conclude very ſpeedily a peace which would rob him of the aſſiſtance of France. Wherefore, finding he had no refuge but in his own forces, in caſe of attack, he conſidered early of means to prevent inſurrections at home, which muſt greatly imbaraſs him, ſhould he ingage in a foreign war. He was conſcious the monks of England hated him mortally. They were the perſons who inſpired the Engliſh with a ſpirit of rebellion, the more dangerous as religion was the chief motive: ſo, to deprive the Pope and Emperor of ſuch a ſupport in his own realm, he reſolved to ſuppreſs all the religious houſes ſtill ſubſiſting in England. He had a farther motive, which was not inconſiderable, namely, to have a fund ſufficient to maintain the war, without being forced to over-burden his ſubjects: but as his ſuppreſſing part of the monaſteries had already occaſioned diſturbances in the kingdom, it was likely the ſuppreſſion of all would raiſe ſtill greater: wherefore he believed he ſhould prevent all commotions, by removing his ſubjects veneration for the monks. To this end, the report of the laſt viſitation being brought to him, he ordered it to be immediately publiſhed. Very probably, the facts inſerted concerning the diſorderly lives of the fryers and nuns, were ſet forth ſo as to be ſubſervient to the King's deſigns (2): but what moſt conduced to recover people from their ſuperſtitious fondneſs for the religious houſes, was the diſcovery of frauds there commited with reſpect to relicts and images. Had the buſineſs been only the debaucheries of the monk and nuns, it might have been objected, that it ſufficed to make ſtrict inquiry of thoſe who were guilty, and to puniſh them with rigor: but for the pious frauds (as they are ſtiled) it could ſcarcely be thought but that the whole ſociety was concerned. For this reaſon therefore, Henry, to render them notoriouſly viſible, took care publicly to expoſe the counterfeit relics found in the monaſteries, and the ſprings by which the images of Chriſt, the Virgin Mary, or any of the ſaints were made to move, which by the ignorant multitude were looked on as the effect of a divine power. If the reader deſires to ſee a particular account of theſe pious impoſtures, he will find it, tho' very ſuccinct, in the hiſtory of the reformation of England. Theſe frauds being thus detected, the King ordered to be reduced to aſhes, in the public places, whatever had ſerved to ingage the people in ſuperſtition. But what moſt grieved the votaries was, to ſee burned publicly the bones of Thomas Becket, commonly named St. Thomas of Canterbury. They charged King Henry with acting therein from a motive of a ſacrilegious avarice, in order to have a pretenſe to ſeize the rich ſhrine of that ſaint, whereon, beſide other precious ſtones, was a very fine diamond, offered in 1179 by Henry I, King of France, when he came in pilgrimage to Canterbury (3). This procedure ſo exaſperated the adherents of the old religion, that they wrote to Rome againſt the King, in terms moſt virulent, comparing him to the moſt infamous tyrants the univerſe ever beheld: whereupon at Rome and other places, numberleſs ſatires were penned, which, in the eyes of thoſe who were not accuſtomed to the hyperbolical flights of the Italians, rendered Henry the moſt execrable of men. The King had at Rome his ſpies, who acquainting him with what was publiſhed againſt him, told him withal, that the informations ſent from England were generally addreſſed to cardinal Pole, and even that his ſtile was viſible in diverſe of the libels. This ſo highly irritated Henry againſt his ſaid eminence that he made all his family and friends feel the effects, and would ſooner have pardoned any crime whatever than the leaſt correſpondence with him. It is ſurpriſing that this cardinal, who ſeemed otherwiſe very prudent and moderate, ſhould ſo give way to his zeal, or his paſſion againſt the King, that he feared not, by ſo unadviſed a behavior, to expoſe his friends to Henry's utmoſt reſentment. His obſtinacy in this reſpect was ſuch that he was finally the occaſion of his mother's loſing her head on a ſcaffold, as will be ſeen in the ſequel.

The next year the odds grew greater: at Chriſt's altar not a penny; at the Virgin's only 4 l. 1 s. 8 d; but at St. Thomas's, 954 l. 6 s. 3 d. The rich ſtone was offered by Lewis VII of France, which our King ſet in a ring and wore on his thumb. The ſpoil of the ſhrine in gold and precious ſtones filled two cheſts, which were ſo heavy, that they were a load to eight ſtrong men to carry them out of the church. His name was ſtruck out of the calendar: the day of raiſing his body, or, as they called it, his tranſlation, being the 7th of July, which was not only a holiday, but every 50th year there was a jubilee for fifteen days, and indulgence granted to all who viſited his ſhrine. Paul III publiſhes the bull of excommunication. Burnet. Herbert. A violent book of Pole's.

Pope that he was not to expect of him any change, he at length publiſhed the bull of excommunication, drawn and ſigned in 1535. Moreover, he indeavored to ſtir up againſt him all the Potentates of Chriſtendom, and offered the kingdom of England to the King of Scotland: nay, Pole maintained, in a book publiſhed ſoon after, that it was more meritorious to fight againſt Henry, than againſt the Turk. But the Vatican thunders had ſo loſt their force in England, that the bull cauſed no commotion, or if it produced any effect, it was directly the reverſe to what his Beatitude expected. Henry being more and more exaſperated, took ſuch good precautions to prevent the execution of his Sanctity's deſigns, that he thereby advanced the reformation abundantly more than ever he intended. He no ſooner underſtood that the bull was publiſhed, but he required the biſhops and abbots to ſwear again to renounce the Papal authority. At the ſame time, the new tranſlation of the Bible being preſented to him, he ordered fifteen hundred copies to be printed, and ſet up in the principal churches, being ſatisfied that nothing would be found there to ſupport that exorbitant power which the Roman Pontifs aſſumed over all Chriſtendom (1).

Not long after was publiſhed the vicegerent's injunction that the faithful ſhould learn the Lord's Prayer, Creed, and Ten Commandments in Engliſh. Moreover, all incumbents were ordered to inſtruct their reſpective flocks, that they muſt not truſt in other mens works, but in their own; and that relics, beads, and the like were unneceſſary to ſalvation. They were alſo injoined to pull down all images, to which offerings were made, and not to permit candles to be ſet up before any image, except thoſe which repreſented Jeſus Chriſt. Finally, they were to ſuppreſs the Ora pro Nobis annexed to all prayers addreſſed to ſaints (2).

Submiſſion of the Engliſh to their Sovereign's will. Burnet.

This injunction was deemed a mortal wound to the old religion, whoſe adherents were in the utmoſt conſternation: but not one durſt move, ſo abſolute was the ſuperiority this King had acquired over his ſubjects; nay, the moſt diſcontented affected a blind ſubmiſſion to his will, as being ſenſible that the leaſt ſurmiſe would be ſufficient to work their utter ruin.

Gardiner puts the King upon proſecuting the reformed. Burnet.

Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was now returned from his embaſſy to France. He was one of the old religion's moſt zealous partiſans; nay, he was even ſuſpected of being privately reconciled to his Holineſs, and of holding correſpondence with the Emperor. Nevertheleſs, he ſo well diſſembled his ſentiments, that he perſuaded the King that all was merely the devices of his enemies to ruin him. It is however certain that, tho' Henry ſeemed ſatisfied, he had no great eſteem for him, and yet ſuffered him about his perſon on account of his extreme ſubmiſſion. His implicit condeſcenſion to the King's will afforded him many opportunities to ſerve the party he privately favored. The King, not conſidering this prelate as one he ſuſpected, ſince he ſo readily complied with his orders, freely liſtened to him when he inveighed againſt the Sacramentarians, being yet ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed in favor of the doctrine of the real preſenſe of Chriſt's body in the Euchariſt. Gardiner could therefore explain his ſentiments without dread, ſince they diſagreed not with thoſe of his Sovereign. On this aſſurance, he inſinuated to him, that while his Majeſty left intire the ſaid dogma, he would never be taxed with having changed religion, but would rather be applauded as its purifier only in preſerving eſſentials. Thus Gardiner ingaged him to perſecute the Sacramentarians, not ſo much from a truly zealous as a political motive. He knew the King's temper to be impatient of contradiction; and therefore, by ingaging him to maintain a doctrine which thoſe of the new religion could not admit, he hoped their reſiſtance would irritate him againſt them, and thereby he would be more eaſily led to a reconciliation with the Pontif: that is to ſay properly, he imployed to alienate Henry from the Proteſtants the ſame means they uſed to prejudice him againſt their adverſaries; but neither could ſucceed. Henry reformed himſelf but by halves, and was never reconciled to the court of Rome. As he was become abſolute, he would never ſuffer his ſubjects to advance farther than himſelf, but conſtrained them to attend him juſt to the place where he was pleaſed to ſtop, alike ſevere, or rather mercileſs to thoſe who refuſed to follow, and to thoſe who would go beyond him. He this year gave one inſtance of rigor capable of making the reformers deſpair of any farther progreſs.

Henry diſputes publicly with Lambert. Hall. Burnet. Fox. Stow.

One Lambert (3) being informed againſt as a Sacramentarian, Henry convened a great aſſembly in Weſtminſter-Hall, where he was pleaſed himſelf to diſpute publicly with the party accuſed. The match was no way equal. Lambert ſtood alone without a ſecond; but the King was ſurrounded by crouds, who applauded and judged unanſwerable all his arguments; whereas none durſt even breathe the leaſt approbation of what was urged by his co-diſputant. The diſpute ended with King Henry's leaving it to the wretched Lambert's choice, either to abjure his opinion, or be burned. But whatever advantage the King ſeemed to have, he may be ſaid to be vanquiſhed, ſince he was forced to fly to ſuch rigorous means to convince his adverſary, after flattering himſelf to perſuade him by dint of reaſoning; otherwiſe, very probably, he would not have ingaged in the diſpute. Nor did he ſucceed by this extraordinary method; ſince Lambert choſe that violent death rather than to recede from ſentiments of whoſe veracity he was yet firmly perſuaded. Henry had no occaſion to be flattered: he had but too good a conceit of himſelf. Nevertheleſs, Gardiner and the reſt of his party took occaſion from this diſpute to extol him above the moſt learned divines of the age. They inſpired him with ſuch high opinion of his own erudition, that he believed his deciſions ought to be the univerſal ſtandard: but, contrary to the expectations of his flatterers, this conceit of himſelf was no leſs fatal to them than to the other party, ſince he reſolved to puniſh rigorouſly and indifferently all who durſt preſume to ſwerve from whatever he himſelf judged reaſonable.

For which Cranmer wrote Cromwell a letter of thanks, dated the thirteenth of Auguſt. The tranſlation had been ſent over to be printed at Paris, the workmen in England not being judged able to do it as it ought to be. It was recommended to the care of Bonner, then embaſſador at Paris, and much in Cromwell's favor. It was printed in a large volume; but on complaint of the French clergy, a ſtop was put to the preſs, and moſt of the copies ſeized and burned: but ſome were conveyed away, and the workmen and forms brought over to England, where it was now finiſhed. purpoſe. The Smalcaldic league furniſhed him with a good opportunity. But preſervation of the Augſburg confeſſion being the ſole foundation of that league, he ſaw not that he could poſſibly join in it to ſupport a creed which he approved not in every one of its articles: wherefore his deſign was, either to bring the Proteſtants to conclude with him a general league, which ſhould not be limited to the defenſe of their religion, or elſe prevail with them to be ſatisfied with the reformation he had himſelf introduced into England. To this end, he diſpatched embaſſadors with inſtructions to inquire who were the confederates, and in caſe the league was confined to religion only, to require their ſending over ſome of their ableſt divines, to try whether a common religion might not be agreed on. The Proteſtants replied, That their league conſiſted of twenty-ſix Imperial cities, and twenty-four Princes, among whom the King of Denmark was lately admited: that at preſent they could not be without their divines, but deſired him to declare himſelf poſitively on the propoſition made him of imbracing the Augſburg confeſſion. Some time after they ſent embaſſadors capable of diſputing on the points of religion: but this embaſſy was fruitleſs. Henry found in the Germans men of a very different ſtamp from his own ſubjects, and little inclined to compliance. They would not allow him communion in one kind, private maſſes, auricular confeſſion, celibacy of prieſts, and gave him their reaſons in writing; to which he replied, tho' to very little purpoſe. As he could not put the ſame choice to them as he had done to Lambert, he was obliged to diſmiſs them without any concluſion, being as little ſatisfied with them as they were with him.

The intereſt of the reformers declines at court. Burnet.

Mean while, the intereſt of the reformers began viſibly to decline at court, ſince Queen Jane's deceaſe. Only Cromwell and Cranmer, by their credit and merit, maintained their ſtanding: the firſt was however taxed with being too ſelf-intereſted, and of being abundantly more attentive to his own concerns than to thoſe of religion. As to the others of a more inferior claſs, few of them were men of very eminent note. Shaxton, biſhop of Sarum, was proud and litigious; Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter, was deſpiſed for his weakneſs and ſimplicity; Barlow, who had been prior of Biſham and afterwards biſhop of St. Aſaph, had no great judgment. In general, the preachers of the new religion ſuffered themſelves to be hurried away by a zeal far from diſcrete, and, without conſidering King Henry's diſpoſition, obeyed the impulſes of their conſcience, let what would be the conſequence: ſo, never concerning themſelves about the effects their zeal might produce, they openly preached doctrines not yet approved by the King, which very much conduced to prejudice him againſt them, and all others who deſired to advance the reformation.

Characters of the heads of the party.

Bonner made biſhop of Hereford; and ſoon after of London. Burnet.

Edward Fox, biſhop of Hereford, dying in the interim, the reformers thought to gain a great point in procuring that See for Edmund Bonner, who had been embaſſador in Spain, and afterwards in France, whence he was lately recalled, at the inſtance of King Francis, who was not pleaſed with him. Not long after, they cauſed him to be promoted to the See of London, vacant by the death of Stokeſley: but they ſtrangely erred in their choice; ſince this prelate, who was ſo obliged to them, was afterwards one of their moſt inveterate enemies.

Cranmer and Cromwell project marrying King Henry with a Proteſtant. Herbert.

Cromwell and Cranmer, perceiving at length their party decay, and that Henry began to give ear to thoſe who oppoſed the reformation, in ſuch manner as made them dread the conſequences, deemed it neceſſary to ſupport their party by means of a Queen who ſhould take it under her protection.

They had happily experienced how much Ann Boleyn and Jane Seymour had helped to ſoften the King's mind towards the reformed, and they queſtioned not that, in caſe they could provide him with a conſort of the like diſpoſition, ſhe would produce a like effect. For this reaſon, they turned their eyes towards Germany, and Cromwell undertook to negociate a match between the King and Ann of Cleve, the duke of Cleve's and ducheſs of Saxony's ſiſter. We ſhall, in the inſuing year, ſee the ſucceſs of this negociation, having firſt made ſome brief mention of foreign affairs.

They turn their eyes on Ann of Cleve.

Too equal were the forces of Charles V and Francis I, for either to expect any great advantages from a war they were left to carry on alone. Francis had ill taken his meaſures, in imagining that Henry would declare for him, that the Potentates of Italy would indeavor to ſhake off the Emperor's yoke, and that the Proteſtants of Germany would imbrace the opportunity of this war to eſtabliſh that liberty of conſcience to which they aſpired, and of which they were threatened to be deprived: but nothing of all this happening, he found himſelf ſingly loaded with a ſcarce ſupportable burden. On the other hand, Charles dreaded that Francis would at length unite all theſe powers againſt him, and the Turkiſh Emperor improve ſo favorable a juncture to invade Germany. The Pope alſo feared the ſame, and that the coaſts of Italy would be infeſted by Infidels. This, added to the deſire of being revenged on the King of England, put him on ſeeking means to procure a pacification between the Emperor and King of France, that Henry being left alone might be more eaſily invaded. To this end, he propoſed to the two contending Monarchs a meeting at Nice, whither he offered to repair in perſon and act as mediator. This propoſal being accepted, all three met there about mid-June, his Beatitude confering ſometimes with one, ſometimes with the other, without the two Monarchs ever ſeeing each other during the whole negociation. The Pontif had his reaſons for obſtructing their holding any conference only by his mediation: he deſigned to treat privately of a marriage between Octaviano Farneſe, his nephew, and Margaret, the Emperor's natural daughter, widow of Aleſſandro di Medicis; and, in effect, the ſcheme ſucceeded anſwerably to his wiſhes.

When Francis had nothing more to fear from the Emperor, he grew very cool to Henry, tho' he had exceſſively careſſed him while he needed his aſſiſtance. Henry was extremely inſenſed, and expreſſed his reſentment by ordering Bonner, in his return from Spain to ſtop at the French court, and demand of Francis a certain Engliſh rebel, who was retired into France, and the arrears of his penſion, there being now four years due. Bonner, who was naturally audacious, delivered his meſſage ſo haughtily, that Francis, offended at his inſolence, diſpatched to Henry a courier, to know whether he had ordered his embaſſador to uſe ſuch language, and to deſire Bonner might be recalled. Henry thought fit to comply with his demand. But it appeared he was not very angry with Bonner, ſince at his arrival he promoted him to the See of Hereford, Cardinal Pole labors to raiſe King Henry troubles. Herbert.

While Henry uſed all poſſible precautions to ſecure himſelf from the attacks of his enemies, cardinal Pole, by means of his correſpondents in England, was doing his utmoſt to alienate from him the hearts of his ſubjects, by publiſhing every where, that he had ſubverted all religion to ſet up his own fictions. This charge was the moſt ſenſible wound could be given Henry, ſince he pretended, religion conſiſted not in the things he had changed, but in thoſe he had retained. This is what he earneſtly ſtrove to make his people comprehend, as being very ſenſible that this general accuſation of having ſubverted religion could not but greatly poiſon their allegiance. Accordingly, Pole and his emiſſaries chiefly inſiſted upon this, in order to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. Several have thought the cardinal had ſome private views which concerned not religion. He was of the houſe of York by his mother, and is ſaid alſo to have ſome inclination for Princeſs Mary, and to beſtir himſelf thus in order to eſpouſe and place her on the throne inſtead of her father: at leaſt, there is reaſon to ſuſpect his extraordinary zeal was fortified by ſome hidden views, and that in acting for the Pope he was laboring his own advancement; but this is only conjecture. However, ſir Jeffrey Pole, the cardinal's near relation (1), privately acquainted King Henry, that he held correſpondence with Henry Courtney marquis of Exeter, grandſon of Edward IV (2); with Henry Pole (3) lord Montagu; with ſir Edward Nevil (4), and with ſir Nicholas Carew, maſter of the horſe and knight of the garter; and that his inſtruments therein were a prieſt and a mariner. On this information, theſe perſons were apprehended, condemned and executed, but the informer was pardoned, as a reward for his intelligence. No other circumſtance of their trial is known but their correſponding with Pole; a crime not pardonable, as Henry ſtood affected to that cardinal.

An' 1539. Surrenders of the monaſteries to King Henry. Burnet.

The laſt viſitation of monaſteries tended only, as has been obſerved, to ſeek apparent reaſons for their ſuppreſſion. King Henry had now reſolved it, and the enormities, real or imaginary, of the monks, were only a cover for his vengeance, and perhaps for his avarice (5). The viſitation being over, he ſent into the ſeveral counties commiſſioners to receive the ſurrenders abbots and priors were to make of their houſes (6). In Rymer's collection of public acts are extant many of theſe ſurrenders, which, tho' very involuntary, contained however the feigned reaſons which had moved the monks and their ſuperiors to a ſpontaneous reſignation of all their lands to his Majeſty. In ſome, they were made to ſay only, they were induced thereto by juſt and reaſonable cauſes: but in others of greater length they were made to alledge, "That what "they had 'till now obſerved, conſiſted only in "dumb ceremonies, and conſtitutions of the biſhops "of Rome and other foreign Potentates, who had "taken no care of their inſtruction, or to reform "the many abuſes which had hitherto prevailed in "their houſes; but that deſiring to live for the fu-"ture according the rule preſcribed by Chriſt, the "evangeliſts, and the apoſtles, they deemed it ex-"pedient for them to be governed by the King, "their ſupreme head on earth: that therefore they "ſubmited themſelves to his mercy, and ſurren-"dered to him their houſes, with all things "thereto belonging: that they beſought him to "grant to each of them a penſion for their ſub-"ſiſtence, and expreſs licenſe to take a ſecular "habit, and be admited into livings like other "eccleſiaſtics." Others ſaid, "They had conſi-"dered that Chriſtianity conſiſted not in the prac-"tiſe of ceremonies, in wearing black, grey, "or white habits, and in noding with the head, "wearing cords with great knots about their "middle, and the like, wherein they had been erro-"neouſly inſtructed: but that the true method of "ſerving God was taught in the goſpel; and there-"fore, deſiring for the future to walk by that good "rule, they ſubmited themſelves to the ſupreme "head of the church of England, and, renouncing "all ſuperſtitions and foreign traditions, they re-"ſigned their houſes to the King, with all things "thereunto appertaining." Others ſurrendered their houſes by way of agreement between them and the King, for the cauſes ſpecified in the deed itſelf (7): but there is not in the ſaid collection of public acts even a ſingle deed of this kind at full length, where any of theſe cauſes may be ſeen. It can only be gathered from what ſome authors ſay, that the hinted cauſes were, either the houſes were overburdened with debts, or the revenues had been ill-managed, or there had been commited crimes meriting rigorous chaſtiſements, from which they were exempted on account of the ſurrender. Howſoever this may have been, King Henry having reſolved at any rate to ſuppreſs all monaſteries, the oppoſition of abbots, priors and monks would have been ineffectual. Accordingly, perceiving plainly that by fair means or foul they ſhould be forced to ſubmit to his will, the greateſt part thought moſt prudent to do it with a good grace, and make the beſt bargain they could for themſelves. The abbot or prior, with the chief monks of each houſe, being before-hand gained either by promiſes or threats, the reſt would ſcarce have courage enough to make a fruitleſs reſiſtance.

The firſt ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries was done by act of parliament: but it was Henry's pleaſure this ſhould appear to be intirely voluntary, as if the abbots, priors and monks had been induced of themſelves to ſurrender their houſes; a thing however ſo notoriouſly falſe, that not a ſoul could be ignorant how forced theſe ſurrenders were. abuſed the abſolute power he had acquired over his ſubjects, of whom not a man durſt publicly find fault with his conduct, and ſtill leſs openly oppoſe his will: however he uſed artifice to make the ſuppreſſion of monaſteries be received with leſs reluctance. While the commiſſioners were receiving the ſurrenders, he called a parliament for the twenty-eighth of April. At the ſame time, he cauſed a report to be ſpread, that the kingdom was on the point of being invaded. He confirmed the report by going in perſon to viſit the coaſts, by commanding forts and redoubts to be erected in ſeveral places (1), and by giving preſſing orders to fit out a fleet, and keep the troops in a readineſs to march on the firſt notice. The drift of all theſe proceedings was, to let the people ſee that the parliament would be obliged to lay heavy taxes to reſiſt the pretended invaſion; but that the King, acquiring a large revenue by the ſuppreſſion of monaſteries, would have no occaſion for a ſubſidy. The annual value of religious houſes amounted to upwards of one hundred ſixty one thouſand pounds ſterling, according to the rate whereat they had been laſt farmed (2): but it muſt be obſerved, the abbots and priors, foreſeeing the impending ſtorm, had ſet the yearly rents very low, and raiſed the fines extremely high, that they might have wherewithal to ſubſiſt when they ſhould be out of their houſes (3). This King Henry pretended not to regard, being on the contrary exceedingly glad the people were not acquainted with the whole profit which accrued to him from theſe ſuppreſſions. Beſide the rents of lands belonging to monaſteries, the King had moreover a very conſiderable ſum ariſing from church-ornaments, plate, furniture, lead, bells and materials, which he thought not proper to have valued, but it may be judged of by this ſingle article, namely, that in the abbey of St. Edmund's-bury alone there was found five thouſand marks of gold and ſilver in bullion (4).

The monks ruin was a grand ſubject of joy and triumph to thoſe who had already imbraced the reformation, or who wiſhed it could be profeſſed without danger: but they had not cauſe long to rejoice. Henry, reſolving to demonſtrate that, in aboliſhing the Papal authority and deſtroying monaſteries, he had not changed his religion, ſoon gave thereof a moſt unqueſtionable proof. The parliament meeting the twenty-eighth of April, immediately made, by direction from court, a law, intitled, "An Act for aboliſhing diverſity of opinions "in certain articles concerning Chriſtian religion." This is the law which is more generally known by the name of The Bloody Statute. The penalty of burning or hanging was inacted againſt thoſe,

By this and ſome former laws, which ſettled what was to be believed in matter of religion, all the ſubjects were almoſt equally liable to the penalties therein inacted. This laſt law, with thoſe made before againſt the Pope's authority, contained indeed the King's belief, but not the nation's. There was ſcarce a perſon in the kingdom but believed either more or leſs, and yet no one dared openly to ſwerve from it, either to right or left. The reformed however were the greateſt ſufferers thereby; and, in reality, againſt them it was leveled. Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was the real author of this ſtatute. He had intimated to Henry, that it was the ſole means to prevent the forming a league againſt him: that what he had aboliſhed, not being eſſential to religion nor conſidered as ſuch by the generality of Chriſtians, no man of ſound judgment could deem him heretical ſo long as he maintained theſe ſix articles, which abſolutely diſtinguiſhed true catholics from ſectaries and innovators. This was really attacking the King on his weak ſide. But, beſide this motive, King Henry had another which was no leſs powerful; namely, by adding this law to thoſe already made againſt the Pope, he rendered his ſubjects ſo dependent on himſelf, that there was ſcarce any one perſon throughout his realms who was not liable to be called to account and grievouſly haraſſed; inſomuch that the Pope's friends and the reformed were equally in his power, conſequently they were equally concerned not to diſpleaſe him in any thing, but rather blindly to ſubmit to his will. Cranmer alone ventured publicly, and for three days together, to argue againſt the bill before it paſſed: but as ſoon as it had received the ſeal of public authority, he ſent away his wife into Germany 'till better times.

Laws concerning religion ſerve to increaſe the King's authority.

Cranmer in vain argues againſt them.

By another act, the parliament granted King Henry the lands of all ſuch religious houſes as were ſuppoſed to have been freely ſurrendered to him: ſo this ſtatute was rather a confirmation of what had been done, than an ordinance for the ſuppreſſion of monaſteries. As the King had intimated, that he intended to imploy the revenues he had acquired in uſeful foundations, the parliament paſſed a bill for giving him power to erect new biſhopricks.

Never was parliament more devoted to the Sovereign's will. They were not ſatisfied with approving whatever Henry had done, but alſo whatever he might do for the future. It was inacted this ſeſſion, that the ſame obedience ſhould be paid to the King's proclamations, or to the orders of the council during a minority, as to acts of parliament. It was pretended, that caſes might happen where the King had not time to call a parliament, and yet it was neceſſary for the nation's good that his orders ſhould be executed, otherwiſe there might be danger of falling into great inconveniencies. Thus to avoid a poſſible, but withal a not common inconvenience, another much more conſiderable was run into, by giving the Sovereign a deſpotic power: for if his orders were to be obeyed without the concurrence of a parliament, he had no occaſion to call one if he judged it not requiſite. It is true, this act carried with it certain limitations; as that no perſon ſhould be deprived of life or eſtate by virtue of the King's proclamation, nor any laws or cuſtoms broken or ſubverted thereby: but theſe reſtrictions were ſo ambiguouſly expreſſed, that it was eaſy for the King to evade them. On this act were grounded the great alterations in religion during Edward VI's non-age.

Another about precedency. Statute, c. 10.

In this ſame ſeſſion, the parliament paſſed an act to regulate the precedency of the ſtate-officers; by which Cromwell, the King's vicegerent in eccleſiaſtical affairs, tho' a lock-ſmith's ſon, had the precedence of all perſons next the royal family.

Sentence againſt the marquis of Exeter, &c. confirmed. Counteſs of Sarum and marchioneſs of Exeter attainted. Herbert. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 264.

Laſtly, the parliament confirmed the ſentence of death paſſed on the marquis of Exeter, and the reſt who had been executed for holding correſpondence with cardinal Pole. Moreover, for the ſame reaſon, they attainted the counteſs of Saliſbury, that cardinal's mother, and the marchioneſs of Exeter, without bringing them to a trial. This laſt act met with great oppoſition in the parliament, many objecting, that to condemn perſons unheard was a breach of the moſt ſacred and unalterable rules of juſtice: but Cromwell, having ſent for the judges to his houſe, aſked them, whether a parliament had power to condemn perſons accuſed, without a hearing? The judges replied, it was a nice and dangerous queſtion; that equity, juſtice and laws of every kind required that the accuſed ſhould be heard; that however, the parliament being the ſupreme court of the realm, from which there could be no appeal, the validity of their ſentences, of what nature ſoever they were, could not be queſtioned. This was ſaying in other words, that the parliament would therein commit injuſtice for which they could not be called to account. Cromwell having reported in parliament the judges opinion, thoſe two ladies of the blood-royal were condemned to die by a ſentence which eſtabliſhed the moſt pernicious precedent had ever been ſeen in England, and which proved fatal to its author, as will appear. Mean while, Henry granted a full pardon to the marchioneſs of Exeter, and a reprieve to the counteſs of Saliſbury, who was not executed 'till two years after. Thus the King daily acquired ſome freſh degree of authority. It might be ſaid, he uſurped it not, ſince it was given him by the parliament, if the circumſtances of the times had not rendered the very parliament ſlaves to his will.

Henry ſtrives to incourage Cranmer. Burnet.

Cranmer had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the law of ſix articles, and ſuch oppoſition would have infallibly ruined any other perſon except that prelate. But Henry had for him a certain regard and eſteem which could not be eaſily changed, becauſe he was perſuaded the archbiſhop acted according to the dictates of his conſcience, whereas he had a quite contrary notion of the reſt of his miniſters and courtiers. Their blind compliance ſerved only to make him deſpiſe them, tho' he liked to reap the advantage of this abject baſeneſs. So, having a real kindneſs and value for Cranmer, and imagining he muſt have been extremely mortified that the act had paſſed contrary to his opinion, and even apprehenſive of having diſpleaſed him by his oppoſition, he ſent the duke of Norfolk to incourage, and aſſure him of his conſtant favor and affection. Cranmer very thankfully received this teſtimony of his Majeſty's goodneſs and eſteem. Soon after Henry diſcourſed him concerning the law of the ſix articles, and was well pleaſed at his explaining to him the reaſons which led him to oppoſe it: nay, he ordered him to put all his arguments in writing, tho' by the ſtatute itſelf it was a crime incuring the flames: but Cranmer, truſting to the King's equity, drew up a memorial, which he intended to give him. This writing being accidentally loſt, was found by one who was going to carry it to the King, had he not been prevented by Cromwell (1). Burnet repreſents this as a moſt imminent peril from which Cranmer eſcaped very unexpectedly: but ſince the King himſelf ordered him to compoſe this writing, the danger ſeems not to have been ſo great, except it be ſuppoſed Henry would have condemned him unheard; but this ſuppoſition deſtroys itſelf, by the particular eſteem the King had for that prelate.

Shaxton biſhop of Saliſbury, and Latimer of Worceſter, were not treated ſo favorably. As they could not reſolve to approve the law of ſix articles, they believed that in reſigning their biſhopricks they ſhould be leſs expoſed to the attacks of their adverſaries: but they came not off ſo eaſily. No ſooner had they put into King Henry's hands the inſtruments of reſignation, but they were preſented as being averſe to the ſix articles, and commited to the Tower.

Shaxton and Latimer reſign their Sees, and are ſent to the Tower. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XIV. p. 641, 642, Burnet. Strype.

When the parliament diſſolved, Henry diſpatched commiſſioners into the ſeveral counties, to make inquiry of thoſe who were againſt the ſix articles, being determined rigorouſly to execute the ſtatute. As Cromwell and Cranmer could not but be ſuſpected in this affair, the enemies of the reformation eaſily made King Henry ſenſible, that it would be labor loſt to leave to them the nomination of theſe commiſſioners; and indeed, perſons who ſtrongly oppoſed the act were very unfit to procure its execution anſwerably to the King's intention. Several of the adverſe party were therefore appointed, who diſcharged their commiſſion with ſuch immoderate zeal and paſſion, that they fruſtrated the deſigns of their imployers. In the city of London only, upwards of five hundred perſons were, on this very account, within few days, ſeized and hurried to priſon; nay, the King was evidently made ſenſible that, contrary to his meaning, the ſaid commiſſioners had laid ſnares for moſt of theſe priſoners, to ingage them to diſcover opinions which, in obedience to the laws, they intended to conceal: beſide, ſince ſuch numbers were impriſoned in London in ſo ſhort a ſpace, it was eaſy to compute how many the whole realm might contain, and what fatal conſequences muſt attend ſo rigid a perquiſition, which would adjudge to death numberleſs perſons of each ſex and all ages. (1) Cranmer's ſecretary having writ out the book in a fair hand, and returning with it from Croydon, where the archbiſhop was then, to Lambeth, found the key of his chamber carried away by Cranmer's almoner; ſo being obliged to go over to London, and not daring to truſt the book with any one, carried it with him. Some who were in the wherry with him, would needs go Southwark ſide to ſee a bear bating, where the King was in perſon. The bear broke looſe into the river, and the dogs after her. Thoſe in the boat leaped out, and left the ſecretary alone. The bear got into the boat with the dogs about her and ſunk it. The ſecretary ſhifting for himſelf, loſt the book in the water: but being brought to land, he ſaw his book floating, and deſired the bear-ward to bring it him; who taking it up, gave it to a prieſt who ſtood there, to ſee what it might contain. The prieſt finding it to be a confutation of the ſix articles, told the bear-ward whoever claimed it would be hanged for his pains. The ſecretary thinking to mend the matter, ſaid it was his lord's book. This made the fellow more untractable, being a ſpiteful Papiſt, and an enemy to the archbiſhop: ſo that he would not give it back. Whereupon the ſecretary applied to Cromwell, who was then going to court, where he expected the bear-ward would be, in order to deliver the book to ſome of Cranmer's enemies. And ſo it happened: upon this, Cromwell called to him, and took the book out of his hand, threatening him for meddling with a privy-counſellor's papers. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 265, 266.

chancellor, who was no enemy to the reformation, repreſented to the King, and prevailed with him to pardon all the priſoners. From this time to Cromwell's death, the proceedings on this act were ſuſpended, tho' it ſtill ſubſiſted, and might have been executed, had the King pleaſed. Thus were all things regulated to the will and pleaſure of this Prince, who haſtened or retarded the execution of his laws juſt according to junctures and perſons. This gained him a blind condeſcenſion from both parties, every one having to dread his own ruin according to the King's occaſional humor and diſpoſition. Certain it is that they who wiſhed a reformation, were conſtrained to feign they approved many things which in their hearts they deteſted, and that Cromwell and Cranmer, who had moſt acceſs to King Henry, dared to preſs him only indirectly to advance the work already begun: hence they preſerved their credit, and were inabled to do their party ſervice. Their adverſaries took the ſame courſe, and went ſtill greater lengths in their compliance, well knowing it was the only method to gain the King's confidence. Bonner, biſhop of London, tho' his Sanctity's very zealous partiſan, and perſuaded that the King had no ſpiritual authority, took from him a commiſſion which adjudged to him both the ſpiritual and temporal power of his biſhoprick, during his Majeſty's good pleaſure. After this, the exceſſive power which King Henry daily acquired muſt not be thought ſtrange, ſince every one ſtrove to ſubmit to his will. Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was one of the main favorers of the old creed, to which, thro' a profound diſſimulation, he was extremely ſerviceable: he expreſſed great zeal to execute, as well the act of ſix articles, as thoſe made againſt the Pope; and thereby maintained his credit, tho' Henry had for him but little eſteem.

Exceſſive condeſcenſion of both parties for the King. Herbert. Burnet.

Burnet. Vol. I. p. 267.

The actual ſuppreſſion of monaſteries was begun and ended in the courſe of this year (1). The commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe regulated all thereto relating. They awarded penſions to the abbots, priors, monks and nuns for their ſubſiſtence; they likewiſe valued the plate, goods, ornaments of prieſts, of altars, of churches, and ordered what buildings ſhould be demoliſhed, and what left ſtanding. I have already obſerved that the rents of all the ſuppreſſed monaſteries amounted to more than one hundred ſixty thouſand pounds ſterling annually: but if it be true that this valuation was made on the foot of the laſt leaſes, and that theſe were not above the tenth part of the real value, as ſome affirm, it follows that theſe rents were worth upwards of ſixteen hundred thouſand pounds (2), beſide the ready caſh which accrued to King Henry by ſale of the effects. Here was wherewithal to make uſeful foundations to church and ſtate, had all this treaſure been ſo imployed. The King ſeemed at firſt to have formed ſuch a deſign; nay, it was what had ſerved for the principal ground for ſuppreſſing the monaſteries: but the greedineſs of courtiers and favorites allowed but a very ſmall part to be expended on things uſeful and neceſſary. Henry at firſt reſolved to erect eighteen new biſhopricks; but, as the money was laviſhed away, he found reaſons to reduce them to a far ſmaller number. In ſhort, he contented himſelf with founding ſix, and eſtabliſhing canons in ſome cathedrals which the monks poſſeſſed. In all this he imployed only a revenue of eight thouſand pounds. He laid out likewiſe part of the money in fortifying ſome ports, and all the reſt was ſquandered in preſents and other needleſs expenſes. Thus he could not poſſibly avoid the charge of having plundered the church; whereas had he expended the bulk of theſe revenues in matters of utility to church and ſtate, he would have acquired the benedictions of his ſubjects and their poſterity. As to the parliament, they are inexcuſable for having put into the King's hands ſuch a heap of wealth deſigned for pious uſes, without taking the leaſt care how they were to be imployed. This is no ſlender evidence of what has been already obſerved, that the parliaments met in this reign only to be inſtrumental in gratifying the King's paſſions, without ever examining either the motives or conſequences of what he required. Henry had alſo formed the project of founding a college for young ſtudents, that they might be qualified for the ſervice of the ſtate, either in embaſſies or other affairs of the government (3). But this project miſcarried with many others, becauſe Henry, having ſold all the abbey-lands, could not reliſh puting to ſuch uſes the ready money raiſed by thoſe ſales. He choſe rather to laviſh it on his pleaſures, or his courtiers, who omited no artifices, condeſcenſions, or abject flatteries to get a ſhare of theſe vaſt treaſures.

While Henry was thus buſied in domeſtic affairs, he had nevertheleſs his eye towards what paſſed abroad. The year preceding, Charles feigned a reſolution to adjuſt the religious differences which agitated Germany: but this was only to draw from the Proteſtants money to expend in his war with the Turk. He expected that, on the bare hope he was pleaſed to give them of redreſſing their grievances, they would on his account drain themſelves of men and money, and ſo become leſs formidable: but they knew better than to ſuffer themſelves to be ſo deceived. They flatly told him, in anſwer to his demand, that they could do nothing for him, without ſufficient ſecurity of being left in peace.

The German Proteſtants avoid the Emperor's ſnares, Sleidan.

Henry, finding that a rupture between Charles V and the Proteſtants was not very remote, diſpatched away to Germany freſh embaſſadors to ſtrengthen the reſolutions of the Smalcaldic league, by hopes of his acceding thereto, and declaring himſelf its protector: but the Germans had now diſcovered his deſign, which was to amuſe them, and keep the Emperor in continual fear of his uniting with them. They therefore returned the ſame anſwer as before, That the ſole intent of their league was to maintain the Augſburg confeſſion, and if his Majeſty refuſed to admit that confeſſion, it was in vain to treat of other points: that moreover, they heard with ex-

(3) As this was the nobleſt deſign was ever projected in England, it will not be amiſs to give ſome ſhort account of it. Sir Nicholas Bacon (afterwards one of the wiſeſt miniſters this nation ever bred) together with Thomas Denton and Robert Cary, were ordered to make a full project of the nature and orders of ſuch a houſe, which they brought to the King in writing, the original whereof is ſtill extant. The deſign of it was, That there ſhould be frequent pleadings, and other exerciſes in the Latin and French tongues; and when the King's ſtudents were brought to ſome ripeneſs, they ſhould be ſent with his embaſſadors to foreign parts, and trained up in the knowledge of foreign affairs; and ſo the houſe ſhould be the nurſery for embaſſadors. Some were alſo appointed to write the hiſtory of all embaſſies, treaties, and foreign tranſactions; as alſo of all arraignments and public trials at home: but before any of them might write on theſe ſubjects, the lord chancellor was to give them an oath, that they ſhould do it truly, without reſpect of perſons, or any other corrupt affection. treme grief, that he perſecuted in his realm ſuch as held the ſame opinions with them on ſundry articles of religion, and therefore, ſo long as the act of ſix articles ſubſiſted, there was no likelihood that he really intended to join with them. Melancthon even wrote him a letter in very ſtrong, tho' reſpectful terms, to ſhew him the unreaſonableneſs of that ſtatute.

Gardiner diverts the King from his deſigns of joining the Proteſtants. Burnet. Herbert.

Henry, to whom all was obedient in England, and whoſe will was a law, was offended at this firmneſs of the German Princes. On the other hand, Gardiner, who dreaded of all things his Prince's union with the Smalcaldic league, failed not to uſe this occaſion to divert him from it, by flattering his vanity. He repreſented to him, that it was very ſtrange petit Sovereigns ſhould pretend to be patterns to a great Monarch, and dictate to the only Prince in Europe truely learned, in matters of religion. He added, that whatever the Proteſtants might pretend, they would never approve his ſupremacy in England, becauſe it would be a tacit ingagement to own that the Emperor had the ſame right in Germany. This was falſe reaſoning, ſince there was a wide difference between the authority which King Henry had over his ſubjects, and that which the Emperor could claim over the Sovereigns and free cities of Germany. However, the prelate attained his ends, that is, he begot a great coldneſs between Henry and the German Proteſtants.

Bibles ſet up in the churches.

Gardiner's artifices might have been more prejudicial to the reformation, had not, on the other ſide, the reformers raiſed a counter-battery, of which they made wonderful uſe. King Henry was ſo jealous of his ſupremacy, that he neglected nothing might contribute towards its ſupport. Indeed, the abſolute power acquired over his ſubjects placed him above all oppoſition; yet he moſt ardently wiſhed the nation was convinced of the juſtice of that prerogative. Hence the reformers took occaſion to remonſtrate to him, that nothing but reading Sacred writ could diſabuſe the people from their erroneous notion of the Pontifical authority. By this means they had already obtained, that there ſhould be a bible, faſtened with a chain, in every church, to be freely peruſed by all perſons: but as many ſcrupled to read the ſcriptures openly, for fear of being ſuſpected of hereſy, Cranmer, meeting with a favorable opportunity, repreſented to the King, that it was neceſſary to give his ſubjects leave to have a bible in their houſes: adding, that all having liberty to read it they would eaſily be convinced, that the Pope's pretended authority had no foundation in ſcripture. This was an innocent ſtratagem to procure the people a ſort of opportunity to inſtruct themſelves in many other articles, tho' Henry had in view one only. Gardiner readily perceived the conſequence of the archbiſhop's requeſt, and ſeeing the King inclinable to a compliance, did his utmoſt to divert it. He diſputed on this ſubject with Cranmer in preſenſe of the King, who heard them very attentively. At laſt, finding in what Cranmer ſaid a ſolidity not to be met with in the reaſonings of his adverſary, he ſuddenly roſe up, ſaying to Gardiner, "That ſuch "a novice as he was not fit to contend with an old "experienced general." Soon after, he iſſued a proclamation, declaring he was deſirous to have his ſubjects attain the knowledge of true religion in God's word; and therefore he would take care they ſhould have a correct verſion of the bible: however, in order to prevent the inconveniencies which might ariſe from different tranſlations, he prohibited the ſelling any bible which had not the vicegerent's approbation.

About the cloſe of this year was ſeen a freſh effect of the mutual confidence which appeared between Charles V, and Francis I. A mutiny ariſing in Gaunt by reaſon of a tax laid on wine by Charles's governor of the Netherlands, the mutineers applied to King Francis to implore his protection, and even made him a tender of their obedience: but he thought not proper to accept theſe offers. On the contrary, he informed the Emperor of what was in agitation to his prejudice. This ſeems ſomewhat ſurpriſing, conſidering that hitherto he had never expreſſed much generoſity towards that Monarch: but the reaſon of this procedure was, Charles ſtill allured him with hopes of the Milaneſe, and ſo diverted him from the thoughts of recovering it by arms. However this be, the Emperor's preſenſe in Flanders being alone capable of appeaſing the ſedition at Gaunt, he was at ſome loſs which way to get thither in time. It was dangerous going by ſea, as well on account of the ſeaſon, as becauſe he had no fleet to convoy him. The way by Italy was no ſafer, by reaſon he could not afterwards croſs Germany without paſſing thro' the territories of Proteſtant Princes. There remained no other road but by France, which he determined on, tho' he had no leſs cauſe to ſuſpect that country than Germany: but he hoped to amuſe King Francis by means of the duchy of Milan, as he did in effect. He ſet out therefore and entered France with a ſlender retinue, on the bare ſecurity of a ſafe conduct: nay, he refuſed to take in hoſtage the Dauphin and his brother the duke of Orleans, who advanced to receive him at Bayona, offering to ſtay in Spain ſo long as he ſhould be in the Gallic dominions. Whereſoever he came, the ſame reſpect was paid him as to the King himſelf, and he arrived at Paris the firſt of January 1540.

Henry's marriage with Ann of Cleves being at laſt concluded, through the diligence of Cromwell, who had been charged with this negociation, the Princeſs arrived in England about the end of 1539, while Charles V was traverſing France in his way to the Netherlands. Henry having notice of her arrival at Rocheſter, haſted thither incog, being very impatient to ſee if he had been deceived: but, to his extreme regret, he found her very different from what her picture, drawn by Hans Holbin, had made him expect. This firſt view ſo diſguſted him, that he would inſtantly have broke off the marriage, had he not been prevented by ſtrong reaſons (1). The ſame conſiderations which induced him to conclude it ſubſiſted, and there were others which obliged him to conſummate it. The duke of Cleves was the Emperor's neighbor in Flanders, and had alſo a pretenſion as well as he to the duchy of Gueldres, after the death of the duke of that name: conſequently, in caſe of a war between the Emperor and England, that Prince could give Charles a very troubleſome diverſion in Flanders. On the other hand, his ſiſter was married to the duke of Saxony, head of the Smalcaldic league, with whom it greatly concerned Henry to live in a good underſtanding: nor was this all. The Emperor, then in France, was laboring with all his might to diſingage King Francis from the intereſts of England: nay, Henry had private intelligence, that Charles offered to give the Milaneſe to the duke of Orleans on that very conſideration. If therefore, in ſuch a juncture, he had ſent back the Princeſs of Cleves without marrying her, he ran the hazard of a formal rupture with the Smalcaldian Princes at a time when he ſaw himſelf on the point of being forſaken by the King of France, who by degrees forgot the aſſiſtance he had received from

But he was ſtill leſs pleaſed after marriage than before, and from that very moment was determined to be divorced from her: he however concealed his ſentiments as much as poſſible, tho' nothing was more obvious than his gloomy diſcontent. Cromwell, who had ingaged him in this match, ſoon felt the effects of his reſentment, tho' the King was extremely careful to hide it from him (1).

The parliament meeting the twelfth of April, Cromwell made a ſpeech to both houſes, informing them, that the King beholding with exceſſive concern ſuch great diviſion among his ſubjects in matters of religion, had appointed commiſſioners to examine the points in diſpute, that the articles of faith might be fixed, without reſpect of parties, by the word of God: that he was very deſirous his people ſhould have the knowledge of the truth; but then he was reſolved to puniſh without mercy ſuch as ſhould preſume to prefer their private before the eſtabliſhed opinions. The commiſſioners his Majeſty had named were approved, and had orders to begin this examination without delay. Two days after the King created Cromwell earl of Eſſex.

Cromwell created earl of Eſſex.

During this ſeſſion, the parliament ſuppreſſed the order of the knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, now ſtiled knights of Malta. Their dependence on the Pope and Emperor was the chief cauſe of their ruin: nor may it be doubted that the deſire of injoying their ſpoils did not likewiſe induce King Henry to procure their ſuppreſſion; and, in effect, the parliament gave him all their lands as they had given him thoſe of the abbies. Tho' they had large revenues as well in Ireland as England, the King allowed only three thouſand pounds for their whole ſubſiſtence when deſpoiled. That affair ended, the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-fifth of May.

Knights of St. John ſuppreſſed. Hall. Stow. Herbert. Hollingſh. Burnet.

Few days after, fell on Comwell a ſtorm which, very ſeemingly, had ſome time been gathering. This miniſter had many enemies and enviers. He was ſon of a farrier or lock-ſmith; and tho' his birth was ſo very mean, he attained exceſſive honor and dignity, even to precede the whole peerage of England, the royal family only excepted. He was greatly envied by all the nobility. The whole Romiſh party were his implacable enemies, deeming him the firſt adviſer of ſuppreſſing the abbies, and one of Henry's chief incouragers to all the innovations he had made in religion. Among theſe, who were very numerous, the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner were the perſons who could do him moſt hurt, becauſe they had free acceſs to the King. Theſe two courtiers perceiving Henry's great coldneſs towards his new Queen, doubted not of the ill-will he bore Cromwell for ingaging him in this match, and reſolved to lay hold on this occaſion to effect his deſtruction. They hoped, when he was once removed, it would not be impoſſible to procure ſome good agreement between the Emperor and King Henry, and then a reconciliation with his Holineſs, which Cromwell had conſtantly oppoſed to his very utmoſt. Two other particulars did likewiſe ſtrongly contribute to this miniſter's downfal. Henry had always imployed him in his correſpondence with the Smalcaldic league, and ſo long as he ſuppoſed he ſtood in need of that league, he could not do without his miniſtry: but finally cooling towards the German Princes, as has been obſerved, and knowing the union between Charles V and Francis I, he had ſo dreaded, to be a mere chimera, and conſequently that he ſhould little want Germany, Cromwell became leſs neceſſary. What, in the ſecond place, helped to ruin Cromwell was, his royal maſter was highly inamored of Catherine Howard, a niece of the duke of Norfolk. This duke, finding his credit conſiderably increaſed, knew extremely well how to make uſe of it to work the miniſter's deſtruction. The very firſt fair occaſion he had, he repreſented to Henry; "That his "Majeſty's realms abounded with male-contents, "and good men could not be perſuaded that a "Prince like him would willingly give any cauſe "of diſcontent to his people: that they thence "infered he muſt have been ill-ſerved by his "miniſter, who doubtleſs had abuſed his con-"fidence: that as the people ſeemed diſſatisfied "only with regard to religion, it was natural to "think, this happened thro' miſmanagement of "the vicegerent, whoſe conduct perhaps it would "be proper to examine: that he was by the public "charged with many enormities, which, if true, "rendered him the moſt guilty of all others, con-"ſidering the favors heaped on him by his Majeſty: "that beſide, tho' no particular fact could be "proved on him, it was however a very great "crime to rob the King of the hearts of good part "of his ſubjects: that he therefore took the free-"dom to acquaint him that, in order to quiet their "minds, there was no better way than to ſacrifice "to them a miniſter whom they ſo extremely de-"teſted." Theſe inſinuations, which were doubtleſs ſeconded by Gardiner and others of Cromwell's adverſaries, did at length produce the deſired effect. Henry, already prejudiced againſt him, determined on diſpatching him out of the way, without knowing as yet of what he was guilty: but he found in his death a double advantage. Firſt, he diſcovered his reſentment againſt him on account of the marriage into which he had drawn him. Secondly, he believed to make his people a ſacrifice capable of ſilencing all murmurs. This reſolution being taken, and the parliament meeting the thirteenth of June, the duke of Norfolk accuſed Cromwell of high-treaſon at the council-board, and received orders to arreſt and ſend him to the Tower. This illuſtrious priſoner had the common fate of all diſgraced miniſters. In a moment, he was forſaken by all but his friend Cranmer, who alone ventured to write to the King in his favor, tho' to no purpoſe.

Henry determined to null his marriage. Stow. Burnet. Herbert.

Henry was ſo ſick of his new Queen, that he could not bear the vexation to ſee himſelf ingaged, for the reſidue of his days, in a marriage ſo diſagreeable. He reſolved therefore to divorce her, let what would be the conſequence, eſpecially as the reaſons which induced him to marry her no longer ſubſiſted. He had loſt all hope of making a league with the Proteſtants of Germany, and his fears of the Emperor were vaniſhed, ſince he ſaw every thing tending to a rupture between him and France. He only wanted a pretenſe to demand a divorce, and give ſome color to the proceedings of the clergy and parliament, of whoſe concurrence he was ſure, how feeble ſoever might be the pretext. He found one in a pre-contract between the Queen and the duke of Lorrain's ſon. But this contract was ſo ſlight, that the conſequences muſt be very cloſely preſſed to make it ſerve for the foundation of diſſolving Ann's marriage with King Henry. The dukes of Cleves and Lorrain had formerly, it ſeems, in a treaty, agreed on a match between Ann of Cleves and the Prince of Lorrain, both minors. This agreement had never been confirmed by the parties when of age. On the contrary, the duke of Gueldres, who acted as mediator in that treaty, did afterwards, by his embaſſador and a moſt authentic inſtrument, declare that this article was deemed null. Nevertheleſs, when Henry's marriage with Ann was concluded, this pre-ingagement raiſed a difficulty: but the embaſſadors of Saxony and Cleves poſitively promiſed to clear that point, and put it out of all doubt, as ſoon as the Princeſs ſhould arrive in England. Ann arriving at Greenwich, Henry, who liked her not, inſiſted on this ſame point, in order to ſend her back. For that purpoſe, he called a council, and ſending for the embaſſadors, the explanation they had promiſed was demanded. But they had not with them any ſuch thing, eſteeming the ſaid difficulty as little material. Mean while, the council telling them that good proofs were expected and not bare words, they offered to produce, within three months, a genuine abſtract from the chancery of Cleves, to prove what they had alledged. This alone would not have been capable of inducing Henry to proceed, had there not been, as has been ſaid, ſtrong reaſons to make him accompliſh thoſe his eſpouſals: ſo the council were of opinion, that if there was no other objection, the marriage might be lawfully ſolemniſed. The abſtract from the chancery of Cleves being come, great exceptions were found to it, upon the ambiguity of the word Fiançailles *, becauſe it was not expreſſed whether it was to be underſtood in the preſent or future tenſe. But as Henry would not yet commence the affair of his divorce, he cauſed the abſtract to be laid by, in order to make uſe of it when occaſion ſhould offer. Upon this therefore he reſolved to ground the projected diſſolution of his marriage.

The parliament deſire Henry to examine the validity of his marriage. Hall. Stow. Burnet. Herbert.

The parliament, after a prorogation of ſome days, meeting again, Henry ſent the Queen to Richmond. Some few days after, a motion was made in the houſe of peers, to addreſs his Majeſty with a petition to have the validity of his marriage tried. After what has been advanced, it cannot be ſuppoſed any of the nobility would be ſo bold or daringly raſh as to preſume ſtarting ſuch a motion, if not well aſſured of King Henry's approbation. This motion being approved, their lordſhips deſired the concurrence of the commons; after which, they went in a body to preſent their addreſs to his Majeſty. Henry proteſted to them, that he ſought only the glory of God, the good of his people, and the declaration of truth. Then he agreed that the affair ſhould be refered to the clergy, who immediately appointed commiſſioners to examine the witneſſes. All could be gathered from the King's own depoſition, and thoſe of the witneſſes, was, that there had been a pre-contract betwixt Queen Ann and the Prince of Lorrain, which was not ſufficiently cleared: that King Henry, having eſpouſed this Princeſs againſt his will, had not given any internal conſent to his marriage, without which, it was affirmed, his promiſes could not be obligatory, a man's act being only what is inward: that the King had never conſummated his nuptials: that the whole nation had a great intereſt in his Majeſty's having more iſſue, which they ſaw he could never have by the preſent Queen.

The matter brought before the convocation.

Extraordinary reaſons alledged for the divorce. Strype's Mem. Vol. I. Coll. p. 306, 307, &c.

This Monarch muſt have had a very indifferent opinion of the convocation, the parliament, and the public, to alledge ſuch extraordinary cauſes of his divorce. The firſt had been diſcuſſed before the marriage was celebrated, and the council were of opinion it could be no juſt impediment. As to the ſecond, if that maxim took place, contracts would be of no uſe, ſince one of the parties might ſay, he had not conſented internally: this would be eſtabliſhing, without remedy, inſincerity, fraud and perfidy in the higheſt degree. As for the third, Henry doubtleſs forgot what he had alledged in the proceſs of his divorce from Catherine: he then maintained, purſuant to his clergy's opinion, that the conſummation of Arthur's marriage with Catherine was not neceſſary to render it valid, but that the bare conſent of the parties made it complete. The fourth was of no greater weight, ſince there was not any neceſſity of nulling the marriage, under color that his Majeſty pleaſed not to grant the Queen due family benevolence: beſide, he had already male iſſue. In ſhort, his bare word muſt be taken, when he ſaid, he had not conſummated his marriage; his word, who ſued for the divorce, and who uſed this argument to obtain it. Mean while, the clergy thought theſe reaſons ſolid, and paſſed thereon a ſentence of divorce; and the parliament were ſo abject, as to proſtitute themſelves to this Prince's paſſion, and confirm the ſentence (1): nor is there any diſtinction here to be made, ſince, neither in the convocation nor in the parliament was there even a ſingle vote againſt the divorce; ſo much did every one dread to incur the King's diſpleaſure. This is a remarkable evidence of what I have frequently intimated, that in whatever was tranſacted in England during the latter part of Henry VIII's reign, the parliament and clergy ought to be conſidered only as the King's inſtruments to gratify his paſſions: to him is due the praiſe of whatever was good and uſeful, and he it is who ought to be blamed for whatever was amiſs. Mean while, the parliament and clergy are inexcuſable for not having indeavored to ſupport the cauſe of juſtice and truth, when they believed them to be oppreſſed.

been done in her abſenſe, and even without her being examined. Probably, ſhe had not conceived any extraordinary affection for her conſort, who never gave her any token of his love. However, tho' King Henry had deemed it needleſs to aſk her approbation when he was meditating a divorce, becauſe none were then concerned but the clergy and parliament, whom he knew to be at his devotion, he demanded her conſent to what had been done, thinking doubtleſs the better to juſtify himſelf to the world. At the ſame time he offered by letters patent to declare her his adopted ſiſter, with a penſion of four thouſand pounds per annum (1), and her choice either to reſide in England, or return home. She agreed to all without ſollicitation, and choſe to live in England, where ſhe hoped to paſs her time more agreeably than at Cleves, in her brother's court: beſide, it is likely, ſhe believed her penſion would be more ſecure if ſhe remained in England, than if her reſidence was abroad. All things being thus ſettled, ſhe wrote to the duke her brother, that ſhe approved of the divorce, and requeſted him to maintain a good underſtanding with King Henry.

Act to moderate the pains of one of the ſix articles. Burnet.

This grand affair being finiſhed, the parliament paſſed an act to moderate one of the ſix articles in the bloody ſtatute. This article, as the other five, made it death for prieſts to violate their vow of chaſtity; but by the laſt act, the penalty of death was changed to forfeiture of goods.

Proofs of the ſlaviſh attachment of the parliament.

The remainder of this reign will be only a continued ſeries of ſenſible proofs of the ſlaviſh ſubjection to which the Engliſh nation was reduced: but this very parliament produced three inſtances which ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence.

The parliament confirms whatever the King ſhall pleaſe to injoin in matters of religion.

The commiſſioners appointed by King Henry, purſuant to act of parliament, to examine religious doctrines, having drawn a long memorial, and ſet down certain articles as undeniable and abſolutely neceſſary, it was moved in the houſe of lords, to paſs into a law what theſe commiſſioners had already done, and whatever they ſhould do hereafter by order of his Majeſty. This motion being received, a bill was inſtantly brought in, paſſed, and ſent down to the commons, who, aſſenting thereto, returned it up again on the morrow. By this ſtatute it was inacted, That not only the memorial drawn by the commiſſioners, provided it were approved by the King, but likewiſe whatever his Majeſty ſhould injoin afterwards in matters of religion, ſhould be believed and obeyed by all his ſubjects. This was actually inveſting the King with the infallibility taken from the Pope. Greater tokens of bondage are ſcarcely to be met with, ſince the parliament gave their King power over conſcience, after having rendered him in a manner abſolute maſter of life and fortune. Moreover, in this act was inſerted a clauſe, which, under color of limiting the King's authority ſenſibly inlarged it, namely, "That no-"thing ſhould be done or determined, by virtue of "this act, which was contrary to the laws of the "realm." Theſe contradictory clauſes in the ſame ſtatute rendered Henry arbiter of the lives of his ſubjects, ſince, on the one hand, they were injoined to ſubmit to the King's will in matters of religion, without however knowing what he would pleaſe to preſcribe, and, on the other, were forbid to do any thing contrary to the laws. Conſequently, in caſe the King commanded any thing repugnant to law, they were liable to be proſecuted by virtue of this ſtatute, whether, againſt law, they obeyed the King, or, in obedience to the law, refuſed to comply with his will. The acts paſſed in this reign are full of contradictions, which were not inſerted without deſign.

The parliament paſſed another bill, which carried no leſs marks of ſervitude. It was inacted, that a marriage already conſummated ſhould not be annulled on pretenſe of pre-contract, or any other impediment not mentioned in the law of God. Without doubt the parliament had, or perhaps feigned to have forgot, that the King's marriage with Ann Boleyn was annulled by reaſon of a pre-contract, and upon this ſame foundation, during this very parliament, they had approved the diſſolution of his marriage with Ann of Cleves. It is true, the King declared, it was not conſummated: but Catherine of Aragon proteſted the ſame thing with reſpect to her marriage with Prince Arthur, and yet it was decided, that a party concerned ſhould not be believed even upon oath, when there were preſumptions to the contrary. Theſe were real contradictions, but not regarded by King Henry. His aim was to legitimate Princeſs Elizabeth by virtue of the former branch of the act, and to remove, by the latter, the impediments in the canon law to his intended marriage with Catherine Howard, who was Ann Boleyn's couſin-german.

Law in Henry's favor concerning marriage.

Intent of the act.

Before the parliament broke up, the clergy of Canterbury-province, aſſembled in convocation, offered Henry a ſubſidy of four ſhillings in the pound, of all eccleſiaſtical preferments, to be paid in two years, in acknowledgment, as they ſaid in their addreſs, of his care to free the church of England from Papal tyranny. His Majeſty moſt willingly accepted their preſent; and his parliament knew better than to refuſe their approbation: but this ſufficed not to ſupply the King's neceſſities. In a few days, he demanded alſo money of the commons. Tho' for ſome time the parliament had been accuſtomed to ſubmit, without examination, to the King's pleaſure, this demand met with ſome ſort of oppoſition in the lower houſe: and, indeed, it could not but ſeem ſtrange, conſidering Henry was in peace with all the world; and beſide, he could not be ſuppoſed to have already conſumed the treaſures accruing from the ſuppreſſion of monaſteries. Some of the members repreſented, that if in time of univerſal peace, and within the compaſs of one year, the King had expended ſuch vaſt ſums, nothing remained but to give him all the lands in England, and even thoſe would not ſatisfy the expenſe of many years: but theſe ſpeeches produced no great effect. It was anſwered by the King's party, that he had laid out immenſe ſums in puting the coaſts in a defenſible condition, and that maintaining his ſubjects in the tranquillity they injoyed coſt him more than the heavieſt war. Theſe reaſons, weak as they were, paſſed for inconteſtible, and the commons granted the King a ſubſidy as large as if he had been actually ingaged in a perilous war. This is a third proof of the parliament's ſlavery. Mean while, the people could not conceive what was become of all the money their Sovereign had lately handled, and which might reaſonably have ſupplied all his occaſions for ſeveral years.

The parliament diſſolved.

This parliament, which had given Henry ſuch great teſtimonies of unbounded compliance, was diſſolved the twenty-fourth of July: but the King was pleaſed firſt to requite his ſubjects with a free and general pardon, as it was called, tho' its exceptions limited the benefit to very few perſons. All thoſe were excluded who had been condemned for denying the King's ſupremacy, or for tranſgreſſing ſome one of the ſix articles of his Bloody Statute, and even ſuch as were only accuſed of theſe crimes, which were then unpardonable. The counteſs of Saliſbury, cardinal Pole's mother, and Thomas Cromwell were by name excepted.

As Cromwell's execution had been defered, he was in ſome hope of obtaining his pardon, and the more, as having writ to the King a very ſubmiſſive letter, he was ſo moved with it, that he cauſed it to be read thrice: but the ſollicitations of the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner, ſeconded by thoſe of Catherine Howard, who acted in their favor, rendered ineffectual all the efforts of that unhappy priſoner. King Henry ſigned a warrant for his being beheaded, the twenty-eighth of July, about ſix weeks after his condemnation. As Cromwell left a ſon of whom he was extremely fond, he would not uſe any expreſſions on the ſcaffold which might prove to his detriment. He contented himſelf with ſhewing that he willingly ſubmited to the ſentence the law had paſſed on him. He prayed for the King's proſperity, and declared he died in the profeſſion of the Catholic religion (1). Theſe laſt words were variouſly interpreted, according to the paſſions and prejudices of both factions, in matters of religion. Tho' it was certain, Cromwell had lived in the Lutherans ſentiments, yet the adverſe party maintained, he recanted at his death, and that by the Catholic religion was to be underſtood the old creed, profeſſed in the kingdom before all the innovations. The others pretended, theſe words ought to be taken in a more general ſenſe, and at moſt to imply only the belief which was then eſtabliſhed. However this be, the care Cromwell took, when he came to die, to ſay nothing which might offend the King, turned to the advantage of his ſon Gregory, who was this very year created a peer of England, by the title of lord Cromwell. The office of Vicegerent, injoyed by his father, died with him, none deſiring a ſtation ſo obnoxious to envy, and ſo fatal to the firſt poſſeſſor: beſide, the duke of Norfolk and biſhop of Wincheſter, who were then in great credit, took care not to ſollicit the King to fill a poſt which would ingage the perſon who held it to imploy his whole intereſt to obſtruct all accommodation with Rome.

Some days after Cromwell's death, was beheld at London a ſpectacle which ſtrangely imbaraſſed both parties. This was a groupe of men all at once ſentenced and executed. Some for denying the King's ſupremacy; others for maintaining the Lutheran doctrines. Among theſe laſt were Robert Barnes, doctor of divinity, Thomas Gerard, and William Jerom (2). Theſe three being impeached before the parliament, were condemned to be burned, on a general accuſation of ſowing hereſy, perverting the Scriptures, and maintaining errors deſtructive of religion, without the act's mentioning any particulars, and, in all appearance, without the parliament's examining the proofs. By the ſame act were condemned to ſuffer a like death four other men; of whom one was accuſed of aſſerting the Papal authority; another for holding correſpondence with cardinal Pole; a third for deſigning to ſurpriſe Calais; a fourth for harboring a rebel; and laſtly, three more convicted of denying the King's ſupremacy. All theſe were burned or hanged at the ſame time and place. It is to be preſumed, they were not admited to ſpeak for themſelves, ſince Barnes, after a declaration of his faith to the people, aſked the ſheriff, whether he knew why he was to ſuffer. The ſheriff anſwering, he did not; he turned to the ſtake, and ſaid, the puniſhment he was going to ſuffer plainly taught him the crime of which he was ſuppoſed to be guilty. He prayed however for the King, and even for Gardiner, whom he ſuſpected to be the author of his death. That prelate attempted to clear himhimſelf by a printed apology; but had the misfortune not to be believd (3).

HENRY VIII. AN' 1540.

On the eighth of Auguſt, Catherine Howard, the duke of Norfolk's niece (4) was declared Queen, King Henry having, ſome time before, married her privately. She was ſo devoted to the duke her uncle, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, that ſhe was intirely guided by their counſels. As ſhe had a great aſcendant over the King, very probably ſhe would have induced him to abandon himſelf to the guidance of theſe two miniſters, who were preparing to procure by her means great alterations in religion, had not her fall, which will be preſently related, confounded their projects. However, they improved as much as poſſible ſo favorable a juncture, to ſtrike at the reformation and the reformed. Certainly Cranmer was then in a moſt perilous ſituation. He could not doubt that the authors of Cromwell's ruin, wiſhed his deſtruction with a like ardor, nay, were privately working it. Complaints of him were already heard in ſeveral places, and even a member of parliament ſaid openly in the houſe, he was the protector and head of the innovators. Undoubtedly, all this would have taken effect, could his adverſaries have had a little more time to prepare their engines: but as they were ſenſible King Henry had for him a real eſteem, they purpoſed to proceed gradually, plainly perceiving they could not, without danger to themſelves, preſs his ruin ſo directly as they had done Cromwell's. Beſide, there was but one article which gave them any advantage upon Cranmer; namely, religion, in which point alſo he had been extremely cautious, well knowing that the way to advance the reformation under ſuch a Prince as Henry, was not to oppoſe his will directly.

Deſigns againſt Cranmer. Burnet.

It was not long before the alterations Cromwell's diſgrace, and Catherine Howard's advancement had produced at court became very viſible. The commiſſioners, appointed to draw up a declaration of the Chriſtian doctrine, having preſented their work to the King, he ordered it to be immediately publiſhed. Tho' this declaration corrected ſundry abuſes, the Romiſh faction had ſo prevailed that, inſtead of promoting, it ſenſibly put back the reformation, as readily appears by the abſtract Burnet gives of this performance in his Hiſtory of the Reformation of England. However, as ſeveral principles were laid down which might be of great utility at a juncture more favorable, the reformers were glad, in hopes theſe principles would ſerve one day to deſtroy the errors advanced in that expoſition, or declaration. On the other hand, the Popiſh party fancied they were conſiderable gainers, becauſe they therein beheld laid down dogmas whereto, in all probability, the reformers would never conſent, and hoped this oppoſition would draw Henry's indignation upon their whole party. As for themſelves, having conſtantly expreſſed a moſt implicit compliance to the King's will, they intended to purſue the ſame courſe, in order to put him intirely into the diſpoſition they wiſhed. Other commiſſioners, who were ordered to reform the Miſſals, or Maſs-books, made ſo ſlight alterations that, excepting a few razures of thoſe collects in which the Pope was prayed for (1), there was nothing changed, nor was it neceſſary to re-print the ſaid Miſſals. Thus by the duke of Norfolk's and Gardiner's credit, ſupported by the new Queen, archbiſhop Cranmer, and thoſe of his party, ſaw approaching a ſtorm whereby, to all appearance, they would be all overwhelmed. Perhaps it was very fortunate for them that King Henry, was, for ſome time, by other affairs, diverted from his attention to what concerned religion.

The Emperor breaks his word with Francis. Du Bellai. Mezerai.

The Emperor's paſſage thro' France ſeemed at firſt to create a ſincere reconciliation between him and King Francis. During his ſtay at Paris, he poſitively promiſed to give the duchy of Milan to the duke of Orleans: but when Francis preſſed him to ſign the inſtrument of inveſtiture, he anſwered, "That ſuch a deed would be looked on "as extorted, if dated in France, and that it was "more honorable both for himſelf and his Gallic "Majeſty that it ſhould be ſigned in ſome one of the "Netherland cities." Afterwards, when he was out of France, he found ſome freſh excuſe not to perform his promiſe. Mean while, he humbled the Gantois, and puniſhed them ſeverely for the trouble they had given him of a journey to Flanders. After that, when Francis claimed his promiſe, he loaded it with ſuch reſtrictions that it was eaſy to perceive he had no mind to part with a territory whereby Spain had a communication with his other dominions in Italy and Germany. Francis vexed to be thus deceived, turned out of favor chancellor Poyet, and conſtable Montmorency, who had counſeled him to rely on Charles's word of honor.

Begining of a quarrel between Francis and Henry. Hall. Herbert.

Towards the cloſe of the year 1540, certain diſputes between Francis and Henry uſhered in the begining of a miſunderſtanding which finally produced a war. Francis ordered a fortreſs to be erected at Ardres, and a bridge to be made over to the Engliſh pale: but the governor of Calais not ſuffering this incroachment, ſent a detachment of his gariſon and beat down the bridge. The French repaired that damage, and it was by the Engliſh a ſecond time demoliſhed. Hereupon the King of France ordered marſhal de Biez to levy troops in Picardy. Henry re-inforced the gariſon of Calais, and repaired the fortifications. Mean while the two Kings willing to avoid a rupture on this ſlight occaſion, agreed to ſend commiſſioners upon the ſpot, with powers to adjuſt the difference: but this conference producing no good effect, each provided for his defenſe in caſe of attack.

Foundation of the Jeſuits order.

It was this year that the famous order of Jeſuits was founded by a bull of Pope Paul III, dated the twenty-ſeventh of September.

AN' 1541. Henry fears nothing from the Emperor and Pope.

The uneaſineſs Charles V, for ſome time, had given Henry, was now in a manner diſſipated, ſince Francis had been diſappointed in the affair of Milan. Henry was ſufficiently acquainted with that Prince's genius and character, eaſily to foreſee that he would naturally ſoon break with the Emperor. A war between theſe two Monarchs could not but be advantageous to Henry. It would procure him quiet, and inable him to preſerve that equality of power which was the real and only firm foundation of his own and his kingdom's ſecurity. So, not having any thing to apprehend from either Pope, Emperor, King of France, or his own ſubjects, whoſe attempts muſt be fruitleſs without aſſiſtance from abroad, he ſolely confined himſelf to domeſtic affairs. He had chiefly in view two particulars. The firſt was, to preſerve and even extend the authority he had acquired. The ſecond, to be mindful that religion ſuffered not any innovations, but ſuch as he himſelf judged reaſonable. Theſe two points wholly ingroſſed him: as he was thereon poſitive, and the parliament durſt not oppoſe his will, it may be readily ſuppoſed that none of his miniſters had the courage to contradict him in any of his purpoſes: ſo that it was himſelf alone who ordered all things according to his caprice, his council only approving his motions; nevertheleſs, as well in the council, as throughout his realm, were two oppoſite parties with reſpect to religion: but every one had his eyes conſtantly fixed on the King, ſedulous to diſcover his thoughts for fear of deviating from him in ſentiment.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1541.

He is abſolute in his kingdom.

Cranmer's character. Burnet.

Archbiſhop Cranmer was at the head of thoſe who wiſhed a greater reformation. He was ſtill greatly in King Henry's eſteem, eſpecially on account of his integrity: but ſincerity, which he profeſſed, rendered him unfit for political affairs, in a court where, inſtead of liſtening to reaſon, juſtice and equity, the Sovereign's pleaſure was only to be conſidered.

Audley's.

Chancellor Audley was a perſon of good ſenſe. He ſerved the reformers whenever he could do it without danger to himſelf: but he was too much a courtier to inſiſt on what he judged reaſonable, if the King was againſt it.

The duke of Norfolk's.

The duke of Norfolk was as diſtinguiſhable for his merit as his birth. He was counted a good general, but was ſtill a better courtier. Ever ſubmiſſive to the King's will, he outwardly approved whatever he was pleaſed to command him: but in private he lamented all the late innovations in religion, and could not indure either the reformation or the reformed. He would have rejoiced to ſee his Sovereign reconciled to the Pope; but the ſmall appearance of their reconciliation made him very cautious how he offended ſo unforgiving a maſter: nevertheleſs, as Henry was not always in the ſame diſpoſition, the duke found frequent occaſion to ſerve his party, particularly in chaſtiſing thoſe who approved not the ſix articles, and were ſo daring as openly to expreſs ſuch diſlike. In a word, he was as head of the Pope's and the old religion's favorers: but he carefully concealed from Henry his inclination for the former; and as for the latter, he ſhewed his zeal only in ſupporting what his royal maſter had retained.

Gardiner's.

Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was in the ſame ſentiments, and obſerved a like conduct: but he was very far from being in like eſtimation with King Henry, who nevertheleſs uſed him becauſe he was pliant and dextrous, and had in foreign affairs a knowledge ſomewhat extenſive. As this knowledge rendered him of greater inſight than any of the other Engliſh miniſters, he ſometimes ingaged his maſter to take ſteps whoſe conſequences might be advantageous to his party, and of which the King himſelf did not always know the motive. By a blind ſubmiſſion to the will of his Prince he maintained ſome degree of favor, being convinced himſelf, and having alſo convinced his friends, that his compliance was the only means to procure a revocation of what had been done againſt the Holy Father.

Bonner's.

Bonner, biſhop of London, was alſo one of the chiefs of that ſame faction, yet was always ready to ſacrifice all to his fortune. He was naturally bold, paſſionate, and exceſſively cruel, as on many occaſions he too plainly evidenced. As he was a man of very ſmall merit, he ſupported himſelf by making court to thoſe who were in favor, and by taking the King's will for the rule of his actions.

The new Queen's.

Queen Catherine blindly followed the duke of Norfolk her uncle's directions, and used what power she had over her royal consort to support the credit of those who hated the reformation.

In this situation was the court, when King Henry, freed from his foreign affairs, was wholly busied in what passed within his own dominions. His realms however injoyed a profound tranquillity, by reason the terror wherewith people were seized had silenced all contradiction. In December last year, Henry began the foundation of his new bishopricks, by converting the abbey of Westminster into a bishop's See. In this year, 1541, he founded three more, Chester, Gloucester and Peterborough, and the year insuing Oxford and Bristol. These foundations, with a few others of no great importance, were the only charitable uses to which he applied the immense treasures acquired by suppressing the abbies. His courtiers magnified these pious acts, while others took notice of the little proportion between seven or eight thousand pounds per annum, imployed in these uses, and what accrued from the desolation of near seven hundred religious houses.

Henry declares heretics all those who reject his exposition of Christian doctrine. Herbert. Burnet.

Mean while, Henry was desirous of expressing his zeal for religion, as if his sole aim was to procure the eternal salvation of his people. The book of the exposition of Christian Faith being printed, he thereto prefixed a certain ordinance, declaring all those to be heretics who believed more or less than was contained in that book (1): however, as it was not possible that all should conform to it, and it does not appear any person suffered on that score during the course of this year, his Majesty had probably given some intimations, that he required not his said ordinance to be rigorously executed.

Francis prepares to make war upon the Emperor. P. Daniel.

While Henry was cogratulating himself on his triumphing over the Pope, and injoying a tranquillity which the court of Rome had in vain attempted to disturb, the eyes of all Europe were attentive to what passed between their Imperial and Gallic Majesties, and to the preparations making in Turky. The war between Charles and Francis was on the point of being renewed, but most unseasonably for that Emperor, at a juncture when Sultan Sulyman was preparing to invade Hungary, on occasion of the death of John Zapol, competitor of Ferdinand King of the Romans. These two Princes, after long contending for the Hungarian diadem, being finally tired of hostilities, were agreed that Zapol should, during his life, hold what he possessed, with a regal title, but that, on his decease, the crown should descend to Ferdinand. Zapol, dying and leaving a son named Stephen, under the guardianship of his mother, Ferdinand expected that the treaty should be executed, and would have taken possession of all Hungary. But young Zapol's mother implored the protection of Sulyman, who readily complied, intending to improve this dissension to render himself master of Hungary, and penetrate afterwards into the Imperial territories.

Charles's artifice to divert Sultan Sulyman from invading Hungary.

Charles V, perceiving Hungary menaced with a formidable invasion, which might be of fatal consequence to Germany, used all his art to pacify the Protestants, yet without giving them any satisfaction, indeavoring only to amuse them, and obtain some assistance against the Turk. On the other hand, he labored to persuade Sulyman, that he was in perfect union with the Kings of France and England, that the dread of a general league of the Christian Princes might divert him from his design. Wherefore, he tried to amuse Francis, with puting him in hopes he would bestow the Netherlands on his second son, and erect them into a kingdom; and at the same time, he sent intimations to the Ottoman Porte that this affair was in a manner concluded. Francis fell not into the snare: but hearing from all parts, that the Emperor's ministers every where gave out that this negociation was on the point of conclusion, he resolved to send embassadors to Venice and Constantinople, to undeceive the Turkish Emperor and Venetian senate. He chose for these embassies Rincon and Fregoso, who set out in order to pass through Italy: but marquis Del Guasto, governor of Milan, having notice that they were to imbark at Turin and go down the Po, caused them to be so narrowly watched that they were murdered in the boat. Francis made great noise about this assassination; but the Emperor gave him no satisfaction. This was a fresh occasion of rupture between the two Monarchs.

His embassadors assassinated on the river Po.

About the same time, Charles called a diet at Ratisbon for the fifth of April. As it was then no proper juncture to disturb the Protestants, this diet finally determined on granting them a second delay, which was stiled The Interim, that they might continue quiet, and more readily ingage to furnish supplies against the Ottomans.

Interim granted to the German Protestants. Sleidan.

Mean while, the King of the Romans ordered Buda, capital of Hungary, to be invested, in hope of reducing that city before the Turks should arrive: but the siege proving more difficult than was expected, the Turks had time to relieve it, and gave battle to the Germans, over whom they obtained a signal victory. Soon after Sulyman, repairing to Hungary, made his entry into Buda, and, under color of taking young Zapol under his protection, became master of that metropolis and great part of the kingdom.

Battle of Buda gained by the Turks.

During this Charles, having dissolved the diet, instead of marching into Hungary to assist the King his brother, took the route of Italy, and imbarking at Porto-Venere with an army thirty thousand strong, sailed for Africa, to make war upon Barba-rossa, who had made himself King of Algiers. This procedure gave rise to sundry speculations. It was ridiculed at the French court, as if instead of fighting the Turks, he had sought a pretense to fly from them: but as the African expedition was projected the begining of the year, and Charles's troops were already on the Italian coast, it is certain he would not have had time to relieve the King of the Romans had he attempted to march his army into Hungary. However this be, he landed his army near Algiers, the twenty-second of October: but two days after, a sudden and violent storm destroyed part of his fleet. This accident obliged him to re-imbark the begining of November, after having lost good part of his troops and ships (2). It is pretended, Francis, out of mere generosity, would not proclaim war against him, while imployed in this expedition: however it is difficult to believe that Francis, who actually held intelligence with Sulyman, and afterwards scrupled not making use of the Turks assistance, should stick at interrupting the designs his enemy Charles V had formed against the African Infidels.

Henry with pleasure beheld the King of France and Turks were going to find the Emperor imployment, which would prevent his thinking of England. But tho' in that respect he was easy, he was however in some pain with regard to the King of Scotland, who, tho' his nephew, had no reason to love him, and could easily assist the English malecontents, who were very numerous in the northern counties.

counties. The King of England was alſo apprehenſive that a religious zeal would carry his ſaid nephew to ſome attempt againſt him, becauſe he began to ſuffer himſelf to be governed by his clergy who, under color of perſuading him to deſtroy hereſy, ſtrongly attached him to the Pope's intereſt. For diverſe years paſſed, the Reformed had been adjudged to the flames in Scotland: but theſe executions produced there the ſame effects as elſewhere, that is, they increaſed, inſtead of leſſening the number, and yet the eccleſiaſtics were ſtill obſtinately determined on rooting them out with fire and ſword.

Burnet.

James V was a Prince greatly addicted to pleaſure, and very greedy of money: beſide, he had ſeveral natural children whom he could not inrich as he wiſhed, becauſe he had exhauſted his treaſure in needleſs expenſes. In his court were two parties, one of which favored the King of England and the Reformed, and the other, chiefly conſiſting of churchmen, was utterly againſt Henry, and continually ſtrove to induce the King to extirpate all who ſwerved from the ancient belief. The former indeavored to perſuade him to imitate the King of England his uncle, and ſecure a large revenue by ſuppreſſing the monaſteries. The adverſe faction repreſented to him that, by ſtrictly executing the laws againſt heretics, he would raiſe by forfeited eſtates more than a hundred thouſand crowns per annum. After ſome conſideration, James cloſed with this latter advice, and ſuffering the clergy to take their own courſe, there followed in Scotland a violent perſecution (1).

Henry reſumes his deſign of gaining the King of Scotland. Burnet. Buchanan.

Henry, perceiving the King his nephew to be thus governed by perſons wholly addicted to the court of Rome, feared he would finally be led to unite againſt him with the Pope and Emperor. This apprehenſion ſeemed to him the better grounded, as he could ſcarcely any longer rely on proper aid from the King of France, who was wont to direct the court of Scotland, becauſe his ſaid quondam friend was grown extremely cold to him. Whereupon, he reſolved to imploy all his art to prevail on the King his nephew to follow his example in breaking with the Pope. To this end he diſpatched embaſſadors to deſire an interview at York, not queſtioning that, in an amicable conference, he ſhould have eloquence enough to perſuade him to what he pleaſed. James accepted the overture, and promiſed to come to York, whither Henry repaired and expected him: but the Scotiſh eccleſiaſtics and their whole party ſo beſtired themſelves to prevent this interview, the conſequence whereof they perceived, that they at length ſucceeded, and prevailed with James to ſtudy ſome pretenſe to be excuſed.

Henry in vain expects him at York.

Mean while Henry, wholly ignorant of this change, impatiently waited at York for the day appointed for this interview. In this interval, he iſſued out a proclamation, that all who had been for want of juſtice, agrieved by any of his miniſters, ſhould come to him and his council for redreſs. His aim was to throw all former miſcarriages on Cromwell, and put his ſubjects, particularly the northern people, in hopes of better times (2). But while he was preparing for the King of Scotland's reception, he received letters of excuſe, that he could not have the honor of waiting upon him. He was extremely inſenſed, and this refuſal, which he deemed a very groſs affront, ſoon cauſed a breach between the two kingdoms. But his vexation at this affair was not comparable to the unexpected affliction he met with on his return to London.

Proclamation in favor of all the people. Hall. Stow. Burnet. Vol. I. p. 311. Herbert.

Since his laſt marriage, he daily glorified the Almighty for the happineſs he injoyed with his Queen, and on all occaſions publicly teſtified his extreme ſatisfaction: nay, during his journey to York, deſiring to give God thanks in a manner ſuitable to the ſentiments of his heart, he ordered his confeſſor to draw up a particular thankſgiving, and prayed him to join with him in the ſame. All this ſhewed his eſteem and tender affection for the Queen, who ſeemed to have a like fondneſs for him: but, on his arrival at London, he heard tydings which it would have been well for him never to have known. While he was at York, one John Laſſels went to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who remained at London, and told him, that his ſiſter (who had long been a domeſtic of the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk *) had aſſured him, that the Queen had been extremely leud before and ſince her marriage, and that, among others, two men, namely Dirham and Mannock (3), had injoyed her very frequently. Cranmer imparting this matter to the chancellor and ſome others of the privy council, it was agreed, that the archbiſhop ſhould thereof inform the King immediately on his return to London, tho' they were not ignorant of the danger to which they expoſed themſelves if the accuſation could not be proved: but, on this occaſion, it was no leſs dangerous to be ſilent.

Cranmer not knowing how to execute his commiſſion, choſe to ſet it down in writing, and put it in the King's hands, deſiring him to read it in private. He ordered therefore the lord privy-ſeal to examine Laſſels in private. Laſſels firmly maintained what he had ſaid, upon the report he had from his ſiſter, who confirmed what ſhe had told her brother. On theſe depoſitions, ſome pretext was uſed to arreſt Dirham and Mannock, who diſcovered in their examination more circumſtances than were deſired. They confeſſed not only that they had lain with the Queen, but alſo that three court ladies, her confidents, were commonly eye-witneſſes to her leud practiſes. One of the three was lady Rochford, who accuſed lord Rochford her huſband of a criminal commerce with his ſiſter Queen Ann Boleyn (4). They farther depoſed, that the King being at Lincoln, one Culpeper, by the lady Rochford's means, was brought into the Queen's chamber about eleven at night, and remained there 'till four in the morning, and that when he went away the Queen preſented him with a rich cap *. Moreover, the Queen had taken Dirham into her ſervice, which ſhewed ſhe intended to continue the ſame courſe of life. The Queen at firſt denied all:

An' 1542. Act of attainder againſt the Queen and her complices. Burnet. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The commiſſioners named by the parliament to examine Queen Catherine reported, that the facts ſhe was accuſed of were ſufficiently proved. Whereupon both houſes declared her guilty, and petitioned the King that ſhe might be puniſhed capitally, together with lady Rochford, complice of her leud practiſes, the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk, lord William Howard, and his lady (2), the counteſs of Bridgewater, five other women, and four men, for miſpriſion of treaſon, in concealing what they knew of the Queen's vicious life. Here again may be obſerved the ſervitude of the parliament, who did not dare to condemn Catherine and her complices, without knowing whether the King would be pleaſed to ſuffer them to be puniſhed. They proceeded not ſo with regard to Ann Boleyn and lord Rochford, becauſe King Henry's authority had not reached that height as at the time whereof I am now treating. The King conſenting they ſhould be puniſhed, they were condemned to die by an act of attainder. The ſaid act contained likewiſe a very extraordinary clauſe, declaring traitors, all who had any knowledge of a Queen's incontinence, and did not reveal it: that if the King or his ſucceſſors ſhould intend to eſpouſe any perſon as a virgin, if ſhe, not being ſo, did not declare the ſame to the King, it ſhould be high treaſon; and all who knew it and did not reveal it, were guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon: that if the Queen, or the Princeſs of Wales, ſhould procure any, by meſſages or words, to know them carnally; or any other by meſſages or words ſhould ſollicit them; they, their counſellors and abettors, are to be adjudged high traitors.

*By his letters patent. The Queen beheaded. Hall. Burnet. Herbert. Stow.

Henry giving his aſſent to this act *, the Queen and lady Rochford were beheaded the twelfth of February. The Queen ſtood to what ſhe had confeſſed, concerning the miſcarriages of her former life before ſhe was married; but denied, upon her ſalvation, that ſhe had ever defiled the King's bed. As for lady Rochford, ſhe died univerſally unlamented: but her fate and infamy ſerved at leaſt to raiſe again the reputation of lord Rochford her huſband, and of Queen Ann Boleyn, whoſe ruin ſhe procured by her evidence, which her own condemnation rendered generally ſuſpected.

This act of parliament cenſured. Burnet.

The extreme ſeverity of the parliament to Queen Catherine's relations was highly cenſured by the public. It was deemed quite unnatural to puniſh a grandmother for not diſcovering her grand-daughter's incontinence. Accordingly Henry moderated this unjuſt rigor by pardoning moſt of thoſe who were condemned, ſome of whom however remained long in priſon. As for the laſt clauſe, which made it treaſon for a woman, courted by the King, not to reveal the loſs of her virginity, it was turned into ridicule: people jeſtingly ſaid, the Kings of England for the future could only marry widows, there not being any reputed maid who would run the hazard of being attainted of treaſon, in caſe the King happened not to like her (3).

Henry VIII. An' 1542.

This affair being ended, the parliament confirmed an act paſſed in Ireland, whereby that iſland was erected into a kingdom. From thenceforward the Kings of England inſerted among their titles, that of King of Ireland, whereas before they were ſtiled only Lords.

Ireland erected into a kingdom. Herbert. Hall. Stow.

Before the parliament broke up, Henry began in ſome meaſure to ſhew his intention to ſeize the colleges and hoſpitals as he had done the abbies. But the execution of this deſign was not exempt from difficulties. By the local ſtatutes of moſt of them, neither governors, preſidents, nor adminiſtrators had power to ſurrender the lands belonging to their houſes, without conſent of the whole ſociety: wherefore it was not eaſy to gain whole bodies of men, who were ſo much concerned to keep the revenues whereon they ſubſiſted: it is true, the King had prevailed with ſome, who were not bound by ſuch extraordinary ſtatutes, to reſign to him their houſes: but, as he had his eye upon all, ſome expedient was to be found for the reſt to follow this example, without violating their oath. To this end, all the local ſtatutes of colleges and hoſpitals were annulled by act of parliament, and the governors, preſidents and fellows were no more to be ſworn to the obſervance thereof. This obſtacle being removed, a few more were ſurrendered to the King. But this affair was not intirely finiſhed 'till 1545, by a far conciſer method.

An act to pave the way.

While King Henry's buſineſs was eaſily carrying on in the parliament, the convocation, which ſat at the ſame time, were much divided about the new tranſlation of the Bible, then on the point of being publiſhed. Many affirmed it abounded with faults, and to ſuffer it to be read before it was reviſed would be very injurious to the people. Gardiner moved this diſpute, in hopes this reviſal would take up ſome time, and the King in the interim might alter his mind (4). His party was ſo numerous, that he would have carried his point, had not Cranmer, who perceived his deſign, moved the King to refer the peruſing of the tranſlation to the two univerſities, where he had much more intereſt than in the convocation. Several biſhops ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, and ſome even entered a proteſtation againſt it (5). But all ſignified nothing, ſince the King declared it to be his pleaſure: nay, he granted, the twelfth of March, a privilege to a London bookſeller (6) to print the Bible in Engliſh. This gives occaſion to preſume, the univerſities reviſed not the tranſlation, ſince it was impoſſible they ſhould have examined it ſo ſpeedily.

On the other hand, he every where borrowed money to let them ſee his neceſſity. But for once the commons feigned not to underſtand his language, being unwilling to introduce the pernicious cuſtom of granting the King ſubſidies unaſked; beſide, as they were yet ignorant of the deſign of a war with Scotland, they ſaw no occaſion to offer him money: ſo, the parliament broke up without granting him any thing, except the act concerning colleges and hoſpitals, which was a ſeed the fruit whereof he was to gather in due ſeaſon.

He indeavors to hinder the King of France from aſſiſting Scotland. Herbert. Burnet. Vol. III. p. 155.

The war with Scotland being reſolved, Henry ſent ſir William Paget to France, to ſound King Francis, and try to hinder him by ſome treaty from aſſiſting the King of Scotland. The embaſſador's inſtructions were, to demand of the King of France, that the treaty of perpetual peace between France and England ſhould be renewed. Francis eaſily perceived ſome myſtery lay hid in this overture. As he knew Henry was diſpleaſed with the King of Scotland, he queſtioned not that he deſired a renewal of the peace, purpoſely to inſert in the new treaty ſome article to tie up his hands, and prevent him from aiding his ally. He anſwered therefore, that it was needleſs to renew a treaty the conditions whereof the King of England had not performed. The embaſſador replied, "That as "the treaty of peace conſiſted not of any condi- "tions, conſequently his maſter could not be ac- "cuſed of breaking them." But this diſpute was intirely founded on a miſtake. The embaſſador, by the treaty of peace, underſtood a private treaty of only a ſingle article; namely, That there ſhould be a perpetual peace between France and England: but Francis had in view certain other treaties ſigned the ſame day, and which belonged to the firſt, tho' this was written apart. It was this ſeparate treaty which Henry wanted to renew, imagining he ſhould thereby hinder Francis from aſſiſting the King of Scotland. But Francis's meaning was not that, under this pretenſe, Henry ſhould be ſuffered to cruſh one of the moſt ancient allies of France, and France not be at liberty to interpoſe: on the contrary, he deemed it a manifeſt breach of the peace, to attack his allies without any juſt cauſe. Mean while, as neither would mention the King of Scotland, tho' both had him in their thoughts, Francis, purpoſely to imbaraſs Henry, demanded his aſſiſtance to recover the Milaneſe, purſuant to former treaties. Henry required on his part, that Francis, anſwerably to his promiſe, ſhould aboliſh the Papal authority in France. Theſe reciprocal demands were more apt to produce a breach than a renewal of the treaties: beſide, the Engliſh had already commenced hoſtilities, by ſeizing certain French ſhips which they preſumed were pyrates, and the French had detained ſome Engliſh veſſels by way of repriſal. So, the embaſſador, having taken his leave without effecting any thing, reported to his maſter, that the King of France was ill-affected to him; that is, he would not, without oppoſing it, ſuffer the King of Scotland to be oppreſſed. This was the meaning of Francis's being ill-affected to England, he being at that time very far from deſiring a war with the Engliſh, ſince he was juſt on entering upon another which he had abundantly more at heart.

Embaſſy from France to the diet at Spire. Sleidan.

Francis was ſo inſenſed at Charles's wiles and inſincerity that, to proclaim war againſt him, he only waited to ſee him ſo imbroiled with the Smalcaldic league, that there ſhould be no farther hope of agreement. To foment this diſſenſion, he had ſent embaſſadors to the diet aſſembled at Spire, in February, under color of clearing himſelf from the pretended calumnies wherewith he was aſperſed, and particularly from the imputation of being in alliance with the Turks. His embaſſadors complained to the diet, in very ſtrong terms, of the murder of Rincon and Fregoſo, pretending that Rincon was ſent to Conſtantinople purely to diſſuade Sultan Sulyman from his deſign of carrying war into Germany. However, in the ſequel of their diſcourſe, they would have perſuaded the German Princes, that it was their intereſt to fortify their frontier towns, and abandon Hungary to the Turks: ſo their preſenſe at the diet having produced no great effect, they returned very diſſatisfied.

The Pope offers a council at Trent. Herbert.

Not long after their departure, the Pope's nuncio offered to the diet, in his Sanctity's name, a council at Trent. The Catholics gladly accepted the offer, and thanked the nuncio: but the Proteſtants rejected it, becauſe they would not have a council called by their adverſary, and in a ſuſpicious place, ſince the city of Trent appertained to the King of the Romans. The diet however ended to the Emperor's and Ferdinand's ſatisfaction, after having unanimouſly reſolved to give them a powerful aſſiſtance, under conduct of the elector of Brandenburg.

The council of Trent called.

Notwithſtanding Pope Paul III's offer had been rejected by the German Proteſtants, his ſaid Holineſs called a council at Trent for November following, by a bull of the twenty-ſecond of May. But this was only to amuſe the world: he was very ſenſible that, when a war between the Emperor and France was going to commence, there would be obſtacles enough to hinder the council from aſſembling.

And indeed, at this very juncture, King Francis was preparing for the field five ſeveral armies, wherewith to attack Charles in as many different places at once; namely, Rouſſillon, Luxemburg, Piedmont, Flanders and Brabant: but the ſucceſs anſwered not his expectations. The extraordinary effort he made this year to invade his enemy ſerved only to diſable him from doing the like in his own defenſe when attacked. The Dauphin beſieged Perpignan in vain. The duke of Orleans, his brother, took Luxemburg and Montmedy: but theſe places were retaken before the campain cloſed. As for the other three armies, they performed nothing conſiderable.

Henry reſolves on a war with Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert. Burnet.

While Francis was vainly indeavoring to be revenged on the Emperor, Henry came to a final reſolution of making war upon Scotland. He had been in hope that, in the expected conference with the King his nephew, he ſhould perſuade him to renounce the Papal authority, and was extremely concerned to ſee himſelf diſappointed. This affair ſeemed to him of the utmoſt importance becauſe, not having much to fear from abroad, where the naval forces were not comparable to his, Scotland was the only country which could give him any uneaſineſs. From thence alone could the Engliſh male-contents receive any ſuccors, and he remembered, with terror, the danger he ſhould have run when the rebels were in arms in the north, had they been ſupported by a Scotiſh army. In this war therefore upon Scotland, his aim was not to make conqueſts, but to bend the Scotiſh King to his will by force, ſince he could not do it by fair means: this he deemed abſolutely neceſſary, in order to procure a ſettled peace. At the time of the northern rebellion, the junctures were very favorable to him; for, being then in ſtrict union with France, King James could not ingage to ſupport the Engliſh male-contents without the concurrence of King Francis, who, inſtead of approving ſuch a deſign, would have rather diverted him from it: but affairs were now on another foot, ſince Henry could no longer rely on the King of France's friendſhip. It is true, that Prince was not to be much feared, while while at war with the Emperor; but he conſidered that the equality of theſe two Monarchs forces would, probably, oblige them to make peace very ſoon, and this peace, in which no doubt the Pope would interpoſe, neceſſarily be to his prejudice; nay, it was a queſtion whether it would not occaſion a league againſt him, and the King of Scotland join in it. In that caſe, England could be invaded in the north with more eaſe, as the northern counties were moſt inclined to rebel. It was therefore of very great conſequence to Henry to gain the King of Scotland to his intereſt, ſince, being ſecured on that ſide, invaſions were not much to be feared, he deeming ſuch attempts in a manner impoſſible, conſidering the ſuperiority of his naval forces.

He intended to uſe two methods whereby to gain the King of Scotland in the propoſed conference. The firſt was, to let him know that it was in his power to ſecure to him the ſucceſſion of the crown of England, after his ſon Edward, or remove him from it, ſince, by the act of parliament made for that perpoſe, he could call to the ſucceſſion his daughters Mary and Elizabeth, or exclude them for ever. In the former caſe, King James could not pretend to the crown, 'till after the poſterity of theſe two Princeſſes became extinct; but, in the latter caſe, he came immediately after Prince Edward: as therefore to gain two degrees was for the Scotiſh King a very conſiderable advantage, Henry hoped he would not be ſo imprudent as to ſlight it. The ſecond means he deſigned to make uſe of to win that Prince was, to lay before him the advantages which would accrue to him in caſe he renounced the Pope, as well by reaſon of the facility this would give him to ſucceed to the crown of England, if there ſhould be occaſion, as by the riches he would acquire in ſuppreſſing the monaſteries of Scotland. As James was very greedy of money, Henry doubted not ſucceeding by this ſecond method, even ſhould the firſt prove ineffectual. He was therefore extremely vexed to ſee himſelf diſappointed of his hopes, by the King his nephew's refuſal to meet him at York. He thereby perceived the too great influence his new Queen had over him, and even ſuſpected all was owing to the intrigues of his Holineſs, the Emperor, and perhaps of King Francis: wherefore, deſpairing to ſucceed in his project by fair means, he reſolved to attempt accompliſhing it by force.

The deſign of this war.

Scotland was little able to reſiſt England, without the aſſiſtance of France: but Francis was ſo imployed, that there was no likelihood of his interpoſing in the quarrel. Henry hoped therefore, if he could gain at firſt ſome advantage, he ſhould render the Scots leſs intractable, and more eaſily diſpoſe the King his nephew to liſten to his propoſals. Thus the war he intended to make upon Scotland was properly deſigned to oblige the Scots to a compliance with his deſires, and not founded on caprice only, or to be revenged for the affront he had received, as the hiſtorians pretend. Hollingſh. However, as he could not diſcover the real motives without doing himſelf a prejudice, he pretended a violation of the truce, James's denial of certain lands of ſmall value lying on the frontiers, and his reception of diverſe Engliſh rebels: but as all this was not very capable of deceiving the world, he bethought himſelf of reviving the Kings of England's quondam pretenſions to the ſovereignty of Scotland. To that purpoſe, he ſet out a very ample declaration, wherein was inſerted the memorial largely treated of under the reigns of Edward I, and Henry VII, containing the pretended proofs of the homage Scotland had formerly done to England. This declaration was however ſo ambiguouſly expreſſed, that it plainly appeared Henry was willing to have it in his power to quit his pretenſions without injuring his honor. It is intirely needleſs to repeat the contents of this memorial. It will ſuffice to obſerve, that the Engliſh writers ſpeak of it as if the ſovereignty of the Kings of England over Scotland was there demonſtrated, and that barely quoting it ſufficed to ſilence all reply. Doctor Burnet, tho' a Scot, ſeems to give into this opinion univerſally ſpread in England, ſince he ſpeaks of this memorial in his hiſtory of the reformation, without making the leaſt remark. Perhaps he did not think proper to combat the ſentiments of the Engliſh without any neceſſity, with regard to his hiſtory.

War with Scotland. Hollingſh. Herbert.

Henry publiſhed not his declaration 'till his army was juſt entering Scotland. His deſign was to ſurpriſe the Scots, which he believed the more eaſy, as there appeared not any juſt cauſe of rupture between the two kingdoms: but King James, having intelligence that levies were making in England, put himſelf in a poſture of defenſe, in caſe he ſhould be attacked. In the interim, he diſpatched away two embaſſadors to the King his uncle, in order to content him, if poſſible, or at leaſt to gain time 'till the King of France could ſend him aſſiſtance. Theſe embaſſadors were, on frivolous pretexts, long detained at the Engliſh court, nor did Henry, while buſied in making his preparations, vouchſafe them any anſwer; nay, they were not ſuffered to return but with his army, which was to enter their country under conduct of the duke of Norfolk, and where they were as priſoners. Two other embaſſadors of Scotland, who were going to London, meeting the Engliſh army on their march, were alſo detained 'till the army arrived at Berwick.

Buchanan.

Mean while King James, hearing the duke of Norfolk was marching towards the north at the head of twenty thouſand men, ſent to the frontiers a body of ten thouſand, commanded by George Gordon, expecting the reſt of the troops which, from different quarters, were marching to join him. But Gordon was not able to hinder the duke of Norfolk from entering Scotland, about the end of October, and ravaging the country north of the Tweed. After this ſhort expedition, the Engliſh army retired to Berwick, the ſeaſon, already very rigorous, having prevented their advancing farther. During this, King James ordered lord Maxwell to march with fifteen thouſand men, while the Engliſh were retiring to Berwick. The Scots pretend that, on notice of Maxwell's approach, the Engliſh retreated in ſuch confuſion, that they might have been eaſily defeated, had Gordon ventured to attack them; and that James was violently inraged againſt him for miſſing this blow. However this be, James perſonally heading his army, held a council of war, and appeared fully reſolved to give battle, let what would be the conſequence: but himſelf alone was of that opinion. On the contrary, the danger to which the kingdom would be expoſed, in caſe of a defeat, was ſtrongly repreſented to him. In ſhort, as he would not alter his reſolution, the generals and nobles told him, they would not obey him, if, without any neceſſity, he obſtinately expoſed the realm to ſo manifeſt a hazard. This oppoſition threw him into a fury. He ſwore he would puniſh their diſobedience, and called them all traitors, ſince they hindered him from obtaining, as he thought, a moſt certain victory. This notion had been put into his brain by cardinal Beaton, who aſſured him, "That he could not "poſſibly be vanquiſhed by ſuch heretics as the "Engliſh." The truth is, James had been ſomewhat diſordered in his intellects ever ſince he had unjuſtly put to death a nephew of the duke of Albany, whoſe apparition was continually preſent to his imagination. Wherefore, being exceſſively irritated to be thus diſobeyed, he left the command of

of his army to lord Maxwell, with orders to march towards the enemy, and remained himſelf within diſtance to join him, in caſe there was occaſion to ingage. But a few days after, as he was highly inſenſed againſt his generals, and withal greatly diffident of their loyalty, he gave to Oliver Sinclair, his favorite minion, a commiſſion in form to take on him the command of the army. The new general, very unfit for ſuch a ſtation, repairing to the camp, cauſed his patent to be publicly read, which gave univerſal offenſe, and bred ſuch diſcontent among the troops, that they began to diſperſe, when a band of five hundred Engliſh cavalry appeared on a hill, where they were poſted to obſerve the enemies motions: this ſight increaſed the confuſion among the Scots, who imagined the whole Engliſh army was approaching to give battle. In this condition, being without a general, ſince Maxwell's commiſſion was revoked and none would obey Sinclair, they choſe to retreat, but in a panic which permited them not to look behind and obſerve the inconſiderable number of their enemies. That body of Engliſh cavalry, obſerving this their diſorderly and precipitate flight, cloſely purſued them, and, without meeting any reſiſtance, ſlew great numbers, took priſoners ſeven lords, two hundred gentlemen, eight hundred ſoldiers, with twenty-four pieces of ordnance. Never was victory obtained with ſuch facility. Among the chief priſoners were the earls of Glencairn and Caſſilis, lord Maxwell, and Oliver Sinclair, the King's favorite.

The tidings of this diſaſter caſt King James into a deſperate melancholy, to which he was already too much inclined. His vexation was ſtill augmented on being informed, that a herald ſent by the duke of Norfolk had been aſſaſſinated by a certain Engliſh refugee. With terror he meditated on the fatal conſequences which might attend this accident, after his recent misfortune. So, imagining it would be impoſſible to free himſelf from his preſent perplexity, he was unable to reſiſt this exceſſive grief, which brought him to his grave the fourteenth of December 1542. Henry, ignorant of what paſſed in Scotland, had ordered the Scotiſh Priſoners to be brought to London, where they arrived the nineteenth of December. Next day they were conducted thro' the city from the Tower, where they had been confined, into the King's preſenſe at Weſtminſter. At firſt, he reproached them, for having, by their pernicious counſels, perſuaded their King to quarrel with him; and told them, they juſtly bore the puniſhment of a war raiſed by themſelves. Nevertheleſs, as he intended to make uſe of them to procure ſuch a peace as he deſired, he concluded his diſcourſe with ſome obliging expreſſions, and granted them more liberty, by diſtributing them under the cuſtody of diverſe of the nobility (1). The earl of Caſſilis had the good fortune to fall into the hands of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and to receive from him, during his ſhort ſtay at London, ſuch inſtructions as induced him to imbrace the reformation at his return to Scotland.

In a few days, advice of the Princeſs Mary of Scotland's birth, and of her royal father's death arriving together, Henry judged it a favorable juncture to unite Scotland with England, by matching his ſon Edward with the new Scotiſh Queen. He had the captive lords ſounded; and, finding them inclined to ſecond the overture, ſet them at liberty, on condition they would give hoſtages for their return, in caſe the projected alliance did not ſucceed. This condition being accepted, they were conducted to Newcaſtle, whence they proceeded homewards; having previouſly delivered the promiſed hoſtages. He projects a match between his ſon and the new Queen of Scotland; and diſmiſſes the priſoners. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The Engliſh parliament aſſembling the twenty-ſecond of January, granted the King a ſubſidy, as well for his charges in the Scotiſh war, as for his other occaſions. Herein the meaning was a war with France, whereof there was no longer room to doubt, ſince King Francis was on the point of concluding a league with the Emperor. The union which was in agitation between theſe two Monarchs, was like to be ſo favorable to the adherents of Rome and the old religion, that they queſtioned not but the deſtruction of the reformation in England approached. Nevertheleſs, at this very juncture, they had the mortification to ſee paſſed an act of parliament which greatly checked their promiſing expectations. This act, moved and finally obtained by Cranmer, ran, That lords, gentlemen and merchants, might have in their houſes the Bible in Engliſh, with certain other books of religion, mentioned in the act, for the inſtruction of their families: but it was expreſly forbid to print, ſell, buy, or keep any other religious books; and to preach or ſpeak againſt the ordinance of the year 1540. There was alſo a very conſiderable clauſe in this ſtatute, viz. That the offenders, if eccleſiaſtics, ſhould not be condemned to be burned 'till the third offenſe; and the puniſhment of lay-men, not extend beyond the forfeiture of goods and chattels (2). Moreover, the act allowed the party accuſed to bring witneſſes for his own purgation, which had never been practiſed before in the caſe of hereſy. Laſtly, it was inacted, that the accuſed ſhould be tried within a year at fartheſt after the indictment. But on the other hand, the law of ſix articles was confirmed, and the parliament left it in the King's power to annul or alter the act at his pleaſure. By this laſt clauſe Henry ſtill continued to be maſter of the lives of the reformed, ſince, by repealing this act, he could proſecute them upon the former ſtatutes.

Fifteen days after the parliament broke up, King Henry concluded with Charles V a league, which however was not publiſhed 'till June. It was not the intereſt of the Engliſh that their King ſhould join with the Emperor to augment his power; he being already but too potent. It would, on the contrary, have been much properer to have aſſiſted France, in order to keep the balance even: at leaſt, it is undeniable, that a neutrality would have been advantageous to England; but Henry's paſſion ran counter to the intereſt of his realms. He was extremely diſſatisfied with France on ſeveral accounts. Firſt, he obſerved in him a great indifference for his concerns, ever ſince he had not needed his aſſiſtance. Secondly, he now was convinced that all his promiſes to renounce, like him, the Papal authority, tended only to amuſe him: he knew Francis had on diverſe occaſions condemned his conduct with reſpect to religion, and ridiculed his marriages. Thirdly, he paid neither the yearly penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns, nor that of ten thouſand for the ſalt of Brouage, tho' bound by ſundry treaties: as for the debt of two millions, Francis indeed could produce acquitances for good part of that ſum; but then Henry had received no money, the acquitances being in lieu of the ſuccors he had voluntarily promiſed to lend him in his former wars; nevertheleſs, a very large debt ſtill remained wholly unaccounted for, and the debtor ſeemed never to think of giving him the leaſt ſatisfaction. Moreover, Henry had preſented the King of France with what was due to him from the Emperor, ſolely on condition he would perform the treaties, and complained that Francis had not been punctual. But what moſt offended Henry, was the obſtacles Francis had raiſed him in Scotland, by means of a faction which openly oppoſed his deſigns. Here was ſufficient cauſe for a breach, had the nation's intereſt been the ſame with the King's: but, in contrarieties of this kind, it rarely happens that the peoples advantage prevails over the Sovereign's. Henry reſolved therefore to make the King of France ſenſible, that it would have been worth his while to have expreſſed for him a greater regard, and to this end choſe to be reconciled with the Emperor, and join in a league with that Monarch.

The advantages of this league on the Emperor's ſide.

Charles V wiſhed nothing more ardently. He readily comprehended that, with the aſſiſtance of England, he ſhould ſoon bring the King of France to reaſon, and deſtroy all his hopes of recovering Milan by arms. His conſtant dread of Henry's uniting with France and the German Proteſtants, cauſed him to conſider the alliance with England as what would inable him to accompliſh his ambitious projects. He found his account much better in hindering Francis from ſeting foot again in Italy, and in cruſhing the Proteſtants, than in executing, or rather in trying to execute the Pope's ſentence againſt Henry; which enterpriſe, very probably, would not have concluded to his honor: beſide the death of his aunt, Queen Catherine, had greatly diminiſhed, and it may be intirely ſtifled his deſire to revenge her wrongs. So, at the very time he was complaining to all the Princes of Europe, that Francis held private intelligence with the Infidels, he ſcrupled not to court the alliance of an excommunicated King who, according to the principles of the Romiſh church, ought not to have been looked with leſs horror than the Turk. A ſingle difficulty only retarded the concluſion of this alliance. The Emperor would have Mary, Queen Catherine's daughter, acknowledged for legitimate, which Henry obſtinately refuſed: nay, he could not grant it without being himſelf the condemner of his divorce from Catherine, and of his whole procedure on that occaſion. He promiſed however that, purſuant to the power granted him by parliament, he would give Mary a place in the ſucceſſion; but would never conſent this article ſhould be inſerted in the treaty. The Emperor's friends in England adviſed him to be ſatisfied with this verbal promiſe, apprehenſive as they were that the league, whence they expected great advantages, would by this obſtacle be procraſtinated. Bonner, biſhop of London, who was diſpatched into Spain to negociate this buſineſs, moſt zealouſly labored its accompliſhment, in hopes that a union between the Emperor and King Henry would re-eſtabliſh religion in England on the ſame foot as before the divorce.

The treaty was therefore concluded at London, the eleventh of February 1543. It contained a league for England only, with what Henry held in Picardy; and, on the Emperor's part, for the Netherland Provinces under his dominion (1), without any mention of Spain or Germany. The league was to this effect:

That the Emperor and King of England ſhould ſend embaſſadors to the King of France, to reproach him, that ſolely by his inſtigation the Turks had invaded Chriſtendom: that therefore the two confederate Monarchs exhorted him to break his alliance with the Infidels, to hold them for enemies, and renounce his correſpondence with them: that they moreover demanded he ſhould make ſatisfaction to the Chriſtians for what damages they had received thro' his calling in upon them thoſe barbarous enemies: that he ſhould put a ſtop to the hoſtilities he had commenced in diverſe quarters, that the Emperor might apply himſelf to the defenſe of Chriſtendom: that he ſhould cauſe the town of Maran, taken by the Turks, to be reſtored to King Ferdinand; and to the Emperor Caſtronovo, which they had beſieged with the aid of twelve French gallies: that he ſhould repair the loſſes the Germans had ſuſtained by the Turkiſh invaſion. Laſtly, that he ſhould ſatisfy the King of England for whatever he owed him, and give him ſecurity for the payment of the hundred thouſand crowns.

After theſe preliminaries, the two confederate Monarchs agreed, that they would not make peace or truce but on theſe conditions. That Francis ſhould pay the King of England all arrears whatever, and, for ſecurity of the annual penſion, ſurrender into his hands Ponthieu, Boulogne, Montreuil, Ardres and Terouenne, free from all homage, for which however Henry ſhould conſent, that the yearly revenues thence ariſing ſhould be in lieu of the penſion. Moreover, that Francis ſhould reſtore to the Emperor the duchy of Burgundy.

That if the King of France ſhould delay ten days to accept theſe conditions, the two confederate Monarchs ſhould proclaim war againſt him, with a declaration, That they would never make peace 'till the King of England was in poſſeſſion of Normandy, Guienne, and the Gallic crown; and the Emperor of Abbeville, Amiens, Bray, Corbeil, Peronne, Ham, St. Quintin, and the whole duchy of Burgundy.

Laſtly, they agreed, that each ſhould take the field, and invade France with twenty-five thouſand men, whereof five thouſand ſhould be cavalry (2).

Theſe were vaſt projects: but theſe Princes were too wiſe to imagine that, with twenty-five thouſand men each, they were able to conquer France. It therefore ſeems they agreed in the treaty to bring into the field ſo ſmall a number of troops, only to ingage Francis to make preparations anſwerably: and indeed we ſhall ſee hereafter that they invaded France with more than a hundred thouſand men.

Henry's chief aim.

One of the principal reaſons why Henry joined in a league with the Emperor, was to find the King of France ſo much imployment at home, that it ſhould not be in his power to break his meaſures for the union of Scotland with England, by a marriage between Mary and Prince Edward. Henry had this affair extremely at heart, and very juſtly, as may readily be ſuppoſed: but unluckily for him, there was in Scotland a dowager Queen of the Lorrain family, and a cardinal archbiſhop of St. Andrews, both which perſons, being devoted to France and the Pope, labored with their utmoſt might to defeat his projects. As the Scotiſh affairs will be very ſoon intermixed with thoſe of England, it is abſolutely neceſſary to turn our eyes towards what paſſed in that country, after the demiſe of James V, without which it would be very difficult rightly to comprehend the ſequel.

Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Burnet.

On James V's deceaſe, the ſituation of Scotland was but very indifferent. The late King had not any way ſettled the regency during his daughter's minority. Princeſs Mary's next immediate heir was James Hamilton, earl of Arran, a perſon of a very mean genius, a lover of books and eaſe, but little capable of managing the public affairs, and ſtill leſs thoſe of war (1). He had ſhewn ſome inclination for the new religion, and thereby rendered himſelf as much ſuſpected and odious to the clergy, as agreeable to thoſe who had imbraced the reformation. The dowager Queen, the cardinal of Lorrain's and duke of Guiſe's ſiſter, had for the Reformed a mortal averſion. This averſion was cheriſhed by cardinal Beaton, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, a man violent and cruel, who had already given diverſe inſtances of his innate inhumanity towards thoſe who imbraced the new doctrine. Moſt of the nobles who, by their counſels, could have ſupported the ſtate in ſuch a juncture, were either ſlain in the late rout, or priſoners in England: but even had they been living, or in Scotland, it would have been very difficult to ſucceed. There had long been ſuch a diviſion among the grandees, that what one moved was ſure to be oppoſed by another. This was the conſequence of the factions raiſed by the Kings of France and England in the kingdom, and which were continued by different opinions in religion. To all theſe evils was added that of a war againſt a powerful neighbor, who had juſt gained a very conſiderable advantage, and could eaſily improve the conſternation all Scotland was under.

Amidſt this confuſion cardinal Beaton, ſeeing none able to withſtand him, formed the deſign of ſeizing the regency. To this end, he forged a will for the late King, wherein he was appointed regent, or viceroy, during Mary's minority, with three counſellors, or aſſiſtants, of whom the earl of Arran was one, and cauſed it to be publiſhed, againſt the parliament ſhould meet and confirm it. Mean while he ſtrove by all imaginable means to gain proper perſons to ſupport him, as well among the comonalty as the grandees. The firſt who declared for him was the Queen dowager.

Buchanan. Hall. Hollingſh.

But while the cardinal was laboring to ſtrengthen his party, the friends and relations of the earl of Arran were earneſtly ſolliciting him, not to yield the regency to one who had not thereto any right or title. They repreſented to him, that the will whereon the cardinal grounded his pretenſions was a forgery, becauſe the King never ſo far eſteemed that prelate as to commit to him the regency in prejudice of the Princes of the blood: that it was a contrivance to deſtroy the Hamiltons with their whole party, and obſtruct the reformation's progreſs: that the cardinal was known to be a man of ill principle, of little or no conſcience, cruel and ſuperſtitious, and if once he had the power in his hands, the flames of perſecution would quickly be kindled throughout the realm, not only againſt the Reformed, but againſt all in general who would not implicitly and abſolutely ſubmit to his orders; and that infallibly thoſe of the blood royal, and the prime nobility would be firſt ſacrificed to his ambition and jealouſy. The earl of Arran was of a pacific diſpoſition, and without any aſpiring thoughts. Had he followed his own inclination, he would have left his eminence in a quiet injoyment of the authority he had uſurped: but his friends, having as we may ſay compeled him by their remonſtrances, he determined on proſecuting the right due to his birth, by demanding the regency, and expoſing the fallacy of that imaginary will whereon Beaton reſted.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1543.

During theſe tranſactions, the priſoners, who had been releaſed, came to Scotland, and with them Archibald Douglaſs earl of Angus, and William Douglaſs his brother, who had been fifteen years exiles in England. By their arrival, the earl of Arran's party was conſiderably ſtrengthened, whereas the cardinal loſt many followers, who had joined with him more thro' fear than affection. It was no longer ſcrupled to diſcourſe publicly, that the earl of Arran's right was indiſputable, even had the King capriciouſly diſpoſed of the regency in favor of the cardinal; which however was not credible. The parliament meeting in March, the will was examined, and the forgery being detected, the cardinal was removed, and the earl of Arran declared regent in a manner unanimouſly. Nor was it without reaſon that moſt of the peers and other grandees were deſirous to free themſelves from cardinal Beaton's domination. Before the parliament's convening, was found a memorandum, written with the King's own hand, wherein were ſet down the names of three hundred of the nobility and prime gentry, all whom he had reſolved to diſpatch. As moſt of theſe proſcribed perſons were either of the Reformed, or at leaſt favorers of the reformation, it was not doubted that the cardinal had mainly contributed to put King James upon this inhuman reſolution, by repreſenting to him, that thoſe who had refuſed to fight againſt the Engliſh, were the King of England's ſecret partiſans, and favored the novel opinions. Certain it is, that abundance of the grandees were of the reformed religion, or well-wiſhers to the reformation. The earl of Arran was of this number, and on that account was ſo well ſupported when he demanded the regency, becauſe thoſe of the new religion intended to make him their protector. But this was a moſt indifferent choice; the earl's unactive and timorous diſpoſition rendering him very unfit to ſupport thoſe inclined to put themſelves under his protection.

While the parliament ſat, Henry ſent to Scotland an embaſſy to propoſe the marriage of his ſon Prince Edward with the young Scotiſh Queen, according to the agreement with the captive lords. The embaſſador was furniſhed with a good ſum of money to facilitate the negociation, Henry knowing experimentally how efficacious the ſaid means was in that country. The Dowager and cardinal Beaton imployed their whole credit and addreſs to get the overture rejected: but as their party was not ſtrong enough to balance the King of England's, his eminence made it his buſineſs to confound all the conferences held on this occaſion, by tedious harangues, puzzling cavils, and invectives againſt the adverſe faction, with deſign to excite differences and diſputes which would obſtruct the concluſion of this affair. His artifices being at length perceived, he was confined to a chamber 'till the debates were ended. The moment Beaton no longer appeared, King Henry's propoſition was without much difficulty accepted, and the parliament appointed embaſſadors to prepare for London, there to treat with the King concerning a peace and the marriage. George Douglaſs, brother of the earl of Angus, and ſome others of the nobility, were charged with this negociation, which finally terminated minated in two treaties concluded at London the first of July 1543. The first was to settle a lasting and advantageous peace between the two kingdoms. The second, for the marriage of Prince Edward with the young Queen of Scotland. Henry did his utmost to have Mary put into his hands: but the Scotish embassadors firmly refusing their consent, it was at length stipulated, that she should not be brought into England 'till she had completed her tenth year: that, in the interim, the parliament of Scotland should appoint four nobles to take care of her education, and Henry might add a fifth of his own nation to convey his advices to the governors (1): that the Scotish parliament should give King Henry six hostages of distinction, for security that the marriage should be accomplished.

Buchanan.

This business concluded, the cardinal had a little more liberty granted him, by being given in custody to the lord Seaton: but that nobleman suffering himself to be corrupted by his prisoner, afforded him means to make his escape. No sooner was he at liberty, but he put in practise his whole stock of artifice and industry to break the treaties with England, wherein he was powerfully assisted by the Queen dowager. As they were both most zealously attached to France and the ancient creed, they could not, without excessive reluctance, behold the alliance lately made with a Prince whom they looked on as a heretic, and whose interests had for some time been contrary to those of Francis I. They plainly perceived this alliance might very possibly produce great alterations as well in church as state, and would infallibly destroy the ancient union between France and Scotland. To prevent this, Beaton assembled, at his house, the chief ecclesiastics, and representing to them that religion was in danger, he obtained a large contribution to assist him in its support. This money served him to maintain his creatures, and gain some of the contrary party. In a word, he so well conducted his cabals, that he soon put things in extreme confusion. By his sollicitations and intrigues he so managed, that the prisoners, who had been released, determined on not returning to redeem their hostages. The earl of Cassilis alone could not be prevailed with on any consideration to falsify his plighted faith. In short, the cardinal's party being grown very numerous by his liberalities, strongly opposed sending the hostages promised to the King of England by the treaty. Moreover the cardinal resolving, at any rate, to set the two nations at variance, caused Henry's embassador to be highly affronted by some of his party, and his servants to be insulted: but the English minister, knowing how ardently the King his master wished the treaties might be executed, bore all with patience, for fear of raising some unseasonable quarrel, which he found was Beaton's design. Thus the cardinal had brought matters to such a pass, that in vain the regent, who wanted resolution, tried to stop these violent proceedings, since his commands were openly disobeyed.

Cardinal Beaton breaks these measures.

His party stronger than the regent's.

The day whereon the three hostages were to be delivered being come, the English embassador demanded them of the regent, complaining withal of the affronts he had received. The regent told him, "he was extremely sorry any disrespect had "been shewn to his person and character, and "would give him, at a more convenient season, "what satisfaction he desired: that he was himself "witness of the troubles raised by the cardinal, "and how contemptible the authority of the go"vernment was rendered by that prelate's cabals: "as for the hostages, it was no longer in his power "to put them into his hands, since it was ob"structed by the cardinal and his whole party, "who were now grown too strong to be con"strained." The embassador was sufficiently convinced of the truth of what the regent said; and, as he saw little appearance of a change in favor of the King his master, he contented himself with summoning the prisoners to return to England according to their promises: but in that also he had no better success. They refused to return, tho' they were released only on parole. The earl of Cassilis alone, abhorring the base perfidy of his fellow-prisoners, set out for London, and put himself into King Henry's hands. This action met with its deserved reward. The King received him most courteously, applauded his fidelity, loaded him with rich presents, and dismissed him without ransom. Mean while, Henry finding his party in Scotland was neither very numerous, nor sufficiently firm to his interest, he determined on proclaiming war with that kingdom. He might easily have made a conquest of it some months before, would he have taken advantage of the Scots consternation on their defeat, and the death of their Sovereign.

Henry VIII. An' 1543.

The prisoners, Cassilis only excepted, refuse returning to England.

The Queen and cardinal, having gained their point, as to a rupture with England, studied means of procuring the kingdom's government by supplanting the earl of Arran, head of the contrary faction. Indeed, they were not much in dread of the said earl, as they had very recently demonstrated: but he bore the title of regent and, very possibly, by the counsels of the able men of his party, and the King of England's assistance, he might in the end find means to render himself formidable. The war Henry had just proclaimed against Scotland afforded them a favorable opportunity to execute their project. They represented to the King of France, "that it was in a manner "impossible for Scotland to maintain a war against "England, without a powerful aid from him: "that the earl of Arran, regent of the kingdom, "favored the English; and, instead of opposing, "would infallibly make use of them to establish "his authority, and accomplish the young Queen's "projected marriage: that, probably, this mar"riage would break the alliance between France "and Scotland, and produce a lasting union be"tween Scotland and England: that he might "plainly see how much he himself was interested "in a war which, as it would most certainly be "unsuccessful, would occasion his losing Scotland: "that they in reality perceived how difficult it was "for him to assist them, when he needed his whole "force to oppose the Emperor; but they had de"vised a very proper expedient to gain time, in "breaking the measures of the adverse party. The "expedient was, that he should send over Mat"thew Stuart, earl of Lenox, who was in France, "that they might set him in opposition to the Ha"miltons, who were his avowed enemies on ac"count of their killing his father: that imme"diately on this nobleman's arrival in Scotland, "he would be acknowledged for head of the "party against the regent, and, by the assistance "they were ready to lend him, would become so "superior that it would not be possible for the re"gent to execute his designs in favor of England." The better to intice Lenox to Scotland, they put him in hopes of marrying the dowager Queen, and of being seated on the throne in case the young Queen died before she married. They told him, this would be so much the easier, as before Mary's birth, the late King had deſigned him for his ſucceſſor, tho' farther removed than the earl of Arran, whom he deemed ſpurious, by reaſon of his father's illegal marriage. Theſe remonſtrances had the deſired effect. Francis I, glad to ſtrengthen his party in Scotland without being forced to furniſh ſupplies, ſpeedily diſpatched away the earl of Lenox, with aſſurances of his protection.

Beaton hinders the regent from having the young Queen's perſon in his power.

Mean while the regent, having ſome intimation of this ſcheme, reſolved to ſupport his authority by making himſelf maſter of the Queen's perſon, then in the caſtle of Limnuch or Linlithgoe (1): but as he kept not his deſigns ſufficiently ſecret, the cardinal, who had information, came to Linlithgoe well attended, in order to prevent the Queen's removal. Not long after, the earl of Lenox arrived from France, and, after ſaluting the regent, withdrew to his own houſe, where he aſſembled his friends with them to conſult how they ſhould proceed. He acquainted them with the motives of his return, and the hopes given him of being put in poſſeſſion of the regency, the dowager Queen and even the Scotiſh crown, in caſe of the young Queen's failure. The friends he conſulted being all ill-wiſhers to the regent, they unanimouſly adviſed him to improve the preſent opportunity, and each made him offers of his perſon, eſtate, vaſſals, and friends. The earl being hereupon reſolved to purſue his point, drew together four thouſand men, and puting himſelf at their head came to the Queen, under color of guarding her againſt all attempts of the regent, as apprehenſive ſhe might be delivered up to the nation's adverſaries. In reality, the earl of Arran had determined on making ſure of her perſon, nay, was preparing to execute his deſign: but when he found himſelf prevented, and conſidered the Queen could not be got out of Lenox's hands without coming to open war, he ſent to treat of accommodation. Lenox conſented, on condition the Queen ſhould, for the future, reſide in Sterling caſtle, and four neutral lords, whom both parties could equally truſt, appointed to guard her, and take care of her education. The four peers (2) being choſen and approved the Queen was crowned at Sterling caſtle, where a few days after (3) ſhe was crowned.

The regent ſides with the Queen and cardinal. Buchanan.

The regent, perceiving the adverſe faction grew daily ſtronger, judged himſelf unable to weather the ſtorm which was gathering againſt him: ſo, his courage and reſolution failing him when moſt needful, he choſe to give way to the torrent, rather than attempt making a reſiſtance which he thought would prove fruitleſs. Perſuaded as he was, that he ſhould be too weak to oppoſe the Queen-mother and cardinal, he believed it behoved him to alter his meaſures, and join with them in a ſtrict union: but even in this he met with difficulties which he could not ſurmount, without acting contrary to his conſcience. He had hitherto in a manner openly profeſſed the new religion: but the Queen and cardinal, as they could not reſolve to receive him into their amity while he was ingaged in the party of the reformed, managed him ſo well that they finally prevailed on him to abjure, in the Franciſcans church at Sterling. By this action he loſt all his old friends, and was reduced to depend on the contrary party, with whom the cardinal had more power than himſelf. From thenceforward he was wholly guided by the counſels of that prelate, who was actually regent, while the perſon who bore that title was merely a ſhadow of authority.

He abjures at Sterling.

When the Dowager and cardinal were poſſeſſed of the government, they were puzzled concerning the earl of Lenox, to whom they were no longer willing to perform their promiſe: wherefore their chief care was to rid themſelves of this nobleman, who greatly imbaraſſed them. This to effect, they agreed on requeſting the King of France to recall him, and that, while King Francis's anſwer was expected, the Queen ſhould continue cheriſhing his hopes, but withal ſhould uſe a diverſity of artifices to delay her nuptials, on which topic the earl began to be exceſſively urgent with her. This project was executed as it had been reſolved. The Queen for ſome time amuſed her lover, who, not ſuſpecting what was contriving againſt him, imployed his time in procuring her diverſions, imagining that would accelerate his matrimonials; but the Queen ſtill found ſome freſh excuſe to poſtpone them. This behavior at laſt bred in him ſuſpicions, which were confirmed by ſome friend of greater penetration, or better informed than himſelf. He learned, that the Queen and cardinal had writ to the French court, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the King's intereſt than Lenox's continuance in Scotland, ſince they had gained the regent to their ſide.

The Queen and cardinal attempt ſending back the earl of Lenox to France. Buchanan.

They prejudice the King of France againſt him.

Lenox was ſo inſenſed at being thus impoſed on, that he ſwore to be revenged, and, without taking leave of either Queen or cardinal, retired to Dunbarton. In the interim, King Francis, who was not yet informed of the alterations in Scotland, remited over to the earl of Lenox thirty thouſand crowns to be diſtributed among thoſe of the party, or to gain ſome of their adverſaries. By theſe means the court of France had long maintained a faction in Scotland, while the court of England uſed the ſame methods by way of counter-balance. This money arriving when Lenox was at Dunbarton, he ſent part to thoſe peers who had care of the young Queen, and gave ſome to his own friends: but the cardinal got none, tho' he had flattered himſelf with having the beſt ſhare, and expected it with impatience. This diſappointment ſo nettled him, that he perſuaded the regent to raiſe an army and ſurpriſe Glaſgow, whither Lenox with his money had withdrawn. The preparations which were making at court, tho' under other pretenſes, giving the earl of Lenox ſuſpicion they were deſigned againſt him, he reſolved to put himſelf in a defenſible poſture; nor was it very difficult for him to aſſemble a body of forces: the cardinal had many enemies, and the regent had loſt his friends ſince they had been by him forſaken; inſomuch that the regent's levies were made very ſlowly, while the earl's viſibly increaſed. Within few days, he raiſed ten thouſand men, and notified to Beaton, that he would ſpare him the pains of coming to Glaſgow. The cardinal received this defiance with a ſeeming contempt, and pretended to purſue his enterpriſe; tho' coming to a battle was what he leaſt deſigned, not having ſufficient reliance on the experience of the regent, who was no warrior. Beſide, he foreſaw that, by prolonging the time, he ſhould oblige the enemy to diſmiſs his troops, as not having wherewithal to keep them long on foot.

He takes arms.

What his eminence had foreſeen came to paſs. Lenox finding his treaſury exhauſted, and the deſertion in his army very conſiderable, was at length forced to accept the offered accommodation. He repaired to Edinburg, where he was outwardly reconciled with the regent and cardinal; after which they went together to Sterling. But a few days after, having notice that the court had ill deſigns againſt him, he privately withdrew, and returning to Glaſgow, furniſhed the biſhop's palace with a gariſon and ammunition, and ſhut himſelf up in Dunbarton. There he was informed, that the King of France had been ſo prejudiced againſt him, that there was no hope of obtaining his future aſſiſtance. King Henry's ſixth marriage. Herbert. Hollingſh. Burnet. * John Nevil.

In July, Henry married his ſixth wife, the lady Catherine Parr (1), lord Latimer's * relict; verifying what was only ſaid in raillery on the act paſſed in 1541, that the King muſt marry a widow. The new Queen was a favorer of the reformed: but ſhe was to proceed with the utmoſt caution, not to offend a huſband whoſe abſolute will it was that none ſhould believe but what was believed by himſelf. For this reaſon ſhe durſt not, juſt after her marriage, intercede for three Proteſtants who were burned at Windſor (2), at the inſtigation of Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter. This prelate never miſſed any opportunity to exaſperate the King againſt ſuch as would not ſubmit to the act of ſix articles: but he expreſſed not a like zeal againſt thoſe who were ſtill attached to the Pope. However, this affair was carried farther than he deſired, ſince it occaſioned the diſcovery of a plot formed to ruin ſeveral families at Windſor on falſe accuſations. Henry was ſo offended at theſe diabolical practiſes, that he would have the matter thoroughly ſcrutiniſed. The iſſue was, that the contrivers of this conſpiracy (3) were mounted on horſes, with their faces towards the tails, thus led about and then pilloried. Gardiner is ſaid to have a great ſhare in this ſcheme: but he was very crafty, and well knew how to conceal the hand which gave the blow, when he judged it dangerous to expoſe it.

Combination againſt Cranmer. Burnet.

The reformation's adverſaries might eaſily perceive Cranmer was the perſon who moſt obſtructed the execution of their deſigns, and that they ſhould never ſucceed while he was in the King's favor: and therefore they reſolved to apply themſelves firſt of all to work his deſtruction, after which they imagined the ruin of his whole party would follow of courſe. In this enterpriſe occurred two oppoſites, whereof one ſeemed to promiſe good ſucceſs, and the other rendered the execution extremely difficult. The firſt was, King Henry ſeemed abſolutely determined not to ſpare ſuch as were deemed heretics, that is, thoſe who did not intirely conform themſelves to the declaration of faith lately publiſhed: now, it was univerſally known that the archbiſhop was of this number, tho' he uſed great caution not to give his enemies any advantage, either by word or deed. The ſecond was, Henry's particular eſteem for this prelate, againſt whom diverſe fruitleſs attempts had been made: nevertheleſs, his enemies fancied, if they could convince their Sovereign, that Cranmer's opinions were widely different from his, it would in ſome meaſure inſenſe him; which once effected, they hoped Henry would require of him, as of all his other ſubjects, a blind ſubmiſſion, and that Cranmer's oppoſition would deſtroy the King's affection for him. The buſineſs therefore was to inſpire that Prince with ſuſpicions, which ſhould induce him to examine what were the archbiſhop's real ſentiments in religion. To this end, no opportunity was neglected to inſinuate to the King that he chaſtiſed heretics to very little purpoſe, while their chief ſupporters were ſuffered to live unmoleſted. Henry perceiving this to be leveled at Cranmer, made no anſwer; and was in hopes his ſilence would be a ſufficient demonſtration that they in vain ſtrove to inſenſe him againſt that prelate: but theſe inſinuations were ſo often repeated, that he at length ſeemed to give ear to them, in order to diſcover the real drift. He therefore liſtened to whatever was alledged againſt Cranmer, and required the intended articles of accuſation, with the names of his accuſers. The duke of Norfolk, the biſhop of Wincheſter, and their party, imagined the archbiſhop ruined, ſince his Majeſty vouchſafed to examine his conduct: but they took care not to make themſelves parties, their deſign being to ſeem no way concerned, in order to ſtrike the ſurer. They cauſed therefore the accuſation to be drawn by ſome prebendaries of Canterbury, and certain Kentiſh juſtices of peace, whom they perſuaded to be his accuſers. The articles being put into Henry's hands, he croſſed the Thames in his barge to that prelate's palace at Lambeth. When Cranmer had notice of the King's approach, he haſted down to his ſtairs to receive him, and by his order entered the royal barge. Henry being alone with the prelate, began to lament the growth of hereſy in his realms, and told him, he was indeavoring to find out the chief incouragers of it, to puniſh them according to the utmoſt rigor of the law, concerning which he was come to aſk his opinion. The archbiſhop, without any concern, replied, that his zeal was laudable; but intreated him, for God's ſake, to conſider well what hereſy was, leſt, inſtead of puniſhing heretics, he fought againſt the Almighty. After ſome converſation on this ſubject, Henry at length told him, he was the man who was accuſed of being the protector and chief incourager of the heretics, and then gave him the articles of accuſation againſt him. Cranmer, having peruſed them, fell on his knees, and frankly acknowledged to the King, he was ſtill in the ſame ſentiment he was of when he oppoſed the ſix articles; but that he had not acted or ſaid any thing againſt them. Then he humbly deſired to be tried by the laws, becauſe he was ſure he ſhould never be convicted of tranſgreſſing them. Whereupon the King aſked him, whether it was true that he was married. Cranmer owned it, but ſaid he had ſent his wife to Germany on paſſing the act of ſix articles. Henry, who had long ſeen about him only ſuch as diſſembled their thoughts, was charmed with the archbiſhop's candor and ſincerity. Inſtead of being diſpleaſed with his confeſſion, he could not forbear admiring his ſteadineſs, which made him dare the greateſt danger he had ever been in, and that he ſo wiſely allied it with ſuch inviolable regard for the laws. Wherefore he gave him a very ſenſible proof of his eſteem and affection, in diſcovering to him the combination of his adverſaries againſt him, naming his accuſers, and injoining him to proſecute them. Cranmer would have declined it; but the King told him poſitively he would be obeyed, and that he ſhould himſelf nominate his judges. Had Cranmer been vindictive, he had a fair opportunity of being revenged on thoſe who ſought his ruin, and particularly on Gardiner, principal author of the conſpiracy, as appears in letters under his own hand: but he ſhewed ſuch ſingular backwardneſs to puſh this affair, that at length the King was tired with preſſing him, ſince he ſeemed ſo very unwilling: mean while, he had not the leſs value for him. Shortly after, one of his ſecret enemies, known for ſuch by the King, tho' he himſelf had no ſuſpicion of him, desiring his assistance in a suit he had at court, he went immediately and spoke to the King in his behalf. The King surprised to see him speak for this person, asked him if he knew him well; and upon this answering, that he took him for his friend; "No (replied the King) he is your mortal enemy, "and I command you, when you see him next, to "call him knave." Cranmer modestly answered, such language did not become a bishop; but the King insisted on his compliance. Nevertheless Cranmer found means to be excused, and Henry, satisfied with admiring his goodness, would not press him any farther. Thus the plot, contrived for the archbishop's destruction, served only to indear him the more to King Henry, and demonstrate to his enemies how dangerous it was to attack him.

Continuation of the war between the Emperor and France. Du Bellai. Mezerai. Stow.

While all this passed in England, the war between the Emperor and King Francis was carrying on in several places. In the begining of the campain, Francis had some advantages in the Netherlands, where he took Landrecy, Emery, Bapaume, Maubeuge and Luxemburg. But the Emperor arriving towards the end of summer with a strong supply of Spanish troops, Francis, being inferior in number, was obliged to keep at some distance. This furnished Charles with opportunity to invest Landrecy, which siege he was however forced to raise on Francis's finding means to throw in succors; but he made himself amends by taking Cambray.

Siege of Nice by the French and Turks.

At the same time, the Turkish admiral Barba-rossa, coming to Marseilles, the begining of July, with a hundred and ten Ottoman gallies, found there count D'Enghien, of the Bourbon family, with twenty-two French gallies. After their junction, they went together and attacked Nice, the tenth of August, and on the twentieth became masters of the town. But the castle made so brave a defense, that Barba-rossa, finding he lost both time and reputation before the place, retired and wintered in Provence, from whence he returned to Turky early in the spring. I shall say nothing of the war in Piedmont, because it produced no remarkable event (3).

AN' 1544. The Emperor's and Henry's vast projects. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 1, 2. Hall. Stow. Hollingsh.

During this whole campain, Henry assisted the Emperor only with a small body (4) of troops, commanded by sir John Wallop: but they both formed vast projects for the next year. They intended to enter France, the one by Champagne, the other by Picardy, at the head of two armies, each forty thousand strong, and to join about Paris. To execute this project it was necessary to act with union and a perfectly good intelligence; wherefore Henry could not dispense with the promise he had made his Imperial Majesty, of giving Princess Mary a place in the succession. The parliament meeting the fourteenth of January 1544, immediately passed an act, settling the order of those who could pretend to the crown after King Henry's decease. I have often observed, that the parliament was held in subjection, and did nothing but what the King pleased. Diverse instances have been seen, but none more flagrant than the following. In this act Prince Edward was ranked first, with his issue. Next, the heirs-male by his Majesty's present or future marriages, with their issue. Then, Princess Mary and her line. Lastly, Princess Elizabeth and her heirs. But there was no mention of Henry's divorces from his Queens, mothers to these two Princesses: so, notwithstanding the acts which approved and confirmed these divorces, and were never repealed, the parliament seemed to consider these Princesses as legitimate, tho' they had before been declared spurious, and as such excluded the succession. On the other hand, to convince them, they were indebted to their royal father for his favor, the act rendered them obnoxious to such limitations or conditions, as the King should please to declare by his letters patent, on pain of forfeiting the right conceded them: moreover, in case of disobedience on their part, or if they died issueless, the parliament impowered his Majesty to settle the crown on any other, by his letters patent, or his last will signed with his own hand. Was not this considering these two Princesses as bastards, since their title to the succession was made dependent on the King their father's pleasure? Without pretending to question the right of the King and his parliament, who represent the whole nation, to settle the succession as they judge requisite, I cannot forbear remarking, that this right was carried on this occasion as far as it can be stretched. Supposing these two Princesses illegitimate, the parliament invested Henry with the power of calling them to the throne, contrary to the laws and customs of the realm since the conquest. On the other hand, supposing them legitimate, they left the King free to exclude them from the succession, contrary to the same laws and customs, since it was in his breast to impose on them conditions impossible to be performed. This was a power no King of England had ever injoyed, and which demonstrates that this act flowed not so much from the parliament as from the Sovereign himself. To palliate in some measure these contradictions, care was taken in the act not to mention the King's divorces from his two Queens, Catherine and Ann: only every one was free to guess the motives of this act, which was not very difficult, since there was no other than that of complying with the King's will. By a clause in this statute, all persons were obliged to take a new oath against the bishop of Rome's authority; which whosoever refused, or should violate any of the articles of this act, was to be adjudged a traitor.

War in Piedmont. P. Daniel.

In the begining of this year, King Francis ſent into Piedmont count D'Enghien, who was only twenty-two years of age, to take command of the army in the room of Boutiers, whoſe ſucceſs had not been extraordinary. This young Prince, on the fourteenth of April, ingaging marquis Del Guaſto, at Ceriſoles, obtained over him a ſignal victory, which coſt the Imperialiſts ten thouſand men, beſides the wounded and priſoners. In the conſternation Del Guaſto was under after loſing this battle, he would have found it very difficult to keep Milan for the Emperor, had not count D'Enghien been ſtoped in the midſt of his career by expreſs orders. As King Francis was informed, that Charles V and the King of England were to join and invade him, in the center of his dominions, with an army of eighty thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand horſe, he deemed it more neceſſary to provide for the defenſe of his kingdom, than to think of making conqueſts in Italy. For this reaſon he ordered count D'Enghien to ſend him twelve thouſand men of his army. This diminution diſabled the youthful general from reaping any other advantage by his late victory than the capture of Carignano, which he reduced to King Francis obedience.

War with Scotland. Buchanan. Herbert.

Mean while, the formidable armies which were to invade France not being yet ready, Henry reſolved to imploy part of his troops to finiſh the Scotiſh affair, which he had ever at heart. Tho' he had declared war againſt Scotland, it was not to make conqueſts on that kingdom, but ſolely to compel the Scots, by the terror of his arms, to agree to the marriage of their Queen with the Prince his ſon. He could not conceive, that, in their then circumſtances, they could flatter themſelves with the hopes of ſucceſs, in a war ſo unequal, and capable of ruining Scotland in a ſingle campain: but cardinal Beaton, a moſt obſtinate man if any ever was ſuch, who governed in the regent's name, choſe rather to expoſe the kingdom to become a prey to the Engliſh, than conſent to a peace which could not be made without ruining his fortune; wherefore Henry, finding it neceſſary to preſs him more cloſely, reſolved to ſend into Scotland part of the troops deſigned againſt France. The earl of Hertford (2), and ſir John Dudley lord Liſle, high-admiral, were appointed for this expedition. The former led the army to Newcaſtle, where the admiral arrived with a fleet, and two hundred tranſports, whereon the forces imbarked. Hertford, landing near Leith, took that town without difficulty, and then marched directly to Edinburg, of which capital, with like facility, he became maſter. The regent and cardinal had not provided for their defenſe, imagining King Henry's menaces would not produce any effects. The city of Edinburg was ſacked and burned; but the Engliſh attacked not the caſtle, for fear of being ingaged in a too tedious ſiege. After this, they returned to Leith, and burning the town retired to Berwick the eighteenth of May (3). Had Henry been diſpoſed to improve his advantages, he muſt infallibly have ſubdued all Scotland, conſidering the great conſternation of the Scots on this invaſion: but two reaſons prevented him. The firſt, that he wanted his troops to ſend them to France, whither he alſo deſigned to paſs over in perſon. The ſecond, that his aim was only to let the Scots ſee what they were to expect, if they did not ſpeedily reſolve to execute the treaty for their Queen's marriage; and he ſcarce doubted but this method would ſucceed: mean while, it could not but ſeem ſomewhat ſtrange, that he ſhould court the young Queen of Scotland, for the Prince his ſon, in a manner ſo extraordinary; and the world was of opinion, that he had either done too much, or did not do enough.

The earl of Lenox ſides with Henry. Buchanan. Stow.

Tho' Henry had withdrawn his army from Scotland, he had not however relinquiſhed his project of haraſſing the Scots, in order to extort their conſent to the alliance. To this end, he improved a certain opportunity to excite the regent and cardinal freſh diſturbances. The earl of Lenox, as I ſaid, having quited the court, was retired to Dunbarton, whoſe governor was devoted to him; but he there found himſelf greatly imbaraſſed. His friends in France had informed him, that their King was greatly inſenſed againſt him, and accuſed him of having laviſhed away the monies remited him to maintain war againſt the Engliſh. This was in effect what had been hinted to Francis by the Queen dowager, the regent, and the cardinal, who were ſeconded by the cardinal of Lorrain and duke of Guiſe: thus the matter is repreſented by the French hiſtorians. The earl, willing to clear himſelf, had diſpatched a perſon into France, to inform King Francis of what had paſſed in Scotland ſince his arrival, and acquaint him with the preſent ſituation of affairs: but that Monarch, prepoſſeſſed by the cardinal of Lorrain, refuſed to give the meſſenger audience, nay, was going to order him to priſon. Lenox, finding himſelf thus abandoned both by the King of France, and thoſe who had at firſt joined him in Scotland, ſent to aſk King Henry, if he would be pleaſed to receive him into his ſervice, together with his intimate friend the earl of Glencairn. Henry received the overture more favorably than the two earls durſt have expected. He promiſed them his protection, on certain conditions, which he would ſettle with them, if they would ſend to England ſome truſty perſon. Thereupon the earl of Glencairn repaired to Carliſle, with Lenox's brother the biſhop of Cathneſs, and two others. In a few days after their arrival, they concluded with the King's commiſſioners a treaty, wherein the earls of Lenox and Glencairn promiſed;

IV. That the bishop of Cathness, and Hugh Cunningham, should be given in hostage to the King of England.

Henry, on his part promised:

1. That his army should not oppress their lands.

2. That he would constitute the earl of Lenox regent of the kingdom, on condition he should not transact any thing of moment without his concurrence.

3. That he would, out of the crown-revenues, allow him what should be reasonable to support the dignity of regent.

4. That, in case the young Queen should die, he would support the earl of Lenox in obtaining the crown against all pretensions of the earl of Arran.

5. That he would give the earl of Glencairn a yearly pension of a thousand crowns.

6. That he would consent, that his niece Margaret Douglas should espouse the earl of Lenox, provided she were willing.

This treaty was signed at Carlisle the seventeenth of May, while the English army was quiting Scotland, and retiring to Berwick.

Other conventions. Ibid. p. 29. Herbert.

Some days after, the earl of Lenox came to the English court, where the foregoing treaty was confirmed the twenty-sixth of June, with the following additional articles:

That the earl of Lenox should surrender to the King the castle of Dunbritton and the isle of Bute.

That if he married Margaret Douglas, he should assign her a very honorable dower.

That the King ingaged, on his part, to aid him with five hundred men, to give him a pension of seventeen hundred marks (2) for himself, and one of a hundred marks for George Striveling, governor of Dunbritton.

The earl of Lenox tries in vain to surrender Dunbritton to the King. Buchanan. Herbert.

In consequence of this treaty, Lenox repaired to Dunbritton with thirteen ships, and about six hundred men. On his arrival, he went to the castle with a few followers, to persuade the governor (3) to deliver the place to King Henry: but that officer, prefering his duty to his affection for the earl, refused to admit the English. This attempt failing, the earl ravaged the isles of Arran and Bute, where he met with no opposition. Then he made a descent upon Kintyre, and, after plundering some villages, sailed to Bristol, where he expected the return of King Henry, who was in France.

Another English invasion in Scotland. Buchanan.

Mean while, the earl of Arran and cardinal Beaton prosecuted, with the utmost rigor, the earl of Lenox's friends, and confiscated their estates. But a fresh invasion of the English, who, tho' few in number, took Jedburgh, Kelso, and Coldingham, caused them to cease these proceedings, and raise an army to inable them to repulse their enemies. The Scotish army, amounting to eight thousand men, being ready to march, the dowager Queen, regent and cardinal led them to Coldingham, where the English, on retiring, had left a garison. But while they were imployed in this siege, the regent, understanding the English were marched from Berwick to relieve the town, was seized with such a panic that, speedily mounting his horse, he fled all alone to Dunbar. This hasty flight threw the whole army into such a consternation, that there was no hindering the soldiers from disbanding. The earl of Angus alone resolved to stay with a few men, and carry off the artillery, which was on the point of being deserted. The Scots being dispersed, the English most unmercifully ravaged Teviot, Merch, and Lauderdale, forcing the inhabitants to swear allegiance to the King of England. Buchanan adds, that the earl of Angus reviving the regent's courage, they assembled some troops, and geting the English into an ambush, cut off eight hundred (4), and took a thousand prisoners. But there is not any such passage mentioned in the English histories.

While the King of England was imploying himself against Scotland, 'till matters were in a readiness to commence the war in France, the Emperor was at Spire, where he had called a diet, to obtain some assistance from the Princes of Germany. The protestants at first greatly scrupled assisting him while he left them exposed to the insults of their enemies: but the moment they obtained a decree, that they should not be disturbed in the exercise of their religion, they granted whatever was required. This was the utmost of their requests, and it was deemed a signal favor to grant it, even with such limitations and ambiguous clauses as would one day render it fruitless. So the diet broke up about the end of May, to the mutual satisfaction of the states of the Empire. The Pope alone was offended at the decree in favor of the Protestants, and to prevent their long injoying this toleration, granted 'till the council should meet, he fixed the opening of the council of Trent to the twenty-fifth of March 1545.

Charles V takes Luxemburg. Du Bellai.

While the Emperor was at Spire, he caused siege to be laid to Luxemburg, which surrendered about the end of May. He then put himself at the head of his army, in order to commence executing the projects concerted with Henry. Since concluding the treaty in February last year, whereby they were each to bring into the field only twenty-five thousand men, they had stipulated to augment the number of their forces, to invade France with two armies; which together were to make upwards of a hundred thousand, and to join in the neighborhood of Paris. The Emperor's first exploits, 'till the King of England's arrival, were taking Commercy and Ligny in Le Barrois: after which, he entered Champagne, and besieged St. Didier the eighth of July. This place, tho' weak, held out above six weeks, and then was taken by a false intelligence sent the governor.

The duke of Norfolk joins count De Bure. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 40. Hall. Stow.

The war with Scotland having prevented Henry from being ready so soon as he had promised, it was about Whitsuntide before he imbarked part of his army for Calais, under conduct of the duke of Norfolk. As for himself, he still remained in England with the rest of his troops 'till the middle of July (5). Norfolk, being got over, joined count De Bure, who commanded ten thousand of the Imperialists, and they in conjunction besieged Montreuil. Seemingly, this was done by the consent of Charles, who at the same time laid siege to St. Didier. He was in hopes that place would detain him but few days, and then, he should march to Paris, while Henry advanced to join him. Had this scheme been executed answerably to agreement, Paris, and the whole country as far as the Loire, would have been in the utmost danger, since Francis had not above forty thousand men.

Henry VIII. An' 1544.

But the Emperor was prepoſterouſly bent on the ſiege of St. Didier, which detained him more than ſix weeks. In the interim Henry, arriving at Calais (1) with the reſt of his army, found that Charles's deſign was to leave him to march alone to Paris, and keep the King of France imployed, while he purſued his affairs in Champagne. So perceiving that, inſtead of marching to the rendezvous, his Imperial ally was buſying himſelf in a ſiege, he ordered likewiſe Boulogne to be inveſted, and the twenty-ſixth of July repaired to that ſiege. By this means their project was ſuſpended, while they ſeparately amuſed themſelves with reducing towns. This error proved the ſafety of France. From thenceforward theſe two Princes mutually charging each other with non-performance of agreements, had no longer any reciprocal confidence: and therefore the Emperor, by indirect means, cauſed a peace to be offered to Francis, while Henry more openly granted a paſs for French embaſſadors to come and treat with him, a league diſtant from his camp.

Mean while, the Emperor having finally reduced St. Didier, about the middle of Auguſt, ſent to Henry to march towards Paris, as was agreed. Henry anſwered, that ſince he had allowed his Imperial Majeſty time to take St. Didier, it was but reaſonable he ſhould wait 'till himſelf had taken Boulogne, which could not be long. After the reduction of St. Didier, Charles advanced to Chateau-Thierri, and filled Paris with terror and confuſion: but Henry's anſwer convincing him it would be very difficult to execute their projects during the remainder of that campain, he renewed with Francis his private negociation, which had been ſuſpended. Soon after, he concluded with France a ſeparate peace, ſigned at Crepy the nineteenth of September, not only without including Henry, but even without acquainting him of it, for fear of prevention.

Henry was not much ſurpriſed at Charles's procedure. He ought not to have expected leſs from ſuch a friend, who was reconciled to him only in order to do his own buſineſs. It is certain, that Charles V never did, any more than Maximilian and Ferdinand his paternal and maternal grandfathers, much pretend to ſincerity; nor was integrity his predominant virtue. Henry did indeed complain of his breach of faith: but it was no great difficulty for Charles to alledge ſundry reaſons, little capable however of balancing the oath he had taken, not to conclude either peace or truce without his ally's concurrence. But theſe oaths are generally ſo ill kept in moſt leagues, that they ſeem to be conſidered only as a ſort of form, not much to be relied on. Luckily for Henry, Boulogne had capitulated the fourteenth of September, before the treaty of Crepy was ſigned (2).

Boulogne ſurrenders by capitulation.

Charles fancied he had given a very maſterly ſtroke, in freeing himſelf from the burden of war, and leaving Francis and Henry imbroiled. It was in reality a great advantage, had it not been acquired by a falſification of ingagement. Immediately after concluſion of the treaty, he ſent orders to count De Bure to raiſe the ſiege of Montreuil, which obliged Henry to recall the duke of Norfolk. In the ſituation of Henry's affairs, he had nothing to do but retire, leſt the Dauphin, who was advancing by long marches, ſhould compel him to fight with great diſadvantage, or retreat with precipitation. Beſide that the Dauphin was at the head of forty thouſand men, he would have found the Engliſh army conſiderably diminiſhed, as well by their loſſes at two ſieges, as by the large gariſon they were obliged to leave at Boulogne. So, having well ſtored that place, and left admiral Dudley governor, Henry departed for England, the thirtieth of September, while his troops were returning to Calais.

The Dauphin arrived a few days after, but did not think proper to purſue the Engliſh, who were too far before him, and too near Calais for him to expect to overtake them. He therefore contented himſelf with attempting to ſurpriſe Boulogne, the breaches whereof the Engliſh had not time to repair. He was very near ſucceeding in his enterpriſe. The French were already maſters of the lower town, where all the Engliſh ordnance lay, when a ſally from the upper town forced them to retreat in diſorder. Marſhal Montluc in his commentaries, ſpeaks of this action in a different manner from the Engliſh hiſtorians, tho' he agrees with them that the French were repulſed. Some days after, a conference was held at Calais, to indeavor a pacification between the two Kings: but the aim of the French being to perſuade the Engliſh to reſtore Boulogne on the bare hopes of a peace, we are not to wonder that the conference ſhould be fruitleſs.

Preparations of France againſt England. Du Bellai. Mezerai. Herbert. Hall. Stow.

Mean while, Francis was preparing to make a grand effort againſt England, in hopes of recovering Boulogne, and even Guiſnes and Calais, in order to expel the Engliſh from France. With this view, in the ſeveral ports of France, he equiped one hundred and fifty great ſhips, and ſixty ſmaller, with ten hired of the Genoeſe: he had moreover ordered twenty-five gallies from the Levant, in imitation of Lewis XII, who, on a like occaſion, had cauſed four to be brought down thence. At the ſame time, he prepared to raiſe an army forty thouſand ſtrong, wherewith he intended to join twelve thouſand Landſquenets levied in Germany. His deſign was to attack Boulogne by land, and ſo block it up by ſea that it ſhould be impoſſible for the Engliſh to relieve it. To execute this project, he ſent a re-inforcement to marſhal De Biez, ordering him to build at Portet the fort he had been conſtrained to leave unfiniſhed, being unwilling to approach Boulogne before this fort was in a ſtate of defenſe. The marſhal, giving him hopes that the work would be finiſhed by mid-Auguſt, he came about the end of June to Havre de Grace, to give orders for a naval expedition. His ſhips and gallies arriving ſoon after, he commanded the fleet to ſail towards England: but, on its departure, he had the mortification of being eye-witneſs to the burning of one of his capital ſhips named The Grand Carraçon, which took fire while her anchor was weighing.

Admiral

HENRY VIII. AN' 1545.

Admiral Annebaut, who commanded the fleet, arrived, the eighteenth of July, at the Iſle of Wight, in ſight of Portſmouth, where lay the Engliſh fleet of ſixty ſhips only. Notwithſtanding the diſproportion between the two navies, the Engliſh approached the French; but after a ſlight ſkirmiſh retired behind the ſands, with deſign to draw after them the enemy. The French admiral, conſulting how they might be attacked, was told it was a mere impoſſibility, becauſe the channel which led to the place where they lay was ſo narrow that four ſhips could ſcarcely ſail a-breaſt; that beſide there was no venturing among the ſands without pilots. Theſe difficulties obliged the admiral to content himſelf with provoking the Engliſh to fight, by means of the gallies, in order to draw them from their poſt. At firſt the gallies, favored by a great calm, annoyed the Engliſh ſhips: but the land-breeze ariſing deprived them of their advantage, and obliged them to row off, for fear of being run down by the large ſhips. The Engliſh did not purſue them very far, their deſign being to decoy the French among the ſhoals, with which they were unacquainted.

Expedition of the French fleet. Du Bellai. Hall. Stow.

At length, the French perceiving the Engliſh would not loſe the advantage of their poſt, landed at three places in the Iſle of Wight: but all this ended only in firing a few villages. It was moved in a council of war, to fortify and keep the iſland; but it was impracticable, chiefly by reaſon of the time which ſuch a project would neceſſarily require. The admiral was therefore ſatisfied with ordering a deſcent on the coaſt of Suſſex, imagining the King, who was at Portſmouth, would ſend out his fleet to aſſiſt the country; but he was miſtaken. The Engliſh navy ſtill lay behind the ſands, and the deſcents made by the French in three different places gained them no conſiderable advantage, becauſe the coaſts were well guarded. Mean while, the Engliſh fleet daily increaſing, conſiſted now of a hundred ſail. So, Annebaut, ſeeing little hope of making much progreſs, retired towards France, after having watered at the Iſle of Wight, not without loſing ſome ſoldiers and officers.

The French fleet retires.

Some days after, a ſouth wind blew the French back towards the Engliſh coaſt, and put their fleet in confuſion, which the Engliſh reſolved to improve if the wind continued favorable: and indeed the two fleets ingaged for two hours; but as the wind was very variable, each indeavored to gain it, not being however too venturous. Finally, they parted without much loſs on either ſide; and thus terminated the greateſt effort France had ever made at ſea.

It is driven on the coaſt of England.

A ſhort ingagement.

The attempt to fight the Engliſh fleet, or to ravage the coaſt, was not however the principal motive of this powerful armament: recovering Boulogne was the King of France's main view, and the fleet was properly intended only to block up that place by ſea: but as the Landſquenets were not yet arrived, and the fort which marſhal De Biez was building not finiſhed, Francis was exceedingly vexed to ſee the time inſenſibly ſlide away. At length, hearing the Landſquenets were on the borders, he ſent to view the fort, which, contrary to his expectation and marſhal De Biez's promiſe, was yet very far from being completed: beſide, it was ſeated in a place different from what was directed, and commanded not the harbor. The marſhal alledged, that had it been at Portet, the gariſon would have wanted water; but he affirmed, the fort he was raiſing at Outreau would be finiſhed in eight days; whereupon, the King ſent him his whole army, of which he gave him the command, and remained himſelf at Chateau-Montier, about ten leagues from Boulogne.

The deſign of beſieging Boulogne and Guiſnes miſcarries by De Biez's fault. Herbert.

Marſhal De Biez lay incamped near the fort 'till it was finiſhed, his deſign being to throw in ten thouſand men to awe the gariſon of Boulogne while he beſieged Guiſnes: but the engineer had ſo ill contrived his work, that, after much time imployed thereon, he was forced in a manner to re-commence. This occaſioned a delay which broke all the meaſures had been taken. Mean while, the King haſtened the work the more, as he knew that ten thouſand Landſquenets, and a body of four thouſand cavalry, raiſed for the ſervice of England, were marching for Picardy. In ſhort, the marſhal, perceiving the ſeaſon would be too far advanced before his fort could be rendered defenſible, pretended to have certain intelligence, that the King of England deſigned to land a ſtrong army at Calais, to relieve Boulogne by land: this is at leaſt what Du Bellai imputes to him in his memoirs. However the marſhal, leaving the fort unfiniſhed, incamped on mount Lambert, to be ready to oppoſe the ſuccors: but the Engliſh appeared not. As for the Landſquenets, ſent for by Henry from Germany, they returned home, becauſe they received not on the borders the money they expected. Mean while, the French army continued incamped, without undertaking the ſiege either of Guiſnes or Boulogne, tho' Francis had, for that purpoſe, made ſuch vigorous efforts.

Mean time, the duke of Orleans died at Chateau-Montier, to the great grief of his royal father, who, by his death, ſaw his peace with the Emperor very much ſhaken, ſince it was properly founded on that Prince's life, as will inſtantly be made manifeſt.

Death of the duke of Orleans. Mezerai.

The French army being incamped on mount Lambert, within cannon-ſhot of Boulogne, there were ſkirmiſhes every day in the ſpace between the mount and the town. In one of theſe conflicts, the duke d'Aumale, known afterwards by the name of the duke of Guiſe, was wounded with a lance, which entering at the corner of his eye, came out behind his head. This wound, tho' by all deemed mortal, was nevertheleſs cured by the extraordinary ſkill of Ambroſe Paré, the King's ſurgeon, who was even forced with pincers to draw out the head of the lance which remained in the wound. The ſcar in the duke's face gained him the ſurname of Le Balafré *.

* An eſcar, chiefly in the face.

The ſeaſon was now ſo advanced that the ſiege of Boulogne was not practicable; ſo Francis was forced to be contented with ordering marſhal De Biez to ravage Terre d'Oye, appertaining to the King of England: but the ſudden rains made the country ſo watry, that the marſhal was ſoon obliged to retire with his army. Indeed, the inhabitants were great ſufferers, becauſe the gariſon of Calais, which ſhould have protected them, were utterly unable to reſiſt ſuch numerous forces. On the other hand, Briſſac, afterwards marſhal of France, defeated a body of two thouſand Engliſh. Theſe were all the damages Henry ſuſtained during this campain, from an army two hundred thouſand ſtrong, which had put his enemy to a prodigious expenſe. In all likelihood this expenſe, and the ill ſucceſs of the campain, contributed moſt to the peace which was ſoon after concluded.

The French army ravage Terre d'Oye. Herbert.

Beſide that France was exhauſted, Francis had ſtill another inducement to ſtrike up a peace with England. He was apprehenſive of being ſpeedily conſtrained to renew the war with Charles V. By the treaty of Crepy, it was agreed, that the duke of Orleans ſhould eſpouſe one of the daughters, either of the Emperor or of the King of the Romans, and, on account of this marriage, ſhould have the duchy of Milan, or the earldom of Flanders. In conſideration of ſo advantageous a ſettlement for the duke his ſon, Francis had reſigned more than twenty places which he held in Piedmont or Montferrat, and relinquiſhed the intereſt treſt of his brother-in-law, the King of Navarre. So, the hopes of the advantages this marriage was to procure vaniſhing by his ſon's death, Francis was to find ſome other means to obtain them, or break a treaty now become uſeleſs. For this reaſon, being deſirous to know Charles's intentions, he ſent admiral Annebaut to Antwerp, to offer him to renew the treaty of peace on other conditions, ſince the death of the duke of Orleans had rendered ineffectual thoſe of the treaty of Crepy. But Charles plainly intimated that, by the death of that Prince, he preſumed himſelf freed from his ingagement, when he told the embaſſador, that he would not attack the King of France if he was not firſt attacked. Francis eaſily judged by this anſwer, he ſhould infallibly have a war with the Emperor. This, added to the little progreſs he had made during the laſt campain, made him deſirous of a peace with England: but as he was unwilling to ſue for it, he applied to the Princes of the Smalcaldic league, who offered to become mediators. This mediation ſeemed the leſs precarious, as the Proteſtants themſelves were highly concerned to procure a peace between the two Kings. They ſaw themſelves on the brink of being attacked by the Emperor, ſince he had made peace with France, and knew moreover he was negociating a truce with the Turks. Nothing therefore could be more for their advantage, than a good underſtanding between France and England, that both Kings might be able to protect them. They ſent therefore to France, Chriſtopher de Veninger, John Bruno of Nidepont, and John Sturmius; and to England, Lewis Bambach, and John Sleidan, to perform the office of mediators between the two Kings, in the name of the league. Theſe embaſſadors, meeting the plenipotentiaries of France and England between Ardres and Guiſnes, inſtantly found it was no eaſy matter to make peace. Francis inſiſted, that Henry ſhould reſtore Boulogne, and Scotland be included in the peace; but Henry abſolutely rejected both theſe articles: whereupon only a truce was negociated, but with no better ſucceſs, becauſe Henry would never agree that the Scots ſhould be compriſed in the treaty. This appears in the original inſtructions ſent to ſir William Paget, one of the Engliſh embaſſadors, and inſerted in Rymer's collection of public acts. We find alſo in his inſtructions, that ſir William Paget attempted to bribe Bruno, one of the German mediators, with the offer of a conſiderable penſion, and, in all appearance, the mediator liſtened to his propoſals. Mean while, to obtain the better terms, Henry feigned a deſire to be reconciled with the Emperor, and even ſent in embaſſy to him the biſhops of Winchester and Weſtminſter: but this was merely to give Francis a jealouſy.

Cranmer procures biſhopricks for his friends. Burnet. Fox. Herbert.

Cranmer took the advantage of Gardiner's abſenſe to advance the reformation, which he knew that prelate would, to his utmoſt power, oppoſe. Some vacant biſhopricks were, by his means, given to perſons who favored the reformation, and he had thereby among the biſhops a much ſtronger party than ever; nay, he founds means afterwards to obtain the King's conſent to ſome alterations advantageous to the reformed religion. But Gardiner, who was then at Bruges with the Emperor, having thereof notice, wrote to King Henry, that the Pope and Emperor being joined in a league againſt the Proteſtants of Germany, the leaſt innovation in England; with reſpect to religion, would be apt to induce them to give the King of France all the ſatisfaction he could deſire, to ingage him in their league, in order to act againſt him in concert. This occaſioned Cranmer's meeting with more difficulties than he expected.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1545.

In Auguſt, this year, that prelate loſt a good ſupport by the death of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, who had always continued in the height of favor (1). He was Cranmer's friend, and would willingly have agreed to a farther reformation; but he was too much a courtier to attempt directly to oppoſe the King's will. However, as Henry was not always in the ſame diſpoſition, with regard to religion, this duke did the reformed good ſervice whenever he found King Henry any way diſpoſed in their favor.

Death of the duke of Suffolk. Hall. Stow. Hollingſh.

The war with Scotland was faintly continued on both ſides. Henry's deſign was only to terrify the Scots, and induce them to execute the treaty concerning their Queen's marriage. On the other hand, the Scots had no thoughts of invading England. Nevertheleſs, Francis, who, as was obſerved, had formed vaſt projects againſt England, ſent betimes to the regent an embaſſador, named La Broſſe, to aſſure him of his protection, and a powerful aid, which was inſtantly to depart. Beſide that a diverſion in Scotland could not but be advantageous to him, he was alſo excited by the Lorrain Princes, who were deſirous to ſupport the Queen their ſiſter. So, cauſing the noble M. de Lorge, count de Montgommery, to imbark with five thouſand men, he ordered him to uſe his utmoſt indeavors to perſuade the Scots to make a powerful diverſion on the frontiers of England. Montgommery arriving in Scotland the ſecond of July, joined his troops with the Scots, and both making together fifteen thouſand men, advanced towards the Tweed. For ſome days ſeveral parties paſſed the river, and did ſome damage to the Engliſh. But the French general could never prevail on the Scots to venture with the whole army beyond the Tweed. On the contrary, on news that the earl of Hertford was advancing at the head of twelve thouſand men, they haſtily retired, and preſently after diſbanded, according to cuſtom. This is what paſſed in Scotland, worth notice, during the campain of 1545.

The parliament of England meeting the, twenty-third of November, the convocation continued for two years, the ſubſidy given the King for ſix (2). At the ſame time, the parliament did, by a particular act, ſuppreſs all the colleges and hoſpitals, and gave their lands to the King. The motive, or rather pretenſe of this ſuppreſſion was, the abuſe of theſe foundations. The parliament deſigned it alſo towards the expenſe of the King's wars with France and Scotland: but this not ſufficing, the commons granted him moreover a large ſum, and as only for that purpoſe they were convened, they were diſmiſſed the twenty-fourth of December. Before they broke up, King Henry repaired to the houſe of lords in great ſolemnity, and made a fine ſpeech, ſaying, among other things, that never had Prince a greater affection for his people, or was more beloved than himſelf. He added many ſuch expreſſions, which tho', generally ſpeaking, very remote from the truth, were however received by the people with loud acclamations.

with France, and of the truce he was juſt concluding with the Turk. Hitherto they had been treated with ſome gentleneſs: but his Imperial Majeſty repairing to Worms, where the diet of the Empire was held, gave them flatly to underſtand, that he could not any way diſpenſe with their ſubmiting to the council, which was to meet at Trent. This convinced them there was really a deſign to reduce them by violence; and the rather, as a repeated rumor was ſpread of a league between the Pope and Charles, which muſt needs be againſt them. Their ſuſpicions were farther confirmed by a ſermon preached, by a certain Franciſcan, before that Monarch, to whom, in very ſtrong terms, he repreſented, That he could not diſcharge the duty of a good Emperor, except, to the very extent of his ability, he labored the Lutherans extirpation. They alſo knew that Charles wrote to the King of Poland, to excite him againſt them. Moreover, he ſummoned the archbiſhop of Cologn, to appear before him within thirty days, becauſe he had imbraced the reformation, and tried to introduce it into his dioceſe. All this evidently demonſtrated what they were to expect: nevertheleſs, as the Emperor had not yet concluded the truce with Sultan Sulyman, and as matters were not quite ripe, he ordered a new diet to be held at Ratiſbon the inſuing January: but the better to amuſe the Proteſtants, he decreed, that the divines of both parties ſhould repair to Ratiſbon, a month before the diet, and hold a free conference, that ſomething might be afterwards ſettled in points of religion. The Roman Catholics approved not this conference, and the Proteſtants were ſtill leſs pleaſed with it, becauſe they foreſaw that the ſtiffneſs of the divines of both ſides, on the articles which would be the ſubject of their conference, would furniſh his Imperial Majeſty and the diet with a pretext to refer the deciſion to the Trentine council. The diet breaking up the eighteenth of Auguſt, Charles returned to the Netherlands. Some time after, he received advice of a truce concluded with the Ottomans. He thereby found he was at full liberty to make war upon the Proteſtants, and under that pretenſe to ſet about the execution of his project of rendering himſelf abſolute in the Empire.

Remark on the council. Sleidan. Herbert.

It was, properly, at the inſtance of the Proteſtants only that the council was to meet: but it was very far from being ſuch a council as they had required. They expected it to be held in Germany, in ſome unſuſpected place, and it was convened at Trent, a city appertaining to the King of the Romans, whom they juſtly conſidered as their enemy. Their deſign was to combat the Papal authority; and it was the Pope who was to preſide by his legates. They intended to make appear, that the Romiſh clergy had corrupted religion, both in doctrine and diſcipline; and it was the Romiſh clergy who were to aſſiſt as judges: nay, it was uncertain whether they ſhould be allowed to produce their reaſons. Mean while, it was pretended, that thro' great condeſcenſion a council was called for their ſakes, and at their ſollicitation. It is therefore no wonder, they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to ſuch a council, which they dreaded as much as they wiſhed for one free and impartial. Thus did both the Emperor and the Proteſtants proceed directly contrary to the ſteps they took at the begining. The Proteſtants rejected a council, after deſiring it with great earneſtneſs, and the Emperor, after amuſing them ſeveral years on that account, did, with all his power, preſs the meeting of the Trentine council, of whoſe authority he intended to make uſe to oppreſs them. His Beatitude would gladly not have had any council; but, finding he was too far ingaged with the Emperor to recede, had fixed the opening to the fifteenth of March. After that, he put it off, becauſe on that day there were too few biſhops at Trent: but he had a far more cogent reaſon. He was very glad to wait the iſſue of the diet at Worms, in hopes that vigorous reſolutions would there be taken againſt the Proteſtants, which would ingage both parties in open war, and furniſh him with a pretenſe, either to delay opening the council, or remove it to ſome town in Italy. But the Emperor, who had already laid his ſcheme of uſing the council's authority to proceed againſt the Proteſtants, finally obliged the Pontif to order it to be opened at Trent the thirteenth of December. That day the legates (meeting in the cathedral) declared, the council was aſſembled for three cauſes, viz. To exterminate hereſy, reform diſcipline, and ſettle a laſting peace among Chriſtian Potentates. This firſt ſeſſion was properly held only for opening the council. There were ſo few prelates at Trent, that it would have been ridiculous for ſo ſmall a number of perſons to pretend to make decrees on the articles for which the council was convoked.

Opening of the Trentine council. F. Paul. Vargas. Herbert.

The Proteſtants beholding a council opened quite different from what they had required, readily foreſaw no good was thence to be expected. They had the more reaſon to be apprehenſive, as the Kings of France and England, being at war with each other, there was not from them any hope of aſſiſtance. Mean while, tho' the German mediators had not ſucceeded in their negociation, the peace between France and England was not remoter. The reaſon was, both Kings were equally concerned to terminate a war which only did them damage, without the leaſt proſpect for either to reap any conſiderable advantage. The war continued however during the winter of the year 1546. The earl of Surrey, ſon of the duke of Norfolk, who commanded at Boulogne, having intelligence that the French were conducting a convoy to the fort of Outreau, ſallied out with part of the gariſon to intercept it: but he ſucceeded ſo ill that, far from taking the convoy, he was himſelf defeated, and forced to retreat in the utmoſt diſorder. This news extremely troubled King Henry, who was not accuſtomed to ſuch tydings. Whether he thought it owing to the earl's imprudence, or ſuſpected him of ſome ſecret deſign, he recalled him immediately, and ſent lord Gray to command in his ſtead. A few days after, he ordered the earl of Hertford to depart with about ten thouſand men, for fear the French ſhould ſeize ſome poſt, and cut off the communication between Boulogne and Calais; and in reality that was their deſign: but Hertford, preventing them by two days only, poſted himſelf at Ambleville, where he ran up two forts which ſecured the communication. The French having miſſed their aim, incamped on Mount Lambert; and as the two armies were not far diſtant, ſkirmiſhes occurred daily, tho' none very conſiderable. It was equally the intereſt of both Kings not to run any great hazard, for fear of breaking off the negociation of the peace, which was treating between Ardres and Guiſnes.

Henry and Francis wiſh for a peace. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 8ρ. Stow. p. 591. Hollingſh. Herbert.

Hall. Herbert.

Francis wiſhed for a peace, becauſe his exchequer was drained by his vaſt and perpetual expenſes from the begining of his reign, and particularly by the naval armament of the former campain: beſide, as he was juſt entering on a war with the Emperor, he wanted ſuch a friend as the King of England. In fine, he perceived that, after his fruitleſs efforts to recover Boulogne, it would be very difficult to reduce that place by force. Henry was no leſs deſirous of peace, on diverſe accounts. Firſt, he was grown ſo corpulent and unwieldy, that it was a trouble for him to move: nay, he had occaſion for a machine with pullies to hoiſt him to and from his chamber. This made him extremely uneaſy, and gave him ſuch a diſtaſte for buſineſs, that it was not willingly willingly if he attended to affairs. Secondly, he had no farther thoughts of making conqueſts in Picardy: his ſole aim was, to procure what was due to him before Boulogne ſhould be reſtored, which was to him of little uſe, ſince Calais ſufficed for all his purpoſes. But he had ſtill a more urgent motive to renew his old friendſhip with Francis. He ſaw Charles, with his Sanctity's aſſiſtance, juſt ready to make war on the Proteſtants, and much queſtioned their ability to withſtand him. In this belief, he feared that the Emperor, after ſubduing Germany, would turn his arms againſt England, with all the forces of the Empire, Spain, Italy, and the Netherlands. He could uſe the pretenſe of executing the Pope's ſentence, and even cauſe a like ſentence to be paſſed by the Trentine council. It was therefore not at all advantageous to Henry to be at variance with France. It was rather his intereſt to have Francis's friendſhip, as it was very commodious for Francis to be ſecure of Henry's aſſiſtance, in caſe the Emperor ſhould think of turning his arms againſt France.

Difficulties of the peace.

The obſtacles to the concluſion of this peace, conſiſted in Henry's demanding his due, and Francis's want of money to give him ſatisfaction. Beſide, Francis inſiſted upon Boulogne, and upon Scotland's being included in the treaty. Theſe difficulties would have been ſufficient to hinder the peace from being concluded, had not more urgent motives induced the two Kings to ſeek expedients to ſurmount them. Henry at laſt conſented to the article concerning Scotland, and as to the reſt, a method was found to content both. Henry was to keep Boulogne 'till he was paid, and Francis promiſed to diſcharge the debt in eight years. All being thus adjuſted, the peace was ſigned the ſeventh of June. The treaty ran:

Treaty of peace between France and England. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 95. June 7. Hall. Stow. Herbert. p. 255.

That the King of France ſhall pay regularly the penſion, due by the treaty of Moore, of the thirtieth of Auguſt 1525, confirmed by diverſe ſubſequent treaties: as alſo the penſion of ſalt contained in the treaty of the twenty-fifth of April 1527, valued afterwards at ten thouſand crowns yearly. But as Henry pretends the ſaid penſion, given in lieu of the ſalt, is to be perpetual, and as on the contrary Francis maintains, that it is to ceaſe on Henry's demiſe, it is agreed, that the diſpute ſhall be amicably decided by umpires; and if the penſion ſhall be found to be perpetual, Francis ſhall pay it to Henry and his ſucceſſors for ever.

Moreover Francis ſhall pay to the King of England, on the feaſt of St. Michael 1554, or within a fortnight after, the ſum of two millions of crowns de ſoleil, as well for arrears of the ten thouſand crowns penſion, as for Henry's expenſe in the ſiege of Boulogne, undertaken ſolely to procure his money, and in keeping and maintaining that place.

As to that article of the five hundred thouſand crowns, which Henry preſented to Francis on condition he punctually obſerved the treaties, as the two Kings differ in the point of fact, it is agreed, the diſpute ſhall be decided by commiſſioners appointed on both ſides within ſuch a time, or by four impartial lawyers, in caſe the commiſſioners conclude not the matter.

It is farther ſtipulated, that the King of England ſhall keep Boulogne with its territories, the limits whereof are ſettled by the treaty, 'till he receives whatever is due to him.

That when the whole debt ſhall be diſcharged, Boulogne ſhall be reſtored to the King of France, and nothing faſtened to the ground ſhall be impaired or carried away.

Henry VIII. An' 1546.

That from the date hereof, to the ſurrender of Boulogne, neither of the two Princes ſhall raiſe any fort or new fortification within the territory of Boulogne; but thoſe already begun may be finiſhed.

The Emperor was included by both parties in the peace. As for Scotland, Henry agreed, it ſhould be included, on condition the Scots gave him no freſh cauſe to make war upon them; and in caſe they did, they were to be deemed no otherwiſe included than according to the treaty of the fifth of April 1515.

Henry's advantages in this treaty.

Henry could ſcarcely expect greater advantages than thoſe he received from this peace, which ſeemed to ſecure him not only the payment of what was due to him, but alſo the yearly and perpetual penſion of a hundred thouſand crowns. But the moſt ſolemn treaties are not always ſufficient ſecurity for the performance of what Sovereigns promiſe. It will appear in the ſucceeding reigns, that Francis's ſucceſſor did not only violate this treaty with reſpect to Boulogne, and the ſums for which his father was bound, but that even the penſion was never placed to account in the treaties he made with England.

The peace proclaimed at London. Hall. Stow.

The Peace was very ſolemnly proclaimed at London the thirteenth of June, with a general proceſſion, wherein were carried all the richeſt ſilver croſſes, and the fineſt copes worn, for the greater pomp. But this was the laſt time theſe things appeared in public. Soon after, Henry called all this, together with the church-plate, into his treaſury and wardrobe, without giving any other reaſon than his will and pleaſure.

Charges of the late war. Herbert. p. 256.

It is ſaid, the late war with France coſt Henry five hundred eighty-ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and eighteen pounds ſterling, and the charges of keeping Boulogne eight years amounted to ſeven hundred fifty-five thouſand eight hundred thirty-three pounds. So large a ſum, which was not to be reimburſed ſooner than in eight years, had conſumed whatever had been granted by the parliament, and received from the chapels, colleges and hoſpitals. So that, early in the new year, Henry was forced to lay a tax upon his ſubjects, under the name of Benevolence (1), as appears in Rymer's collection.

This pacification reſtored between the two Kings the good underſtanding which had been ſome years interrupted, rather by the artifices of the Emperor and his party in England, than for any juſt cauſe. Catherine di Medicis, Dauphineſs of France, being at this time delivered of a Princeſs, and King Henry requeſted to ſtand godfather (2), he named her Elizabeth. Very ſoon after, theſe two Monarchs ſent embaſſadors to each other, to receive the oaths relating to the peace, and choſe for theſe embaſſies their reſpective high-admirals (3). It is reported that, while admiral Annebaut was at London, he commenced a negociation concerning religion, and that both their Majeſties deſigned to aboliſh the maſs in their dominions (4). With regard to King Henry, there is ſome probability, that he would have advanced the reformation had he ſurvived; nay, it is certain that, on account of this negociation, he ordered Cranmer to ſet down in writing how ſuch a change might be effected, and to ſtrengthen all with arguments and paſſages from the Scriptures: but this project ſoon evaporated in ſmoke. entered into this negociation only becauſe he deſired to be in ſtrict union with Henry, and knew experimentally, that the bare propoſal of conforming himſelf to his ſentiments in point of religion was a moſt effectual method to ſucceed: but it is not likely he really intended to admit of any reformation in his kingdom; and indeed, at this very time he was kindling the flames of perſecution all over France againſt the Reformed, of whom fourteen this year were burned at Meaux, and many more at Paris, and in other places; not to mention the maſſacre of Cabrieres and Merindol, for which none were puniſhed. The cardinals of Lorrain and Tournon, his chief miniſters, were too inveterate againſt the Proteſtants for any to imagine that, while they were in favor, the King ever ſeriouſly thought of aboliſhing the maſs in France.

Charles V prepares to attack the Proteſtants. Sleidan.

Before the peace between England and France was ſigned, the Proteſtant Princes of Germany ſeeing themſelves at the point of being attacked by the Emperor (who had at laſt taken off the maſk, ſince his peace with France and truce with the Turks) ſent to Henry Prince Philip *, brother to the elector Palatine, to deſire aſſiſtance. It appears in the King's letter to this Prince, extant in Rymer, that Henry had ſent for him; and lord Herbert affirms, that Philip aimed at eſpouſing Princeſs Mary. However this be, the King anſwered his demand of aid by ſeven propoſitions, containing the terms on which he was willing to enter into a defenſive league with the Proteſtants. But as his propoſitions tended only to render him head and ſole director of the league, they thought not proper to put themſelves blindly into his hands. They only told him, if he would depoſite ſomewhere in Germany a hundred thouſand crowns to ſerve for the defenſe of the league, they would prefer his alliance to that of Francis. But finding they offered no advantage for himſelf, he had no ſuch zeal for the Augſburg confeſſion (from which he was yet very remote) as to ingage in its protection without reaping any benefit. The truth is, the Proteſtants were perſuaded he had no deſire to be really united with them, but intended only to incourage them, leſt they ſhould ſubmit to the Emperor, as alſo to hinder them from puting themſelves under the protection of King Francis, with whom he was not yet in peace. For the ſame reaſon it was that, under color of continuing the negociation with the count Palatine, he retained Prince Philip at his court 'till he ſaw the peace with France was near a concluſion.

League between the Pope and Emperor againſt the Proteſtants. Sleidan.

It was now ſome time ſince the Pope and Emperor had formed the project of a league againſt the Proteſtants of Germany. They had agreed on all the articles; but Charles had thought fit to defer the ſigning, that he might ſay, he did it merely in his own defenſe. Finally, about mid-June, he ſent the cardinal of Trent to Rome, where the league was ſigned the twenty-ſixth of the ſame month. His Holineſs ingaged, for ſix months, to find twelve thouſand foot, five hundred horſe, and two hundred thouſand crowns, for the war in Germany. Moreover, he gave the Emperor a moiety of one year's revenue of the benefices in Spain, with power to alienate a hundred thouſand crowns-worth of church-lands. This was a demonſtration that it was a religious war, tho' Charles affected to publiſh the contrary.

The German war.

The Emperor having notice; that his Sanctity's troops were begining to march; that count De Bure had forwarded his levies in the Netherlands; and duke Maurice of Saxony, whom he had ingaged in his party, was ready to act when there ſhould be occaſion, aſſembled his army about Ratiſbon. His deſign was to meet the Pontif's forces, then traverſing Tirol, under conduct of Octaviano Farneſe. At the ſame time, to prevent this junction, the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe marched the ſame way, with an army forty thouſand ſtrong. Without entering into a detail of this firſt campain, I ſhall only ſay in general, that the Proteſtants, tho' ſuperior in number, could not hinder either the Italian or Netherlandiſh troops from joining the Emperor. The different tempers of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe did not a little contribute towards their taking wrong meaſures. In ſhort, the campain laſting 'till November without either of the two armies deſiring to ingage, the elector of Saxony received the ill news, that the King of the Romans and duke Maurice were deſtroying his country with fire and ſword. This obliging him to march, with part of the army, to the relief of his ſubjects, the landgrave, become too weak by this ſeparation, choſe likewiſe to retire into his dominions. Thus the Emperor meeting with no more oppoſition, took Francfort, Ulm, and ſeveral other towns belonging to the league, which furniſhed him with the monies he wanted for the maintenance of his army.

Continuation of the council of Trent. F. Paul. Herbert.

While the war was carrying on in Germany, the council languiſhed at Trent, and proceeded very ſlowly. Beſide that the members were very few, they were wholly dependent on the legates, who durſt not themſelves undertake any thing without orders from Rome. But it was the Pope's intereſt to prolong matters, becauſe he hoped time would procure him at laſt ſome occaſion to diſſolve the council, or remove it to Italy. Thus the council was merely a vain name, made uſe of by the Pope and Emperor for their own private views, and to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the public.

Perſecution in Scotland. Buchanan. Burnet.

Religion began alſo to cauſe troubles in Scotland, or at leaſt to produce the ſeeds thereof, by the deſpair to which thoſe who imbraced the reformation were driven. Since cardinal Beaton and the earl of Arran had injoyed the peace procured them by the King of France, they thought only of being revenged on their enemies. Religion furniſhed them with a pretenſe, becauſe the oppoſite faction almoſt wholly conſiſted of the Reformed. In the courſe of this year 1546, they put to death ſeveral perſons for religion at Perth, St. Andrews, and other places (1). The regent ſuffered himſelf to be ſo led by the cardinal, that he gloried in delivering to the flames thoſe whom he had formerly conſidered as his brethren. Among thoſe who were ſacrificed to the furious paſſion of this cardinal, a miniſter named Wiſhart (2), who ſuffered martyrdom at St. Andrews, was particularly remarkable. This man being condemned to the fire, the regent, at the inſtance of one of his friends, would have ſaved his life, and to that end ſent a note to the cardinal, deſiring him to ſuſpend execution: but the barbarous prelate, without regarding the regent's requeſt, not only cauſed the ſentence to be executed, but would alſo feed his eyes with the ſad ſpectacle, ſiting in ſtate at a great window of his caſtle. It is ſaid, that this miniſter, before he was delivered to the flames, told the executioner, "That within "few days, the prelate who beheld him with ſuch "pride from yonder high place, ſhould lie in the "ſame as ignominiouſly as now he was ſeen proudly "to reſt himſelf." This prediction proved but too true for the cardinal. Very ſoon after he was mur-

The ſtate of religion in England.

As for England, religion was ſtill on the ſame foot his Majeſty had been pleaſed to eſtabliſh it. The reformation had made ſome progreſs, but was far from being brought to perfection; and yet the Reformed could not forbear hoping the King himſelf would carry it much farther. In this belief, they judged it prudent not to irritate him, and that they effectually conſulted the welfare of their religion by remaining in ſilence, and waiting for better times. This is the true reaſon why fewer perſons ſuffered for religion in England than in France. It is not to be queſtioned that, had there not been hopes of a farther reformation, many people would have openly declared the opinions which theſe hopes induced them to conceal. For much the ſame reaſon, thoſe who retained all the tenets of the old religion, durſt not directly oppoſe the King, for fear their oppoſition ſhould carry him beyond the bounds he ſeemed to have preſcribed to himſelf. Hence reſulted a blind and univerſal compliance with Henry's will, and the exceſſive power he had acquired over all his ſubjects, of which he made a very ill uſe.

Henry much troubled with a ſore leg and his corpulency.

He had been troubled for ſome time with an old ſore in his leg, which was grown very painful. This, added to his extraordinary corpulency, which rendered him in a manner unable to ſtir, made him ſo froward and untractable that none approached him without trembling.

He grows cruel. Herbert, p. 263.

He had been always ſtern and ſevere, but was incomparably more ſo towards the cloſe than begining of his reign. Flattery had ſo corrupted his judgment and ſenſe, that he deemed it a moſt unpardonable crime to contradict his opinions, tho' he changed them himſelf very frequently. I have obſerved, that he treated with admiral Annebaut of aboliſhing the maſs, and changing it into a communion, after the manner of the Proteſtants: and yet, not long after,

Shaxton accuſed of denying the real preſenſe; Burnet.

Shaxton, who had reſigned the biſhoprick of Saliſbury, and been long a priſoner for refuſing to conform to the ſix articles, being accuſed afreſh of denying the real preſenſe in the ſacrament, Henry would have him tried according to the rigor of the law, and he was condemned to be burned. But this man, who had braved the incommodities of a tedious impriſonment, could not with like firmneſs behold the puniſhment prepared for him. The King having ſent the biſhops of London and Worceſter to perſuade him to recant, he was prevailed on, and abjuring his pretended hereſy, Henry granted him his pardon. He became afterwards a cruel perſecutor of the Reformed.

This example was not capable of moving Ann Aſkew, who was accuſed of the ſame crime, and rigorouſly proſecuted, tho' ſhe had good friends at court, where ſhe was well known (1). She firmly perſiſted, notwithſtanding all the promiſes to ſave her life in caſe ſhe would recant (2). Some court ladies, touched with campaſſion for her, having ſent ſome money for her ſubſiſtence when in priſon, were the occaſion of her being more cruelly tormented (3). Chancellor Wriotheſley, a great enemy to the earl of Hertford, hoping to draw from the priſoner ſomething againſt that nobleman, or his counteſs, cauſed her to be tortured: nay, it is reported that he would needs be preſent himſelf and, obſerving the executioner was moved with pity to the ſufferer, threw off his gown, and taking upon him the honorable office, drew the rack ſo violently that he almoſt tore her aſunder. But this is a fact which ſcarce ſeems credible (4). However, this unhappy gentlewoman, with her bones diſlocated, was carried in a chair to the place of execution and burned, together with four men condemned for the ſame crime (5). But, by way of addition to their ſufferings, they were made to hear a ſermon preached by Shaxton their falſe brother, who upbraided them with obſtinacy in very bitter and abuſive terms. All this was not capable of ſhaking their conſtancy, which indured to their lateſt breath.

Deſigns againſt Cranmer and the Queen. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 342, &c.

The enemies of the reformation perceiving Henry inſenſed againſt the Sacramentarians, thought it a favorable opportunity to ruin the Queen and archbiſhop of Canterbury, whom they conſidered as the grand protectors of the Reformed. Among the ſupporters of the old religion the chiefs were chancellor Wriotheſley, the duke of Norfolk, his ſon the earl of Surrey, Bonner biſhop of London, Gardiner biſhop of Wincheſter; and theſe had undoubtedly, among the courtiers and the King's ſervants creatures who failed not being ſerviceable on occaſion: but whatever project they formed they ſtill found in their way the archbiſhop of Canterbury who, having great influence over Henry, commonly broke their meaſures. In order therefore to be intirely freed from this formidable opponent, they reſolved to complain of him openly to the King, and accuſe him of being the head and protector of the Sacramentarians, and of all in general who rejected the ſix articles. This reſolution was executed. The perſon who took upon him to addreſs King Henry on this ſubject, told him, there were evident proofs ready of what was alledged againſt the ſaid prelate, and if he were ſent to the Tower ſo many witneſſes would appear againſt him, that even his Majeſty would be ſurpriſed. Henry was not ignorant that Cranmer had a ſecret diſlike to the ſix articles, as he had himſelf frankly acknowledged; but he really loved him, and therefore would not expoſe him to a trial which muſt have been fatal to him: beſide, he was much diſpleaſed that ſuch pains was taken to ruin a perſon for whom he had ſo often and ſo loudly declared. However, reſolving to ſee how far his enemies malice would be carried, he conſented that he ſhould be the next day ſummoned before the council, and ſent to the Tower, if they ſaw cauſe. But not long after *, the King ſent for Cranmer, and telling him what had been determined on, aſked him, what defenſe he deſigned to make? Cranmer thanked his Majeſty, and requeſted him that, ſince he was to be queſtioned on his ſentiments in religion, ſuch judges might be aſſigned him as underſtood thoſe matters. The King replied, he went the wrong way to ſave his life, for moſt certainly his enemies had witneſſes ready to convict him in ſuch manner, that the judges would be forced to condemn him; and therefore ſince he took ſo little care of himſelf, he himſelf would look to it. So he ordered him to deſire the council, to uſe him as a privy-counſellor, and as they would expect to be uſed in the like caſe, that is, that his accuſers might be brought face to face before he was ſent to the Tower; and if his requeſt was not granted, he was to appeal to the King. At the ſame time he took off his ring, and giving it to him, ſaid, if his appeal was rejected, he ſhould ſhew the council that token of his protection. Next morning Cranmer, coming to the council-door, was ſo long kept waiting in the lobby, that the King hearing of this diſreſpect, ſent word, that he ſhould be preſently brought in (1). It happened as the King foreſaw; ſo that Cranmer was forced at laſt to produce the King's ring, which terribly mortified his enemies. Then they all roſe up, and went and informed the King of what had paſſed, who told them, he thought he had a wiſer council than now he found they were; and, laying his hand on his breaſt, ſwore, that he took the archbiſhop to be the loyaleſt ſubject he had. The duke of Norfolk, willing to excuſe the council, ſaid, They deſigned the archbiſhop no harm, but only to vindicate his innocence by ſuch a trial as would have freed him from all aſperſions. But the King, looking ſternly at him, anſwered, "He would not ſuffer men who were ſo "dear to him, to be thus handled, with impunity: "that he was no ſtranger to the factions which were "among them, and their malice towards each "other, which he would either extinguiſh, or very "ſpeedily puniſh." Then he commanded them all to be reconciled to the archbiſhop. They immediately obeyed, tho' but exteriorly: but as for Cranmer, he cordially forgave them, as he afterwards plainly evidenced.

Henry mortifies Cranmer's enemies.

The Queen is accuſed, who happily brings herſelf off. Herbert. Burnet.

Seemingly, ſo great a mortification ſhould have made theſe men more cautious: but the ardency of their deſire to ſucceed in their projects would not ſuffer them to deſiſt, with regard to the Queen. They perceived, if the King had oppoſed their accuſation of Cranmer, it was not to obſtruct the execution of the law of ſix articles, but from a pure motive of affection for that prelate: that therefore their proceedings could not have diſpleaſed him as to the thing, but only in reſpect of the perſon. This made them think they ſhould find it eaſier to deſtroy the Queen, becauſe King Henry would never willingly ſuffer that his own wife ſhould differ from him in matters of religion. Catherine Parr, who was then on the throne, had gained the King's affection by her extraordinary care of him, and by daily giving him freſh marks of her gratitude. She was in her heart a Proteſtant, and even ſometimes took the liberty to have ſermons preached in her privy-chamber, before ſome of her ladies. This reached Henry's ears, but he took thereof no notice: nay, he ſuffered her to diſpute with him upon religion, imagining ſhe did it only for inſtruction; but at length theſe diſputes having been carried too far, he expreſſed his diſpleaſure, and even began to look more coldly on the Queen than heretofore. This made her enemies fancy it a fair opportunity to work her ruin, while, ignorant of their deſigns, ſhe was ſeeking occaſions to inſpire her royal conſort with favorable ſentiments of the reformation.

Henry VIII. An' 1546.

It was to Gardiner that King Henry firſt vented his diſpleaſure with the Queen: nor could he have pitched on a man more partial. Gardiner failed not to cheriſh the King's reſentment, by agravating Queen Catherine's obſtinacy, and her pains to inſtill her notions into the ladies who ſerved her. The chancellor, who was alſo let into the ſecret, confirmed what Gardiner had urged, and hinted to his Majeſty, that the Queen had incouraged Ann Aſkew in her perverſeneſs, and even inſinuated that ſhe was conſpiring againſt the ſtate. In ſhort, they went ſo far, that articles were drawn againſt her, and ſigned by his Majeſty. The chancellor puting this paper careleſly in his pocket, droped it, and the perſon who found it carried it to the Queen, who ſeeing the King's hand to ſuch a paper, concluded herſelf ruined: however, being adviſed by one preſent to indeavor appeaſing the King, ſhe entered his chamber with a ſettled countenance, as if ſhe knew nothing of what had paſſed. Henry received her kindly, and began to diſcourſe of religion. She anſwered, theſe matters were above her, and ſhe ought of him to learn what ſhe was to believe. "Not ſo, by St. Mary (ſaid the "King) you are become a doctor, and able to "inſtruct us." Catherine feigning to be ſurpriſed at his manner of ſpeaking to her, replied with great mildneſs; "She ſaw with grief he was "was offended at the freedom ſhe had ſometimes "taken to diſpute with him in points of religion; "but ſhe had done it innocently, with the ſole "view of diverting him, knowing what pleaſure "he took in talking of thoſe things, which none "underſtood better than himſelf; her chief aim "having been, not only to make him forget his "pain by ſuch ſort of diſcourſes, but alſo to "receive inſtruction herſelf; and indeed ſhe had "profited much: and if ſhe had ſtarted objections, "it was only to give him occaſion to clear the diffi-"culties which ſurpaſſed a woman's comprehen-"ſion." "And is it even ſo (ſaid Henry) then "we are friends again." So he imbraced her moſt affectionately, and ſent her away with very tender aſſurances of his conſtant love to her (2). On the morrow, which was the day appointed for conveying Queen Catherine to the Tower, Henry going to take the air in his garden, ſent for her, and preſently after came in the chancellor, with a detachment of the guards *. But the King immediately advanced towards him, and after a little diſcourſe, was heard to call him, in a very angry tone, Knave, Fool, and Beaſt. He then returned to the Queen, who, ſeeing him in a paſſion with the chancellor, indeavored to appeaſe him: but Henry anſwered her, that none had leſs reaſon than herſelf to plead for him.

Henry begins to hate the enemies of the reformation.

Theſe two attempts, againſt the archbiſhop and Queen Catherine, not only proved unſucceſsful, but alſo extremely prejudicial to the enemies of the reformation. From thenceforward Henry could not indure them, being ſatisfied their chief aim was to overthrow whatever he had eſtabliſhed. Gardiner was immediately diſgraced, and the King would not ſuffer him to be preſent in the council (3).

Burnet. Gardiner's diſgrace.

Henry reſolves on the duke of Norfolk's and earl of Surrey's death.

But a greater ſtorm fell on the duke of Norfolk, and his ſon the earl of Surrey. Henry, in a manner

(1) Dr. Buts, the King's phyſician, who loved Cranmer, went and told the King what a ſtrange thing he had ſeen: The Primate of all England waiting at the council door among the footmen and ſervants. Whereupon Henry ſent to the board to have him brought in immediately. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 343. Herbert. Stow.

(2) Whether the King had really deſigned her ruin or not, is differently repreſented by the writers who lived next that time. Some, ſays lord Herbert, believed it was not ſo much the King's intention to uſe the rigor of the law, as to deter her from reading forbiden books, p. 263. Hollingſh. Burnet.

(3) Tho' it appears by Gardiner's ſubmiſſion, extant in our records, that not long after he fell into the King's diſpleaſure, yet whether on this occaſion, or that he was a ſpecial friend to the duke of Norfolk (who was now alſo in diſgrace) or any other cauſe, is not there determined. However, the King excluded him from the number of thoſe whom he appointed his executors, and counſellors to his ſon Edward VI. Herbert, p. 263.

Henry VIII. An' 1546.

ſuffocated with fat, and perceiving his leg grew viſibly worſe, plainly ſaw he had not long to ſurvive. In this belief, he conſidered the duke of Norfolk and his ſon the earl of Surrey as two peers extremely capable of greatly imbroiling the Prince his ſucceſſor, during his minority. The duke of Norfolk was as it were head of thoſe who favored the Pope and the old religion, tho', like a good courtier, he had outwardly complied with all the King's innovations. Henry was contented with this external compliance, tho' he knew he was ever attached to the Pope, whoſe party was ſtill very powerful in England, and that his ſon the earl of Surrey was in the ſame ſentiments. This ſufficed to inſpire him with a juſt fear, that after his deceaſe, theſe two noblemen, aſſiſted by the Pope, the Emperor, and their partiſans, would labor to ſet the crown on Princeſs Mary's head, and ſo what he had been at ſuch pains to eſtabliſh, during his reign, would be utterly ſubverted; and, in reality, he had no room for doubt, if that party prevailed, they would deem his divorce with Catherine of Aragon abſolutely null: in which caſe, Mary was his only lawful iſſue, and the Prince his ſon a baſtard. He could not hope for a remedy to this evil from the parliament, having by long experience learned with how much facility that body, conſiſting of ſo many members, was carried away with the prevailing party. He therefore thought the beſt and ſhorteſt way to prevent theſe miſchiefs, and free himſelf from his apprehenſions, was not to leave behind him theſe two noblemen, whom he believed capable of diſturbing his ſon's minority, and even of depriving him of the crown. For this ſole reaſon their ruin was reſolved; but then ſome pretenſe was to be found, which is ſeldom wanting to thoſe who have the power in their hands. As ſoon as it was perceived that Henry's affection for the father and ſon was grown cold, certain perſons were ready to inſinuate to the Monarch, that they had pernicious deſigns againſt the ſtate (1), and only waited his death to put them in execution: that the earl of Surrey had refuſed ſeveral good matches, ſince the loſs of his counteſs, and it was generally (2) reported he aſpired to Princeſs Mary: that it was not without ſome private reaſon he uſed the arms of St. Edward the Confeſſor, tho' his father had taken them out of his 'ſcutcheon, but however the duke himſelf had left one quarter blank, in order to reſume that at a proper ſeaſon. On theſe general accuſations, Henry ordered them to be arreſted, and ſent to the Tower. That done, care was taken to acquaint the public, that all who had any thing to alledge againſt the priſoners, ſhould have a favorable hearing, and the King would pardon all perſons concerned in any conſpiracy with them, who would make a diſcovery (3).

They are ſent to the Tower. Herbert. Stow. Burnet.

Some time before this affair commenced, Henry reſtored the two univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, to all their eſtates, rents, and privileges, tho' by that act of parliament which gave Henry the lands of the colleges, they were to be ſuppreſſed. It might be thought not a little ſtrange that the parliament ſhould not diſtinguiſh theſe two univerſities from the reſt of the colleges, conſidering their antiquity, and the advantages the kingdom had thence received, and daily did receive, had it not been already frequently ſeen, that they had long acted ſolely by direction from court. There is ſome appearance that Henry remained long doubtful, whether he ſhould diſſolve or preſerve theſe two univerſities, ſince having received their humble petitions the begining of the year, he made them wait for his anſwer 'till October: nay, it was diſcourſed at court for ſome time, of making great alterations in their charters. But at length, the King reſolved to continue them on their primitive eſtabliſhment. Not long after, viz. on the nineteenth of December, he founded Trinity college in Cambridge, which is one of the nobleſt foundations of that kind in Europe.

Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. P. 106.

Mean while, diligent ſearch was, by King Henry's order, making for whatever could ſerve to form an impeachment againſt the duke of Norfolk, and the earl his ſon; the King, who found himſelf near his end, being abſolutely determined they ſhould quit the world before him. In this interval, he ordered his will, made juſt before his late expedition to France, to be brought him, and peruſing it, cauſed Gardiner's name to be eraſed from among the number of counſellors appointed for a council of ſtate, during Edward's minority. Sir Anthony Brown, who was preſent, would have ſpoken in the biſhop's behalf (4): but Henry anſwered, he knew Gardiner, and tho' he himſelf could govern him, yet none of thoſe who were to come after him would be able to do it.

The King ſtrikes Gardiner out of his will. Burnet. Vol. I. p. 349.

This will, extant in Rymer's collection of public acts, bears date December 30, 1546, and the King's name is at the bottom, with thoſe of ten witneſſes: but it is not eaſy to be aſſured of its being ſigned with the King's own hand. This was afterwards queſtioned. Mr. Rymer, who collected the records, would have obliged the public had he ſet this matter beyond diſpute, and informed us, whether he had the original in his hands, and if ſo, whether the King's name was in his own hand-writing. This he might have eaſily known, by comparing his name on the will with his uſual ſignings, of which doubtleſs he had by him ſeveral (5). The importance of this inquiry conſiſts in that the act of parliament, impowering the King to ſettle the ſucceſſion, ordered it ſhould be by letters patent under the great ſeal, or by his laſt will, ſigned with his own hand. Now it happened afterwards, that the Scotiſh line, not being placed in their proper order, queſtioned the validity of the will, maintaining that Henry had not ſigned it with his own hand-writing. Indeed it could, againſt this pretenſion, be alledged that, as the will was dated a month before Henry's death, there was no reaſon to ſuppoſe him then not able to ſign it. On the other hand, it is not impoſſible that, having ordered his will to be tranſcribed the thirtieth of December, he delayed to ſet his hand, and ſo was prevented by death. But there is moreover a ſtrong preſumption he did not ſign it with his own hand; that is, according to appearance, he was unable to write ſeveral months before his deceaſe, by reaſon his fingers were ſo ſwelled that he could not hold a Pen. This conjecture is confirmed by two papers in Rymer's collection, both prior to the will.

(5) Some gentlemen were deputed in Queen Anne's reign, by perſons of the firſt rank in the kingdom, to go to the chapter-houſe of Weſtminſter abbey, to ſearch for the original will among the records of the Exchequer. They found one conſiſting of ſeveral ſheets of ſoft coarſe paper, tacked together with a braid of green and white ribband; the writing of a mean and ſlovenly character. The will was ſigned on the top of the firſt, and the end of the laſt page, with the King's hand-writing, as pretended, but the character was fairer than ever he could make, and the hand ſtiff, like a counterfeit hand. Upon comparing his name on the will, with his ſtamp and his uſual hand-writing, it agreed with neither. See Acta Regia, p. 348. Vol. III.

Vol. XV. p. 100.

The firſt is a power of the thirty-firſt of Auguſt 1546, given by Henry to three of his miniſters (1) to ſign, in his name, all the royal commiſſions and acts of grace.

Ib. p. 100.

The ſecond is a like power of the ſixteenth of October following, to ſome of his council, to put the King's ſtamp to, and ſeal with his ſignet, all acts to which his Majeſty's hand was required (2). The reaſon alledged for theſe powers was taken from the multiplicity of affairs wherewith the King was burdened: but as he had never fewer than at that time, there is abundance of probability this was only a cloke to hide his indiſpoſition. However, as this diſpute, which concerned only the royal family of Scotland, was terminated by the acceſſion of that family to the throne of England, it is now of no conſequence; and therefore it ſuffices to mention wherein it conſiſted (3).

Order of the ſucceſſion.

Here follows the manner in which Henry ſettled the ſucceſſion, purſuant to the power given him by act of parliament, in the year 1543.

I. Prince Edward and all his poſterity.

II. The children King Henry might have by his preſent Queen, or any other whom he ſhould eſpouſe after her,

III. Princeſs Mary and her iſſue, provided ſhe married with the aſſent and conſent of the executors of his laſt will and teſtament, or of the major part of thoſe who ſhould then be living, given under their hands and ſeals. This conſent of the executors was a condition ſo annexed to the right he granted Mary to ſucceed in her turn, that without it his intent was ſhe ſhould intirely forfeit her title to the crown.

IV. Princeſs Elizabeth on the ſame condition with Mary.

V. Frances Brandon, eldeſt daughter of his ſiſter Mary and the duke of Suffolk.

VI. Eleanor Brandon, Frances's younger ſiſter.

If all theſe perſons ſhould happen to die iſſueleſs, or their iſſue come to fail, it was the King's pleaſure that the crown ſhould go to the next rightful heirs. Hereby he could mean only Mary, the young Queen of Scotland, grand-daughter of his eldeſt ſiſter Margaret, who ought naturally to have preceded the children of the King's younger ſiſter Mary.

That in caſe Mary performed not the condition required of her, the crown ſhould devolve to Elizabeth, as if Mary had died without heirs.

In like manner, if Elizabeth neglected performing the ſame condition, his intent was, that the crown ſhould devolve to Frances Brandon, as if Elizabeth had died without iſſue.

HENRY VIII. AN' 1546.

He appointed for executors of his laſt will thirteen lords, moſt of whom were privy-counſellors, as the archbiſhop of Canterbury, chancellor Wriotheſley, the earl of Hertford, young Edward's uncle, &c. Theſe thirteen (4) executors were alſo nominated for the Prince his ſucceſſor's privy-council, 'till he had completed his eighteenth year. Moreover, he named certain perſons who were to be called to the council on extraordinary occaſions.

Executors.

He ordered his executors to pay firſt all his debts, and then to make good all the grants he had made to diverſe particular perſons.

Debts.

He conſtituted the Prince his ſon heir to all his goods, plate, jewels, money, cannons, ammunition, ſhips, with all thereto appertaining, and injoined him to be guided by the advice of thoſe who were appointed for his privy-counſellors, 'till he had attained to eighteen years of age.

Heir.

He alloted to his daughters Mary and Elizabeth, 'till their marriage, a yearly penſion of three thouſand pounds ſterling, and to each a portion of ten thouſand pounds, or more, if the executors thought proper.

Legacies.

He left his Queen a legacy of three thouſand pounds, either in jewels or plate, as ſhe pleaſed, and a thouſand pounds in ready money, beſide her dower.

Finally, he gave five hundred marks to each of his executors who were peers, and to each of the others three hundred.

The greateſt ſingularity in this will is, Henry's paſſing over in ſilence the poſterity of his eldeſt ſiſter Margaret, or at leaſt his placing them after the line of his youngeſt ſiſter Mary: beſide, the clauſe in his will which ſaid that, after the poſterity of Eleanor Brandon, the crown ſhould devolve to the next heir, muſt have been favorably explained for this firſt branch, ſince the general words were liable to ſundry interpretations. This was the effect of the power the parliament had given this Prince to ſettle the ſucceſſion, or rather to unſettle and put it in a moſt horrible confuſion, had not divine Providence been more careful of it than he. No other reaſons for his proceedings can poſſibly be deviſed, than his hatred of the Scots, and his apprehenſion that the kingdom of England would one day fall under the dominion of a Prince or Princeſs of that nation; which nevertheleſs all his precautions could not prevent.

Remark on Henry's ſettlement of the ſucceſſion.

AN' 1547. The earl of Surrey beheaded. Herbert. Stow. Burnet. Hollingſh.

While King Henry's will was by his order tranſcribing, the duke of Norfolk's and earl of Surrey's proceſs was forming with great warmth. The King being determined on diſpatching theſe two noblemen, there was no poſſibility of ſaving them. The ſon was firſt brought to his trial, at Guild-Hall, before the lord chancellor, the lord mayor, and other commiſſioners, and put upon an inqueſt of commoners, becauſe he was not a peer of the realm, the duke his father being living. He had been "oft deſired to ſign it, but always put it off: but when he ſaw his death approaching, one William Clarke, ſervant to Thomas "Henneage, put the ſtamp to it, and ſome gentlemen who were waiting without, were called in to ſign as witneſſes. For this "he appealed to the depoſition of lord Paget, and deſired the marquis of Wincheſter and Northampton, the earl of Pem-"broke, ſir William Petre, doctor Buts, &c. might be examined, and their depoſitions entered in the Chancery. were examined, whoſe depoſitions lord Herbert has inſerted in his hiſtory: but there appears nothing ſufficient to convict him of high-treaſon, of which he was accuſed. What was chiefly urged againſt him was, his giving St. Edward's arms, from whence it was infered that he aſpired to the throne. However, Henry being reſolved he ſhould die, he received ſentence of death, and was beheaded the nineteenth of January (1).

Herbert, p. 263, 264.

Herbert. p. 265. Burnet.

Mean while the duke of Norfolk neglected no means to obtain the King's pardon. He knew him well enough to be ſenſible, that nothing but a blind and abſolute ſubmiſſion was capable of appeaſing him. To this end, he wrote him a moſt ſubmiſſive letter, declaring he could not call to mind he had ever offended him, and ſupplicated him for God's ſake to let him know the cauſe of his diſgrace: moreover he intreated, likewiſe that his accuſers might be brought face to face before his Majeſty, or at leaſt his council, that his cauſe might be maturely examined. He knew not, he ſaid, that he had offended any man, otherwiſe than in appearing ſomewhat zealous againſt the Sacramentarians: but therein he had only complied with his Majeſty's ſentiments and orders. He concluded with conjuring him to be ſatisfied with taking all or part of his lands and goods as he pleaſed, leaving him only a ſubſiſtence.

This letter produced a quite contrary effect to what the duke expected. By clearing himſelf, he accuſed the King of injuſtice, an offenſe which would not have been eaſily pardoned, even had not his deſtruction been reſolved. The duke, finding his Sovereign would not be moved, did on the twelfth of January, before the lord chancellor and ſeveral other privy-counſellors, ſign a writing, wherein he confeſſed, that on ſeveral occaſions he had been guilty of high-treaſon, in concealing from his Majeſty, that his ſon the earl of Surrey bore the arms of St. Edward the Confeſſor, which appertained to the King only: that himſelf had borne in the firſt quarter of his arms, ever ſince his father's death, the arms of England, with a difference of the argent labels, which were the proper arms of the King's eldeſt ſon, and of no other: that he owned this to be high-treaſon by the laws of the realm; and that he ſigned this ſubmiſſion without compulſion*, and threw himſelf intirely on the King's mercy.

* Or advice.

He is attainted in parliament. Burnet.

Very probably, the duke was induced of himſelf, or by the advice of his friends, to make this confeſſion, in the belief he ſhould never obtain his pardon except he confeſſed himſelf guilty, that the King might have room to ſhew mercy: but it was all to no purpoſe. His ruin was determined, and the King was not accuſtomed to deſiſt from ſuch reſolutions, when once taken. Mean while, as it might readily be perceived that the peers, who were Norfolk's proper judges, could not condemn him on the evidences which were to be produced againſt him, the King thought he ſhould more eaſily compaſs his ends by an act of attainder. So the parliament meeting at this time, a bill of attainder was brought into the houſe of lords, and read thrice, on the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth of January, and paſſed. In all likelihood, the duke's confeſſion under his own hand contributed very much towards paſſing the bill: at leaſt it ſerved to excuſe thoſe who durſt not oppoſe it. The bill, being ſent down to the commons, was read thrice, and returned likewiſe paſſed on the twenty-fourth of January. According to the method too frequently practiſed in this reign, it contained only general accuſations, without ſpecifying any thing except the duke's bearing the arms of England, with three labels argent. It was very ſtrange that no notice ſhould 'till then be ever taken of his arms which he had ſo long borne in the ſight of Henry himſelf, and his whole court, which he had received from his anceſtors, and for which he had the heralds opinions. The bill having paſſed in both houſes, the lord chancellor, earl of Hertford, and ſome other peers were commiſſioned under the great ſeal to give the royal aſſent (2): which done, a warrant was diſpatched to the lieutenant of the Tower, to take off the duke's head the twenty-nineth of January: but, happily for him, King Henry died the night before, and the council judged it not adviſeable to commence a new reign with the execution of one of the nation's principal nobles. It is to be obſerved, that during all the proceedings of both court and parliament againſt the duke of Norfolk and earl of Surrey, the archbiſhop of Canterbury withdrew to Croydon, without once appearing at court. As thoſe two noblemen were juſtly deemed his moſt inveterate enemies, he would not be accuſed of being concerned in what was tranſacting againſt them.

Cranmer retires to Croyden during the duke's proceſs. Burnet.

While theſe proceſſes were forming, the King was confined to his bed by a mortal indiſpoſition which brought him inſenſibly to his end: however, no conſideration of the account he was on the point of rendering to his Creator, was capable of moving him to uſe compaſſion towards two illuſtrious perſonages of one of the moſt ancient families in England, who had done him ſignal ſervices, and who had not thitherto been ever guilty of any crime meriting ſuch exceſs of ſeverity. On this occaſion, as on many others, paſſion and policy had in this King's mind the prevalency over juſtice and mercy. He was at any rate reſolved to ſacrifice theſe perſons to his ſon's ſafety, and by their death to eſtabliſh all the innovations which he had made in religion, being perſuaded they would imploy their utmoſt efforts to deſtroy them. The ſequel evidently demonſtrated he was not miſtaken with regard to the duke of Norfolk who ſurvived him. This lord's life, preſerved merely by a kind of miracle, plainly ſhewed how vain are humane precautions, when contrary to divine decrees.

King Henry's end approaches.

King Henry's illneſs perpetually augmented, and none durſt warn him of his near diſſolution. Every one dreaded leſt a Prince, who was always approached with trembling, would look on this charitable warning as a crime, and puniſh it according to an act of parliament, whereby ſuch as ſhould preſume to foretel the King's death, were adjudged traitors. But finally ſir Anthony Denny, one of his privy counſellors, had the courage and charity to inform him, that he had but few hours to live. The King thanked him, and expreſſed his great grief and horror for all the diſorders he had commited.

(1) Henry Howard (eldeſt ſon of Thomas third duke of Norfolk, by Elizabeth daughter of Edward Stafford duke of Buckingham) died much pitied, being a man of great parts and high courage, with many other noble qualities. His ſentence was generally condemned as an act of high injuſtice and ſeverity, which loaded the Seymours with a popular odium which they could never overcome. Sir Richard Southwel depoſing, that he knew certain things of the earl, which touched his fidelity to the King; the earl vehemently affirmed himſelf a true man, and offered to fight in his ſhirt with his accuſer. As to his giving the arms of the Confeſſor, he ſaid he did it according to the opinion of the King's heralds. His ſiſter Mary, ducheſs of Richmond, being examined, confeſſed that the earl her brother ſhould ſay, Theſe new men (meaning the Seymours) loved no nobility, and if God called away the King, they ſhould ſmart for it; with ſome other paſſionate words and circumſtantial ſpeeches, little for his advantage. Hereupon, Denny aſked him if any eccleſiaſtic ſhould be ſent for; and he replied, that if any, it ſhould be the archbiſhop of Canterbury: but Cranmer, being then at Croydon, could not arrive before the King was become ſpeechleſs. He had but juſt time to deſire him to give ſome ſign of his dying in the faith of Chriſt. The King ſqueezed his hand, and preſently after expired, in the night between the 28th and 29th of January 1546-7, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, having reigned thirty-ſeven years and nine months. His death was kept private three days: probably, the council took time to conſult, whether the duke of Norfolk ſhould be executed. Finally, after three days, the lord chancellor ſignified to both houſes, that the King was dead and the parliament thereby diſſolved (1).

END of the FIFTEENTH BOOK.

BOOK XVI.

Containing the Reigns of EDWARD VI and MARY I.

EDWARD VI. The Twenty-firſt King of ENGLAND, ſince the CONQUEST.

Edw. VI. An' 1547.

EDWARD VI, only ſon and ſucceſſor to Henry VIII, was in his tenth year, *ſince October, when, by the death of his royal father, he aſcended the Engliſh throne. His majority was, by the deceaſed King's will, fixed to his eighteenth year; but he died before he attained it, after a ſhort reign of ſix years. The hiſtory therefore of theſe ſix years, as may readily be ſuppoſed, will not be ſo much the hiſtory of King Edward himſelf, as of his governors and miniſters. There was reaſon to hope extraordinary matters from this young Prince, had it pleaſed God to bleſs him with a longer life. He had a moſt excellent memory, a wonderful ſolidity of mind, and was withal laborious, ſparing no pains to qualify himſelf for the well-governing his realms. At eight years of age, he wrote Latin letters to his father; French was as familiar to him as Engliſh: he learned alſo Greek, Spaniſh, and Italian. After that, he applied himſelf to the liberal ſciences, wherein he made a very ſurpriſing progreſs (1.) Cardan, who ſaw him in his fifteenth year, ſpeaks of him as the wonder of the age. The teſtimony of this Italian philoſopher was the leſs ſuſpicious, as it was after the young Prince's deceaſe that he publiſhed his praiſes, and in Italy, where his memory was odious.

* Nine years and three months.

His diſpoſition and good qualities. Hayward. Burnet. Strype's Mem.

As ſoon as Henry VIII had reſigned his laſt breath, the earl of Hertford, and ſir Anthony Brown, were by the council ſent to give young Edward notice of it, and conduct him to London. He was then with his ſiſter, Princeſs Elizabeth, at Hertford, whence the deputies attended him to Enfield. Here they informed him of the King's death, and paid their obeiſance to him as their Sovereign. After that, they waited on him to the Tower of London, where he was received by the council in a body, and proclaimed King the ſame day, being January thirty-one 1547.

He is informed of his father's death. Edw. Jour. Strype. Hayward. Burnet.

On the morrow, the council met to ſettle a form of government during King Edward's minority: nor was there much to be debated. The parliament had impowered the late King, not only to ſettle the ſucceſſion by his will, but alſo to appoint what form of government he ſhould think moſt proper, 'till his ſucceſſor was capable of holding the reins himſelf: wherefore all they had to do, was to open his will and obey the contents. There it appeared, that Henry had nominated ſixteen perſons to be his executors, regents of the kingdom, and his ſon's governors, viz.

Thomas Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury.
Lord Wriotheſley, chancellor.
Lord St. John, maſter of the houſhold.

As for Stephen Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, I have in the preceding reign obſerved, that, tho' he was originally among the regents, his name was eraſed,

The regents power by the will.

Theſe ſixteen, or the majority of them, King Henry had impowered to execute his will, and to adminiſter the national affairs as they ſhould judge requiſite. On this general clauſe, which gave the regents a power unlimited, were afterwards grounded many innovations which ſeemed very repugnant to what Henry had ordained, He gave them however no power to ſubſtitute others in the room of ſuch as ſhould die, but it rather appeared his intention was that the vacancies ſhould not be filled up. This conſequence was naturally drawn from his commanding the Princeſſes his daughters, not to marry without the written conſent of ſuch of the executors as ſhould then be living. It might thence be likewiſe infered, that he deſigned not that any of the regents ſhould be deprived of their dignity.

Burnet.

Burnet.

Beſide the ſixteen, who were to exerciſe the ſovereign authority during Edward's minority, King Henry appointed a privy-council who ſhould be aſſiſting to them, namely:

Henry Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel.	Sir Ralph Sadler.
William Parr, earl of Eſſex.	Sir Thomas Seymour.
Sir William Petre, ſecretary of ſtate.	Sir Richard Southwell.
Sir Richard Rich.	Sir Edward Peckham.
Sir John Baker.	Sir Thomas Cheyney*,
	Sir John Gage †,
	Sir Anthony Wingfield ‖,

* Treaſurer of the houſhold.
† Controller.
‖ Vice-chamberlain.

The late King's will being thus known, the council reſolved on a perfect compliance, and that very day the regents, as well as the counſellors, entered on their offices. I have already hinted, that the hiſtory of this reign relates leſs to Edward himſelf, than to his governors, and therefore it will be neceſſary to give the characters of ſuch of the regents and counſellors as had moſt ſhare in the tranſactions of thoſe times.

Characters of ſome of the regents and counſellors.

Of Cranmer.

The character of Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury is ſufficiently known by what has been ſaid of him in the foregoing reign. I ſhall only add two particulars. The firſt, that he was not very fond of meddling with politics, for which he was none of the propereſt, by reaſon of certain maxims of candor and ſincerity, which he followed, and which were very oppoſite to thoſe generally obſerved in the government of ſtates. What I would ſecondly obſerve with regard to Cranmer is, that he was ſuperlatively zealous to promote the reformation. Since he was no longer reſtrained by ſuch a maſter as Henry, he was ſo far from concealing his opinions, that he even labored with his whole power to eſtabliſh them by public authority. He was as it were the firſt mover of whatever was done with regard to the reformation, but his zeal was tempered with a maxim which he believed intirely requiſite; namely, to proceed leiſurely, and retrench firſt the groſs abuſes, that the people might be gradually accuſtomed to theſe changes, before the tenets of greater conſequences were touched. Beſide that this courſe ſeemed to him the moſt natural, he went upon another reaſon no leſs important, and which it will be proper briefly to explain.

Edw. VI. An' 1547.

In the late reign it has been ſeen, that Henry VIII left not his ſubjects free to approve or reject the alterations he had been pleaſed to make in religion: they muſt abſolutely either conform to them, or reſolve to part with eſtate, liberty, and even life itſelf. Hence the church of England abounded with multitudes, who outwardly imbracing the eſtabliſhed opinions, were not however inwardly perſuaded of their verity. This was the caſe with diverſe prelates, and many other dignified eccleſiaſtics; but it was the inferior clergy who were chiefly infected with this hypocriſy. Moſt of theſe were no other than monks for whom the court of Augmentations, and the poſſeſſors of abbey-lands, had procured benefices to eaſe themſelves of the burden of their maintainance, to which they were obliged on ſuppreſſing the monaſteries. Theſe men were ſtill bigoted to the errors deſigned to be reformed. Cranmer thought it therefore neceſſary to gain a little time, in order to change the clergy, by filling the vacant livings with perſons well inclined to the reformation. Herein he met with great oppoſition from the zealous, who wiſhed to bring the reformation to perfection at once, without regarding this mundane ſagacity, which they believed little ſuitable to the ſpirit of true religion.

Burnet.

Of chancellor Wriothesly.

Hayward.

Chancellor Wriotheſley was of a quite different character from that of Cranmer, and moreover his ſentiments in religion were utterly repugnant to the reformation. He was exceſſively ambitious, highly conceited of his merit, haughty, imperious, and extremely angry that his counſel was not always followed. This rendered him very troubleſome in the council, where no one could oppoſe his opinion without being liable to be treated with bitter and offenſive language: but he ſhewed his heat and paſſion chiefly on matters touching religion. Tho' he had outwardly complied with the late King's innovations, he was however ſtrongly attached to the Romiſh creed. Of this he had given evident proofs in the affair of Ann Aſkew, in his project to ruin the Queen, and on diverſe other occaſions: wherefore ſuch of the regents as deſired to promote the reformation, were from him to expect inceſſant oppoſition. Since the duke of Norfolk's impriſonment, the chancellor was conſidered as the head of the Popiſh faction. Accordingly, he looked on the reformers, and in particular Cranmer, as his enemies; as, on their part, they could not without great mortification behold him in a ſtation which inabled him to countermine their deſigns. Luckily for them, their party was ſtrongeſt, both among the regents, and in the council.

Of the earl of Hertford.

Burnet.

Dugdale.

Heylin.

Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, was of a noble and ancient family, which came over with William the Conqueror. Henry VIII having eſpouſed Jane Seymour on the tragic cataſtrophe of Queen Ann Boleyn, ſir Edward Seymour, the new Queen's brother, was ſoon after created lord Seymour, then viſcount Beauchamp, and earl of Hertford. From that time he conſtantly held ſome honorable imploy at court, as well while the Queen his ſiſter lived, as after her deceaſe. King Henry always expreſſed for him a ſingular eſteem, and imployed him in diverſe military expeditions, which he diſcharged in ſuch manner as ſtill augmented the regard and affection of his royal maſter. He was mild, affable, munificent, courteous, and guided in all the tranſactions of his life, by the principles of honor, virtue and religion; qualities rarely met with in wordly perſons. In a word, he had many fine and noble qualifications, with few failings. Among his faults, ſome charge him with immoderate ambition: but, very ſeemingly, this ambition was rather the effect of his zeal for religion, than a natural failing, as will hereafter appear. It is alſo ſaid, that he had no very able head-piece, and was therefore deemed properer to execute than adviſe. In the late reign he feigned himſelf to be of the King's religion, becauſe there was too much danger in oppoſing it: nor was it he alone who took that courſe; this being a reproach which may be made to all the Engliſh who lived in that reign, excepting ſome few, of both parties, who ſuffered death for reſiſting the will of that imperious Monarch. However, the earl of Hertford was inwardly a ſtanch Proteſtant, and conſequently a great friend of Cranmer. This drew on him the hatred of the oppoſite faction, and particularly of the chancellor, who had already attempted his ruin. He ever ſhewed exceſſive zeal for the reformation, and to him and Cranmer is properly due the glory of whatever was done, in favor of religion, during the reign of Edward VI. At King Henry's death he was lord-chamberlain. He was one of the regents named in that Prince's will, and, what ſtill inhanced his credit and authority, he was the new King's uncle.

EDW. VI. AN' 1547.

Of Dudley, viſcount Liſle. Hayward.

John Dudley, viſcount Liſle, was ſon of Edmund Dudley, whom Henry VIII, in the begining of his reign, cauſed to be executed, for having been Henry VII's inſtrument in his oppreſſions of the people. Henry VIII, feeling ſome remorſe for Dudley's death, was pleaſed, and poſſibly thought himſelf bound, to make his ſon a ſort of reparation, by creating him lord Dudley, and afterwards viſcount Liſle: thus the father's downfal gave riſe to the ſon's fortune. After Henry VIII had given him a place in his favor, he made a conſiderable figure at court. He was honored with ſeveral imployments, and always behaved to the King's ſatisfaction. He ſignaliſed himſelf chiefly in the wars by his bravery and conduct. Twice he ſerved as lieutenant-general under the earl of Hertford, in Scotland and Picardy, and had the honor of having a great part of the ſucceſs aſcribed to him, tho' he commanded not in chief. Afterwards, being governor of Boulogne, by a vigorous ſally from the upper town he repulſed the French, who were already maſters of the lower town. The inſuing year he commanded, as admiral, the fleet deſigned againſt France, and, after the French had refuſed to fight, made a deſcent upon the coaſt of France, and carried off a great booty. In ſhort, he was conſidered as one of the ableſt generals then in England. Very probably, had Henry VIII ſurvived, he would have advanced his fortune ſtill farther, ſince, with the qualifications of a ſoldier, he had alſo thoſe of a complete courtier. But, on the other hand, for his morals, he had nothing praiſe-worthy. He exceſſively loved pleaſure, and even ſometimes ran into ſhameful debaucheries: beſide, he was not over and above ſcrupulous with regard to honor and virtue. As his ambition was boundleſs, he ſtuck not at uſing any means whatever to accompliſh his ends. It may eaſily be judged, that one of this character had not much at heart the concerns of religion. During Henry VIII's life, he confined himſelf exactly within the limits that Prince had preſcribed. Afterwards, in the reign of Edward VI, he openly declared for the reformation, becauſe it was then the only way to pleaſe the King, and advance his own fortune: nevertheleſs, when among thoſe of the Popiſh faction, he muſt needs have expreſſed himſelf not their enemy, ſince the court of France believed him very far from being a Proteſtant: this is, at leaſt, what Thuanus aſſerts in his hiſtory. Hence it may be preſumed, he conſidered religion only as a means to raiſe himſelf, and had made it a rule to follow that which was moſt in vogue: wherefore, how zealous ſoever he appeared for the reformation, he was never looked on as one of its protectors, becauſe he was thought to act merely thro' policy. The figure this peer made, during the reign of Edward VI, ingages me to be thus circumſtantial in his character.

EDW. VI. AN' 1547.

Cuthbert Tonſtal, biſhop of Durhan, was counted a perſon of great abilities. He had been imployed by Henry VIII in ſeveral embaſſies, commiſſions, and negociations, and at length rewarded with the biſhoprick of London, and afterwards promoted to the See of Durham, the richeſt and moſt conſiderable in England, on account of the dignity of Palatine thereto annexed. While Henry VIII lived, Tonſtal like the reſt conformed to the religion of the Sovereign; but it might be diſcerned that, with no ſmall regret, he beheld the creed which, from his youth, he had profeſſed, undergoing ſuch gradual changes. He would have gladly conſented to the reforming ſome of the moſt notorious abuſes, but thought his Majeſty went too far; however, for fear of incurring the royal diſpleaſure, he ſubmited to what was injoined. He was nevertheleſs conſidered as one of the chief favorers of the ancient belief, and ſo much the more formidable to the reformers as he wanted neither learning nor capacity. Notwithſtanding Cranmer had a friendſhip for him, on account of his mild and peaceable temper, which afforded hopes of his being reclaimed.

Of Tonſtal. Burnet.

Sir William Paget, ſecretary of ſtate, was a very able politician, and for religion, of the reformers principles; by which means he had contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Cranmer and the earl of Hertford.

Of Paget.

We have little occaſion to dwell on lord St. John, lord Ruſſel, or the other regents, becauſe they were wholly guided by theſe already characteriſed. But ſome of thoſe privy-counſellors, appointed to aſſiſt the regents, muſt neceſſarily be mentioned.

The earl of Arundel, a peer of a very ancient family, was not greatly pleaſed at being only among the counſellors, while diverſe of his inferiors were inveſted with the dignity of regents. On the other hand, he was no well-wiſher to the reformation. Theſe two reaſons cauſed him willingly to concur with all the intrigues tending to produce any change either in church or ſtate. But he had the misfortune always to labor for others.

Of the earl of Arundel.

William Parr, earl of Eſſex, the dowager-Queen's brother, was a perſon of ſlender merit. He made however ſome figure in this reign, and was often imployed, becauſe he had the addreſs conſtantly to ſide with the predominant party.

Of the earl of Eſſex.

Sir William Petre, ſecretary of ſtate, was expert in the diſcharge of his office. He was become in a manner neceſſary, and therefore had a great ſhare in the moſt ſecret tranſactions of Edward's court.

Of Petre.

Sir Richard Rich, by profeſſion a lawyer, was a good courtier, who by his pliant temper found means to raiſe himſelf to the chancellorſhip.

Of Rich.

Sir Thomas Seymour, King Edward's maternal uncle, and the earl of Hertford's younger brother, deemed himſelf unhappy, on account of the diſtinction King Henry had made between his brother and himſelf, being only of the council, while his elder was a regent. His being uncle to the King ought, in his opinion, to have procured him greater honors. He had a boundleſs ambition joined to a high conceit of his own merits: wherefore the rank given him by the late King, in his will, not being capable of ſatisfying him, he wanted to mount higher, which occaſioned his downfal, as will appear in the ſequel.

Of ſir Thomas Seymour.

The form of the government was no ſooner ſettled, according to Henry's laſt will, but a change was propoſed. Some of the regents intimated, that it could not but occaſion great trouble and perplexity, if the people, and particularly foreign miniſters, muſt neceſſarily apply to ſixteen perſons of equal authoauthority, and moved, that one ſhould be choſen to be head and preſident, with the title of Protector. They added that, by this means, affairs would be more ſpeedily diſpatched, and yet nothing changed in the eſtabliſhed form of government, becauſe the perſon raiſed to that dignity ſhould not tranſact any thing without concurrence of the majority of his fellow-regents.

The lord chancellor opposes it in vain.

Chancellor Wriotheſley readily comprehended that this motion was made to his prejudice. As, by his office, he was next the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who did not much interfere in ſecular affairs, he was in hopes of becoming head of the regency. But he ſaw plainly that, if a protector was elected, the choice would not fall on him, but this dignity would be confered on the earl of Hertford, the King's uncle, who was not his friend: wherefore he ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, declaring the regents had no power to depart from the late King's will, authoriſed by act of parliament. But matters were ſo well laid before-hand, that, ſpite of his oppoſition, it was forthwith reſolved, that one ſhould be raiſed over the reſt, and ſtiled, "Protector of the "King's realm, and Governor of his perſon." However, it was with the expreſs condition, that "He ſhould do nothing without conſent of the "other regents." Then the choice fell, as was eaſy to be foreſeen, on the earl of Hertford, who ſeemingly had procured this motion to be made by his partiſans.

Reaſons for and againſt the election of a protector.

Indeed it was natural enough to elect for protector the King's uncle, and the perſon of the whole kingdom moſt concerned for his preſervation. Nevertheleſs many were of opinion that the regents had made a falſe ſtep in the very dawn of their adminiſtration, for the reaſon alledged by the lord chancellor. It might however be urged in their excuſe, firſt, that they had given no particular authority to the protector, and conſequently the form of government eſtabliſhed by the late King was not altered: ſecondly, that the will, impowering the regents, or the major part of them, to adminiſter the young King's affairs as they ſhould judge proper, whatever ſhould be determined by a majority of votes was deemed agreeable to the late King's will.

New dignities confered. Hayward. Burnet. Heylin. Stow.

While all requiſites for Henry VIII's obſequies and the new King's coronation were preparing, the regents were intent on a buſineſs which concerned themſelves in particular, or at leaſt the principal of them. Henry, not long before his deceaſe, had reſolved to confer new honors on diverſe of thoſe he had nominated regents and counſellors: he had even ſettled the revenues or penſions he deſigned to beſtow on theſe new lords, to inable them to ſupport their dignities. But as ſome had refuſed them becauſe they thought theſe penſions too ſmall, the affair was ſuſpended, both by reaſon of this objection, and of the King's ſickneſs and death: however, he had in his will ordered, that whatever he had promiſed ſhould be made good. This was ſufficient to put the regents on performing the ſaid ingagement, eſpecially as to them the benefit was chiefly to redound. But as the late King's intentions and promiſes appeared not in writing, recourſe muſt be had to the teſtimony of thoſe to whom he imparted his mind, who depoſed what they had heard from his mouth. On their teſtimony therefore, the earl of Hertford was made duke of Somerſet; the earl of Eſſex, marquis of Northampton; viſcount Liſle, earl of warwick; chancellor Wriotheſley, earl of Southampton; ſir Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley; Rich, Willoughby, and Sheffield, had the title of Barons, with the names of their families (1).

Alienation of the chantry-lands. Burnet.

As Henry VIII left not his coffers replete, expedients were to be deviſed to find the revenues and penſions aſſigned the new peers. No better was found than to alienate five or ſix thouſand pounds per annum of chantry-lands. Theſe promotions, with the revenues annexed, were not univerſally approved, becauſe they were all in favor of the regents themſelves, or the counſellors. Many thought, theſe lords acted too greedily at the begining of their regency, and that they ought to have waited 'till the King was of age. The protector eſpecially was obnoxious to much envy, by procuring for himſelf the two great offices of lord-treaſurer and earl-marſhal, vacant by the duke of Norfolk's attainder. The firſt was confered on him the tenth of February, and the other the ſeventeenth of the ſame month (2).

Thomas Seymour made high-admiral. Ib. p. 127. Edw. Journ.

The ſame day his laſt patent was diſpatched, his brother Thomas Seymour, juſt created baron of Sudley, was made high-admiral of England (3). Thus, about a fortnight after Henry's death, the Seymour family was advanced to ſuch grandure that it ſeemed ſcarcely poſſible to make thereto any addition. Happy might they have lived, would they have been contented! But we ſhall ſee hereafter that, by indeavoring to riſe ſtill higher, the two brothers fell into a gulf of misfortunes, which might have been avoided by a ſmall ſhare of moderation.

* Feb. 16. Henry VIII's funeral. Hayward. Burnet. Strype.

Henry VIII's funeral obſequies were performed with great pomp and magnificence at Windſor *. He had himſelf ordered his body to be there interred. The day before, his corpſe was brought to Richmond (4), and as the motion cauſed ſome watry matter to run thro' the coffin, it was reported to be blood, and that a dog licked it up. This was ſaid with deſign to verify the prediction, of that fryer who told Henry, in a ſermon, that the dogs ſhould lick his blood as they had formerly licked Ahab's. But beſide that ſeveral affirmed, it was not blood which ran from the coffin, the report of its being licked up by a dog was intirely groundleſs.

The ceremony being over, Edward's coronation was ſolemniſed, the twentieth of February, with the

(1) Sir William Paget, ſir Anthony Denny, and ſir William Herbert, being required to declare what they knew of the King's mind; Paget, whom he had moſt truſted, declared that, when the evidence appeared againſt the duke of Norfolk and his ſon, the King intended to beſtow their lands among ſome new peers he deſigned to create. Then he ordered him to write in a book ſuch as he thought meeteſt. Which done, the King aſſigned to each ſuch a portion of lands, out of the duke of Norfolk's eſtate, as he thought fit. Paget told him it was too little, and being ordered to acquaint with it thoſe who were to be advanced, many thought ſo too, and deſired to remain as they were. The duke of Norfolk hearing of this, and fearing if his lands were thus divided, they would never return to his family, ſent to deſire the King, that he would be pleaſed to ſettle all his lands on the Prince, for, ſaid he, according to the phraſe of thoſe days, They are good and ſtately geer. Whereupon the King reſolved to reward his ſervants ſome other way, ſo ordered the book to be thus filled up. The earl of Hertford to be earl-marſhal and lord-treaſurer, and to be duke of Somerſet, Exeter, or Hertford, and his ſon to be earl of Wiltſhire, with 800 l. a year in land, and 300 l. a year out of the next biſhop's lands that fell. The earl of Eſſex to be marquis of Eſſex, and ſo on, with yearly revenues to them. And the King having promiſed to give the earl of Hertford ſix of the beſt prebends ſhould fall in any cathedral. except deanries and treaſurerſhips; at his deſire the King agreed, that a deanry and a treaſurerſhip ſhould be inſtead of two of the ſix prebendaries. All this Denny and Herbert confirmed, for they then waited in his chamber; and when Paget went out, the King made Denny read over the book, and Herbert obſerving the ſecretary had remembered all but himſelf, the King bid Denny to write 400 l. a year for him. Henry Grey, marquis of Dorſet, had acted the day before as high-conſtable, by virtue of a like patent which limited the exerciſe of his office to the nineteenth of February, the day preceding the coronation, from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſeting. Seemingly, the office of high-conſtable was neceſſary only for certain preparatives, ſince it was to end before the coronation ceremony (2).

The chancellor's diſgrace. Hayward. Burnet.

I have before obſerved, that chancellor Wriotheſly, the new earl of Southampton, was ambitious, proud, haughty, and very troubleſome in the council, and moreover, a great enemy to the reformation and the Reformed. All theſe reaſons made the protector and moſt of the regents wiſh to be rid of him. They were ſo fortunate as that he himſelf afforded them a plauſible pretenſe. Reſolving to apply himſelf chiefly to ſtate-affairs, he had, on the eighteenth of February, put the great ſeal to a commiſſion directed to the maſter of the rolls, and three maſters of chancery, impowering them to execute the lord chancellor's office in the court of chancery, in as ample a manner as if he himſelf were preſent. This being done by his own authority, without any warrant from the lord protector and the other regents, his enemies failed not improving this occaſion to work his ruin. Complaint of what he had done being brought before the council, it was ordered, that the judges ſhould give their opinions in writing. Their anſwer was; that the chancellor being only intruſted with his office, could not commit the exerciſe thereof to others, without conſent of the King, or regency; that by ſo doing he had, by the common law, forfeited his place, and was liable to fine and impriſonment at the King's pleaſure. This anſwer being communicated to him in full council, he flew into a great paſſion with the judges, and even talked very magiſterially to the regents, the council, and the protector. He told this laſt in particular, that he held his chancellorſhip by indiſputable authority, ſince he held it of the King himſelf, whereas it was very queſtionable, whether he himſelf was legally protector. But his haughtineſs, inſtead of extenuating his offenſe, only ſerved to render him more criminal. Submiſſion might have mitigated his puniſhment, but by that vehemency of heat he gave the council room to treat him with the utmoſt ſeverity. He was immediately confined to his houſe, with a command not to ſtir 'till farther orders. Then it was debated what chaſtiſement he merited. No ſcruple was made as to depriving him of the chancellorſhip: but as to the regency, the point was not ſo clear, becauſe it was uncertain, whether the late King had placed him among the regents as chancellor, or as a particular perſon, like diverſe others who were not in any office. For this reaſon it was not thought proper to turn him out of the regency; but to render it uſeleſs to him, he was left under arreſt, and the great ſeal taken from him, and given to lord St. John*, 'till another chancellor ſhould be appointed. So the earl of Southampton remained a priſoner 'till the twenty-nineth of June (4), when he was diſcharged from his confinement, on entering into a recognizance of four thouſand pounds, to pay what fine ſhould be on him impoſed.

* Sir William Pawlet

After the protector was freed from this troubleſome opponent, he thought only of ingroſſing the ſole management of affairs, and to be effectually protector, whereas hitherto he had injoyed only the empty title, without any peculiar authority. To attain his ends, he repreſented to the regents and council, that ſeveral perſons doubted whether they could, by their ſole authority, name a protector: that the French embaſſador in particular had inſinuated a diſtruſt, that he could not ſafely treat with him, without knowing firſt whether he was duly authoriſed, ſince his title might be conteſted for want of authority in thoſe who had confered it. Upon this foundation, he deſired that he might be allowed to prepare letters patent, under the great ſeal, eſtabliſhing him protector of the realm, and the King's governor. His requeſt appearing reaſonable, it was granted, and probably he was left to draw the patent, wherein very ſeemingly he uſed ſome deceit. What gives occaſion for this ſuſpicion, is, that the patent aſſigned him prerogatives unthought of by the regents when they made him protector. There was no mention of the condition upon which he had been choſen: on the contrary, the King gave him ample power to do every thing as he in his wiſdom ſhould think for the honor, advantage and proſperity of his perſon and realms. Moreover, he appointed him a council, impowering him, with ſo many of them as he ſhould judge requiſite, to annul and change what they thought proper, reſtraining the council to act only by the protector's advice and conſent. It is true, this council conſiſted of the ſame perſons who before compoſed the regency and council, except the earl of Southampton. Fifteen of theſe were before regents of the kingdom, executors of Henry's will, and governors to the young King, but by this patent were only become mere counſellors to the protector, each according to the rank his office or birth gave him, without the protector's being obliged to follow their advice.

The protector's ambition. Burnet.

King Edward nominates the protector by patent. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 174. Burnet.

Remarks on the patent.

The other regents become mere counſellors to the protector.

It is, as I ſaid, very probable that the protector uſed ſome fraud on this occaſion: nor is it indeed any way likely the other regents ſhould ſo eaſily concur to be deprived of their whole authority; nay, in the ſequel we ſhall have evident proofs that they had no ſuch intention. Thoſe hiſtorians who have attempted to juſtify all the duke of Somerſet's actions, in order to preſerve to him the character of a true reformer, have very lightly touched on this point, whereas his adverſaries have expatiated thereon, by way of evidence that he was ſtrongly poſſeſſed with ambition. However, as the fact is certain, his motive only can be the ſubject of conjecture; ſome aſcribing it to his exceſſive ambition; others believing him not to have ſought being maſter of the government with any other view than that of more effectually promoting the reformation: there is at leaſt abundance of probability that Cranmer and ſuch of the regents as favored the reformation, were convinced that Somerſet's advancement would be greatly advantageous to religion.

Remarks on the protector's conduct.

After the patent was drawn, and the great ſeal thereto affixed, the protector had all the power. He governed with abſolute authority, without the clog of counſellors, ſince he was not obliged to conſult any who were not at his devotion. But on the other hand, this and ſuch-like ſteps drew on him the envy and hatred of many, and particularly of the nobility, who finally made him ſenſible of the effects. Certainly much was to be urged againſt this patent, which deſtroyed the form of government eſtabliſhed by Henry VIII, purſuant to act of parliament, which the King himſelf had no right to annul.

Treaties with France. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 135, 139. p. 126.

On the preceding day, two new treaties were concluded with France. The firſt was a renewal of alliance between Francis I and Edward VI, without prejudicing the ancient alliance between France and Scotland, and the treaties between Charles V and England. The ſecond concerned the articles which had not been explained in the late treaty of peace, namely, the bounds of the Boulogne territory, and ſuch fortifications as both Kings were making near that place. As to the boundaries, there was no great difficulty in ſettling them, becauſe, as England was to keep Boulogne but eight years, it was not very material whether its territory was a little more or leſs extended. But as to the fortifications, it was not ſo eaſy. While the late peace was negociating, Henry VIII, finding it would be in his power to preſcribe almoſt what terms he pleaſed, ordered the governor of Boulogne to begin fortifying Boulemberg, Blackneſs, and Ambleteuſe. At the ſame time he gave inſtructions to his plenipotentiaries, to inſert in the treaty, that neither of the two Kings ſhould be allowed to make new fortifications in or about Boulogne, but only to finiſh ſuch as were begun. This was done according to his deſire. However, ſince the treaty, the French had attempted to fortify St. Etienne, Portet, and La Pointe: whereupon diſputes aroſe between the embaſſadors appointed to ſettle the limits of Boulogne; but as the two courts were equally deſirous to avoid all occaſion of rupture, it was finally ſtipulated, that the Engliſh might continue the works begun: that the French ſhould have the ſame liberty with regard to the fortifications of St. Etienne, but ſhould diſcontinue thoſe at Portet and La Pointe. This treaty, and that other which renewed the alliance between the two crowns, were ſigned at London the eleventh of March. But King Francis died the thirty-firſt of the ſame month, before he had ratified them, leaving Henry II for his ſucceſſor.

Death of Francis I.

Henry II. refuſes to ratify the treaties. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 149. Burnet.

On news of Francis's death, a courier was diſpatched to Nicholas Wotton, embaſſador in France, with a commiſſion to receive the new King's ratifications, and ſee him ſwear to the treaties. But the Gallic court was intirely changed by Henry's acceſſion to the crown. The cardinal of Lorrain, and his brother the duke of Guiſe, managed all as they pleaſed, and it was not their intereſt that their Sovereign ſhould preſerve a good intelligence with England. Beſide their being ſtrongly attached to the Romiſh Pontif and creed, they were contriving means to prevent England from imploying her arms to accompliſh the match between Edward and their niece the young Queen of Scotland. They therefore inſinuated to Henry II, that it was his chief concern to recover Boulogne at any rate, leſt the Engliſh ſhould make uſe of that place to fruſtrate or diſconcert his future ſchemes. Henry, liking the propoſal, refuſed to ratify the treaties, and diſowned the embaſſador ſent to London by his father to conclude them. So, there not only remained occaſion of quarrel between the two crowns with reſpect to the limits of the Boulogne territory, and the new fortifications; but alſo, in refuſing to confirm the alliance, Henry ſhewed his intention to break the peace.

This was the firſt ill effect of the death of Francis I and Henry VIII; but it was not the only one: Germany, as well as England, ſuffered by the loſs of theſe two Kings. The Proteſtants, who had been roughly handled by Charles V, in the laſt campain, found themſelves wholly deprived of the aſſiſtance they expected from France and England. Henry II's miniſters judged it not proper he ſhould be ingaged in a war with the Emperor in ſupport of the Proteſtant religion: but, as policy ſeemed to require that he ſhould oppoſe that Monarch's progreſs, they perſuaded him of the neceſſity of firſt recovering Boulogne; after which, it would be ſtill time enough to protect Germany, in caſe the Emperor ſhould there grow too powerful. As for the court of England, there was no likelihood that they would, during a minority, undertake to ſupport the Proteſtants, eſpecially as France declined being concerned with them. Mean while, the Princes of the league having ſent to Edward for aid, fifty thouſand crowns were privately given them, with great caution, for fear of offending the Emperor. It is very true, the protector was inclinable to ſupport them: but it was not yet convenient to do it openly. The reformation was to be put on a good foot in England, before any thoughts of protecting it in foreign countries.

Affairs of Germany. Strype. Vol. II. p. 55, &c. Burnet.

Affairs touching the reformation in England.

Henry VIII's death was for England a ſort of criſis with regard to religion. It was in the hiſtory of his reign obſerved, that he ſteered a middle courſe in that reſpect. He reformed ſome things, but left others untouched. In general, the reformation he had begun may be ſaid to concern only the articles which were directly or indirectly contrary to his temporal ſovereignty or eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy. He was ſo rigorous, that he would never allow his ſubjects to differ in opinion from him, or at leaſt not to ſhew it openly: ſo all were under conſtraint; there being ſcarce one who did not believe either more or leſs than himſelf. No ſooner was he in his grave, but every one aſſumed the liberty of delivering his ſentiments in religion, tho' the laws made in his reign were ſtill in force: but ſome change was expected. If, on one hand, the Reformed grounded their hopes on Cranmer and the earl of Hertford, the adverſe party flattered themſelves that chancellor Wriotheſley, Tonſtal, and ſome others, would uſe their utmoſt indeavors to reſtore religion to its ancient ſtate, or at leaſt would hinder the reformation from making farther progreſs. The earl of Hertford's promotion to the protectorſhip, and the chancellor's diſgrace, gave all the advantage to the Reformed, who, ſeeing themſelves ſupported by the protector and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, entertained great hopes that the work of reformation would viſibly advance. This gave them the boldneſs openly to ſhew, and even publicly to preach their ſentiments (1). On the other hand, the contrary faction, finding the times not favorable, ſtrenuouſly urged, that religion ſhould be left in its preſent ſtate 'till the King was of age. They ſaid, ſince no alterations could be made but in name of the King, as ſupreme head of the church of England, it was neceſſary at leaſt to wait 'till he was capable of judging for himſelf: but to this the reformers would not agree. They on the contrary maintained, that the royal authority was the ſame, whether the King was or was not a minor. They the more earneſtly oppoſed this maxim of their adverſaries, as it influenced not only the affairs of religion but the government itſelf.

Burnet.

The reformers party was ſo ſtrong, that it was very difficult for their enemies to reſiſt them. King Edward himſelf was at their head. Tho' at the age he was then of, our ſpecies ſcarcely begin to make uſe of their reaſon, he made very conſiderable progreſs in the ſtudy of religion, by the care of Dr. Cox his preceptor, who was in the reformers ſentiments. The duke of Somerſet, Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury, Holgate archbiſhop of York, Holbeach biſhop of Lincoln, Goodrick biſhop of Ely, Dr. Ridley, and Latimer (who was freed from his impriſonment) were the main ſupporters of this party; and properly thoſe whom Burnet ſtiles, in his hiſtory, the Reformers. In the other faction were Princeſs Mary, Wriotheſley earl of Southampton, Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, Bonner of London, Gardiner of Wincheſter, with ſeveral other biſhops, and the major-part of the inferior clergy, conſiſting, as has been obſerved, of the ſuppreſſed monks and fryers, who had obtained livings. But it is certain that, tho' this latter party was as numerous as the other, they came abundantly ſhort of them in capacity and erudition: beſide, the government was in the hands of their antagoniſts. The ſaid party's power was alſo greatly diminiſhed from another cauſe, viz. the generality of them had made it a rule to oppoſe to their utmoſt the intended alterations, but, when effected, to pay them a ſeeming compliance. This conduct, tho' beneficial to particular perſons, was however detrimentral to the whole party, as it intimated, that they loved their religion only when attended with temporal bleſſings. The prelates and other eccleſiaſtics were properly the eſtabliſhers of this maxim, thro' fear of loſing their benefices.

Reſolution to puſh the reformation. Burnet. Vol. II. p. 26, &c. Fox. Strype. Vol. II. p. 46, &c. Heylin.

The preſent juncture being ſo favorable for the reformation, the protector, and ſuch of the council as were of his ſentiments, reſolved to improve it. To that end, they ordered a general viſitation of all the churches, and appointed viſitors, with power to aboliſh certain groſs abuſes introduced into the divine ſervice, and particularly with regard to images. With this viſitation commenced the execution of a deſign already formed of perfecting the reformation, which was properly but juſt begun in the late reign. As doctor Burnet, afterwards biſhop of Saliſbury, has given as full account of theſe matters as can be deſired, in his excellent Hiſtory of the Reformation in England, it will be needleſs to deſcend to particulars, whereof a much more ſatisfactory view may be taken in that illuſtrious author's elaborate performance. Wherefore, without diſcourſing of religion in the ſequel any farther than will be juſt requiſite towards comprehending our hiſtory, I ſhall confine my ſelf chiefly to the political affairs of this reign (1). The firſt which offers in the year 1547, is the war with Scotland.

Sequel of the affairs of England with Scotland. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 131, 142. Buchanan.

Henry VIII had left his affairs with Scotland in ſuch a ſituation, that the agreed-on match between Edward and the young Scotiſh Queen, was to be relinquiſhed, or the treaty executed by dint of ſword. The party againſt the marriage in Scotland was ſo powerful, that the others ſcarce dared diſcover their contrary opinions. Had the buſineſs been left to the deciſion of the two kingdoms proper forces, in all appearance Scotland would have been conſtrained to a ſubmiſſion: but the King of France took care not to abandon the Scots. He was highly concerned to prevent the King of England's becoming maſter of Scotland. Herein his ſentiments agreed with thoſe of the two Lorrain Princes, brothers of the dowager Queen of Scotland. This it was which gave the protector moſt diſturbance, eſpecially as Henry II had now declared, that he would aſſiſt the Scots to the utmoſt of his power. Mean while, the projected marriage was ſo advantageous to England, that it well deſerved ſome efforts to accompliſh it. Beſide, Henry VIII had, on his death-bed, ſo expreſly injoined, that all poſſible means ſhould be uſed to effect it, that the protector thought he could not be excuſed from taking ſome ſteps, to ſhew he intended to execute his orders. He therefore reſolved to carry war into Scotland. Indeed, it was a very extraordinary way of wooing the young Queen for King Edward. But in this the protector and council purſued the maxim of Henry VIII, who conſtantly flattered himſelf, that the inconveniencies, perils and calamities of a war would finally compel the Scots to execute the treaty. It was therefore with this view that they reſolved on a war with Scotland, and not with any deſign to make a conqueſt of that kingdom.

War with Scotland reſolved.

All being prepared, and the protector ready to depart and head the army, the French embaſſador ſollicited his conſent to a negociation, to attempt bringing matters to ſome accommodation before hoſtilities commenced. The protector, who was willing to manage France, complied with his requeſt, and the conference began the fourth of Auguſt. Tonſtal, who was firſt plenipotentiary for England (2), had orders to yield every thing, provided the Scotiſh commiſſioners had power to agree to the marriage; otherwiſe he was to break off the congreſs. This condition rendered the negociation ineffectual, becauſe the Scots had nothing like it in their inſtructions. So the protector departing in Auguſt, entered Scotland the ſecond of September, with an army of fifteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe (3), the earl of Warwick being his lieutenant-general. He took in his march ſome caſtles, and particularly that of Broughty (4) near the Tay's mouth, where he left a gariſon of two hundred men. A few days after, he came within ſight of the Scotiſh army, thirty thouſand ſtrong (5), with thirty pieces of cannon, who expected him on Pinkey-plain, very near Muſſelburgh.

The duke of Somerſet, as I ſaid, had undertaken this war very unvoluntarily, and purely to avoid the blame of not indeavoring to match his young maſter advantageouſly: nor did the view of that hoſtile army, ſo ſuperior to his own, increaſe his deſire to decide the affair by way of arms. Wherefore, to evade a deciſion ſo hazardous, he wrote to the earl of Arran, regent of Scotland, conjuring him to reflect on the torrent of innocent blood which was juſt on the point of being ſacrificed; and, to convince him of his own readineſs to accommodate matters, he made him this propoſal, viz. That he would retire to England with his army, if the Scots would agree that the young Queen ſhould be bred up in Scotland 'till ſhe came of age, and give ſecurity that ſhe ſhould not 'till then be contracted to any foreigner. This offer might have been accepted without any detriment, either to the Queen or kingdom of Scotland. Firſt, this condition obſtructed not the Queen's eſpouſing a Scotiſh grandee. Secondly, the very worſt could befal the Scots, was, when the Queen came of age, to be in the ſame ſituation as at preſent. Laſtly, the King of England or the Queen might die during this interval, and of courſe the death of either ended the quarrel. But the French faction was ſo prevalent in the council of Scotland, that this advantageous offer was moſt haughtily rejected: nay, a rumor was ſpread among the Scotiſh troops, that the protector of England would not hearken to any mention of a pacification, except the Queen was put into his hands.

Diſpoſition of the two armies. Patten. Hollingſh. Hayward.

The two armies were parted by the river Eſke. The Engliſh lay incamped two miles on the ſouth-ſide, and the Scots along the banks, on the north: ſo, had the Scots been willing to avoid a battle, very probably, the Engliſh would never have attempted to paſs the river in their ſight. Mean while the protector, having formed the deſign of approaching the Scots, and gaining a riſing ground, on the left, which commanded their camp, moved forward with his whole army: but the Scots, having thereof notice, immediately paſſed the river, and poſſeſſed themſelves of that poſt. The protector, having miſſed his aim, marched to the right towards the ſea, in order to incamp on a little hill not far from the river. This march made the Scots imagine he was approaching the ſea, to put his ordnance and baggage on board the fleet, which was entered the Frith, that he might retreat the more eaſily. The whole Scotiſh army were ſo poſſeſſed with this notion, that they conſidered the Engliſh as already vanquiſhed thro' terror. Mean while, the protector had poſted himſelf on the hill, and made ſome intrenchments before his camp. This confirmed the Scots in their opinion, that it was only a feint to retire in the night: ſo, reſolving to hinder the Engliſh from executing this imaginary deſign, they advanced in good order to join battle. The protector hearing of their march, inſtantly drew up his army, part on the hill, and part on the plain, and expected them. He had advantageouſly poſted his artillery, in a place which commanded the whole plain, and, on the other ſide, his fleet was near enough to fire upon the enemy in flank: nay there was a galliot which, being lighter than the other ſhips, came very near the land, and greatly annoyed the Scotiſh army.

Battle of Pinkey won by the Engliſh. Patten. Hollingſh. Hayward. Buchanan. Burnet.

On the tenth of September the two armies ingaged. I ſhall not recite the particulars of this incounter. Beſide that the hiſtorians agree not in the principal circumſtances, few perſons are really capable of giving a juſt account of what paſſes on theſe occaſions, and of pointing out the chief cauſes of gaining or loſing a battle. It belongs only to generals themſelves to be good hiſtorians on ſuch ſubjects. I ſhall therefore content my ſelf with obſerving the ſucceſs of this. After a very obſtinate fight, the Scots were routed, leaving fourteen thouſand dead on the ſpot, and, in their enemies hands, fifteen hundred priſoners, of whom eight hundred were gentry (1).

Loſs ſuſtained by the Scots. Hollingſh. Hayward.

Great conſternation in Scotland. Hollingſh. Hayward. Buchanan. Burnet.

This terrible loſs threw all Scotland into the utmoſt conſternation. The regent and dowager, after gariſoning Edinburg caſtle, retired to Sterling with the remains of their army, abandoning their frontiers to the ravages of the Engliſh. A few days after, the protector took Leith, and the Engliſh fleet, commanded by lord Clinton, burned ſeveral maritime towns in the county of Fife, with all the ſhips in their harbors. Then, the Engliſh army marched towards Edinburg, and entering without any oppoſition, plundered that capital. Such was the terror throughout Scotland, that had the protector improved his ſucceſs, by beſieging Edinburg-caſtle, there is ſcarce room for doubt of his either conſtraining them to relinquiſh the young Queen, or his conquering the kingdom: but affairs, which concerned him in particular, cauſed him to abandon this enterpriſe, juſt as he was about reaping the fruits of his victory. While he was buſied in Scotland, his brother the admiral cabaled againſt him in England, and had actually made ſuch progreſs that the protector was on the brink of utter ruin, at the very inſtant while Edward's arms were triumphing under his conduct. The intelligence he received, occaſioned his imagining that he could not too ſpeedily reach the court, in order to break his brother's meaſures. This was the real motive of his haſty return, which however was colored with other pretexts.

The protector improves not his victory.

He returns to England. Hollingſh. Burnet. Heylin.

The eighteenth of September he ſet out for England, having imployed only ſixteen days in his expedition, from his entering Scotland; and, if we may credit the Engliſh writers, loſt in all no more than ſixty-two men (2). In his return, he marched thro' the counties of March and Tiviotdale, and leaving a gariſon in Hume-caſtle, appointed ſir Ralph Palmer to be governor of Roxburrough, which place he ordered ſhould be repaired.

Is by the populace aplauded, but envied by the grandees. Burnet.

The protector's glorious campain, in Scotland, reminded the Engliſh of ſeveral noble exploits performed by him under the late reign. This gained him great applauſe from the commonalty, but withal envy from the nobles, who, if Sir John Hayward is to be credited, had no great eſteem for him. This contraſt between the nobles and people proved greatly to his detriment. It created in him too much reliance on popular favor, and induced him to affect a ſuperiority over all his peers, both by external pomp, and by aſſuming the ſole adminiſtration of affairs. As, by the royal patent, he was not obliged to follow the council's advice, he generally conſulted only his creatures, and neglected the others, as if no ſuch perſons exiſted. At firſt, this deportment ſeemed ſomewhat ſtrange in one who, very far from being naturally imperious and arrogant, was rather modeſt, affable and courteous. No other reaſon can be given, but his ardent zeal to promote the reformation. This was, doubtleſs, what occaſioned his judging it neceſſary to remove from the adminiſtration thoſe who were not led by the ſame zeal as himſelf, in order to leſſen the oppoſition, as far as he was poſſibly able. Beſide, he had paſſed the beſt part of his life in the court of Henry VIII, where he had ſeen the regal authority carried to the greateſt height; and, as Henry had ſucceeded by uſing rigor, he deemed it requiſite to purſue the ſame maxims. The reformation was certainly the ſole object this protector had in view, and all his proceedings in public affairs, both foreign and domeſtic, tended properly to that point.

Bonner and Gardiner ſent to priſon. Burnet. Strype.

The commiſſioners, appointed to viſit the churches, having made their report, it was found, that all the biſhops had complied with the council's order, Bonner of London, and Gardiner of Winchester only excepted. Theſe prelates had given advantage againſt themſelves, not by direct oppoſition, but by ſcruples and cavils, which plainly evidenced

Among them lay many prieſts and kirkmen, as they call them, of whom it was reported, that there was a whole band of three or four thouſand; but it was found afterwards not to be altogether ſo.

how averſe they were to all reformation. They inſiſted chiefly on the above-mentioned maxim, that it was not lawful to make any alterations in religion during the King's minority. As this principle might have had pernicious conſequences, with reſpect to the government, it was made a pretenſe to commit them to priſon (1), notwithſtanding their outward but moſt equivocal ſubmiſſion. The truth is, as ſeveral acts in favor of the reformation were intended to be paſſed in the next parliament, which was ſummoned to meet the fourth of November, the reformers greatly rejoiced at being freed from the troubleſome oppoſition of theſe two prelates.

Princeſs Mary complains of the ſteps taking to promote the reformation. Burnet. Strype.

Princeſs Mary was alſo diſpleaſed with the inſtructions given to the viſitors, and the deſign of advancing the reformation. She wrote on this occaſion to the protector, expreſſing her diſlike to all the innovations then making, and of thoſe propoſed to be made during the King's minority. The protector returned her a very ſtrong anſwer, and did not think himſelf obliged to conform to her ſentiments.

Lord Rich made chancellor. Burnet. Rym. Fœd. Vol, XV. p. 164.

Some days before the parliament met, lord Rich was made chancellor. The third of November, the day before opening the parliament, the protector, by a patent under the great ſeal, was warranted to ſit in parliament on the right hand of the throne, under the cloth of ſtate, whether the King was preſent or not, and moreover was to have all the honors, privileges, and prerogatives which any of the Kings of England's uncles, or any protectors had ever injoyed *. This procedure was a clear demonſtration that the duke of Somerſet's intention was, not only to be ſuperior to all, but even to deſtroy by degrees the very remembrance of the form of government eſtabliſhed by Henry VIII. Tho' he had not neglected cauſing this patent to be approved by the council before it was ſealed, that was not ſufficient to juſtify him intirely. It was well known the King did nothing but by his direction; that the council was at his beck; and that it would have been not a little dangerous for the counſellors directly to oppoſe a patent which concerned him in particular.

Parliament. Journ. Par. Burnet.

The parliament aſſembling the fourth of November, paſſed ſeveral material acts, relating ſome to the ſtate, and others to religion. Moſt certain it is that, in England, the number of thoſe who wiſhed a reformation was very conſiderable. However, it muſt not be imagined that then, any more than at this day, all the parliament did was conformable to the nation's univerſal ſentiment. The peoples repreſentatives, as they are at preſent, were elected without any inſtructions concerning the points to be debated in parliament, nay even without the peoples having thereof any knowledge. Thus, the houſe of commons had, as I may ſay, by a majority of votes, with concurrence of the lords and aſſent of the King, a power unlimited to determine whatever they deemed requiſite for the kingdom's welfare. There was not therefore, in order to obtain what the court deſired, any neceſſity of having the peoples general conſent, but only the majority of voices in both houſes. Hence it is eaſy to conceive, that the court uſed all imaginable means to get elected ſuch members as were in their ſentiments. This is now, and ever will be, practiſed Remark on this parliament.

'till ſome cure is found for the inconvenience. I call it inconvenience, becauſe it happens ſometimes that the parliament paſſes acts contrary to the general opinion of the nation. Of this one may readily be convinced, by what paſſed in the parliaments held under Edward VI, and Queen Mary his ſiſter. In the reign of Edward, Popery was utterly extirpated; and under Mary it was abſolutely re-eſtabliſhed. In one or other of theſe reigns therefore the parliament muſt have acted contrary to the peoples ſentiments, ſince one cannot poſſibly be perſuaded, that a whole nation ſhould, in an inſtant, have thus changed from white to black. I pretend not by this remark, to weaken the proceedings of Edward VI's parliament in favor of the reformation: what I advance is leveled as much againſt that of Queen Mary, as againſt this. My deſign is only to obſerve, that the determination of a parliament is not always a convincing proof of the whole Engliſh nation's concurrence. The reaſons therefore which may be drawn from the pretended conſent of all England, repreſented in parliament, either for or againſt the reformation, ſeem to be of very little weight. Each of the two parties will always ſay, and perhaps very juſtly, that the parliament which oppoſed them, was a parliament devoted to the King and Miniſtry.

EDW. VI. AN' 1547.

The preſent parliament was, in all appearance, directed by the duke of Somerſet, ſince it ſo readily favored all his deſigns. I ſhall content my ſelf with relating the ſubſtance of the chief acts paſſed this ſeſſion, without inſiſting much thereon, becauſe doctor Burnet has ſpoken of them ſo accurately and fully in his Hiſtory of the Reformation, that to repeat what he has advanced would be wholly ſuperfluous. Vol. II. p. 40, &c.

Act for repealing ſeveral ſtatutes.

The firſt ſtatute repealed ſeveral acts paſſed in the late and ſome former reigns: namely,

I. All acts declaring any thing to be treaſon but what was in the ſtatute of 25 Edward III. This ſtatute of King Edward had long ſerved for the ſtandard of treaſon, 'till, during the civil wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, and more particularly in the reign of Henry VIII, the liſt of treaſonable offenſes was greatly augmented: and and therefore, the parliament very juſtly reduced theſe offenſes within their old bounds, that the ſubjects might not be liable to ſo many rigors.

II. This ſtatute alſo repealed all acts, declaring that to be felony which was not ſo before the rupture with the Pope (2). Alſo,

III. The act which made the King's proclamations of equal authority with acts of parliament. Had this ſtatute continued, parliaments would have become uſeleſs.

IV. Two acts concerning the Lollards (3).

Act of the fix articles repealed.

Laſtly, By the ſame ſtatute, the law of ſix articles was likewiſe repealed.

By another (4), the King's eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy was again confirmed, inflicting diverſe great penalties on ſuch as ſhould call it in queſtion. It was alſo declared high-treaſon in any of the heirs to the crown, nominated in Henry VIII's will, and in their abetors, to attempt diſordering the ſucceſſion, as regulated by that Prince.

It was likewiſe inacted, that all ſhould injoy the benefit of the clergy (5), and the privilege of ſanctu-

(5) Benefit of the clergy was an ancient liberty of the church, confirmed by diverſe parliaments. When a prieſt or one within orders was arraigned of felony before a ſecular judge, he might pray his clergy, that is, to be delivered to his ordinary, to purge himſelf of the offenſe objected. But the ancient courſe of the law in this point of clergy is much altered; for clerks be no more delivered to their ordinaries to be purged, but now every man, tho' not within orders, is put to read at the bar, being found guilty, and convicted of ſuch felony as this benefit is granted for, and ſo burned in the hand, and ſet free for the firſt time, if the ordinary's deputy, ſtanding by, do ſay, Legit ut Clericus.

ary (1), excepting only aſſaſſines, poiſoners, and four ſorts of thieves (2).

An act paſſed in Henry VIII's time, impowering his ſucceſſor to annul laws made during his minority 'till his twenty-fourth year, was likewiſe explained; and it was declared, that this act ſhould only take place for the future, and not for the paſſed.

With regard to religion, ſeveral acts were made which cauſed very great alterations. Firſt, private maſſes were aboliſhed, and the cup given in the communion.

Another act impowered the King to nominate to the vacant Sees by his letters patent, and ſo aboliſhed the method of chuſing biſhops by Congé d'Eſlire (3), which was only a mockery, ſince theſe pretended elections were all made by the court's direction.

The eccleſiaſtical courts juriſdiction was alſo greatly abridged, by taking from them the cognizance of matrimonial and teſtamentary cauſes, which were removed to the civil courts.

Statute againſt vagabonds.

Then the parliament paſſed a very remarkable act againſt vagabonds. It was inacted, that if any perſon ſhould any where loiter without work, or without offering himſelf to work three days together, he ſhould be adjudged to be a ſlave * to the perſon who ſhould preſent him to two juſtices of peace, and be branded on the face † with the letter V imprinted with a hot iron. This law was thought very ſevere in a country like England, where ſlavery ſeems inconſiſtent with the privileges of its people. But herein the court, who governed the parliament, had in view only the monks, who being no longer in the monaſteries, and little inured to labor, could not think of working for their livelihood. Theſe men imployed themſelves ſolely in roaming from houſe to houſe to rail and cabal againſt the government, and inſpire people with the ſpirit of rebellion: ſo the court, judging it to be the effect of their idleneſs, and that if they betook themſelves to ſome buſineſs they would at length loſe this habit, reſolved to make them work, how unwilling ſoever they might be. Mean while, as the law was general, it occaſioned great murmurs among the people; wherefore it was never ſtrictly executed, and even repealed by another parliament.

* For two years.

Several indowments given to the King Statutes. Strype.

Laſtly, the parliament gave Edward all the lands deſigned for the maintenance of chantries, chapels, and colleges, which were not poſſeſſed by Henry VIII, and all revenues given for obits, anniverſaries, lights in the churches, together with all guild lands which any fraternity injoyed on the ſame account. This act did not paſs without great difficulty. Cranmer himſelf oppoſed it to the utmoſt of his power (4), not from any deſire to re-apply thoſe indowments as deſigned by the donors, but becauſe he hoped to find ſome favorable opportunity of converting them to other uſes beneficial to religion, whereas, being once in the King's hands, the church was deprived of them for ever. But all oppoſition was in vain. The nobility barked, as I may ſay, for the church-lands, which they obtained of the court on very eaſy terms. Beſide, the executors of the late King's will wanted theſe lands to diſcharge his debts and legacies. It is true, there was in the act a clauſe importing, that theſe lands ſhould be converted to the maintenance of grammar-ſchools and preachers; but it was never put in practiſe (5).

Edw. VI. An' 1547.

The parliament ended with a general amneſty, wherein were excepted priſoners in the Tower, and thoſe who had abſented themſelves from the kingdom. As Gardiner was not in the Tower, he injoyed the benefit of this amneſty.

General pardon, of which Gardiner has the benefit. Strype.

I juſt mention the reaſon which obliged the protector to quit Scotland and return to court, with a precipitation not a little prejudicial to the King's affairs. But it is now requiſite to be ſomewhat more particular on that affair, before I conclude the year 1547, becauſe its breaking out was during this ſeſſion.

Cabals of the admiral againſt his brother the protector. Burnet. Hayward.

Among all the protector's emulators, not one was more paſſionate againſt him than his brother, admiral Thomas Seymour. He was of a fiery, proud, and haughty diſpoſition. True it is, he was counted to have a greater ſhare of ſenſe than his brother, and to be more capable of managing great affairs: but this opinion might be owing to the faction he had made among the nobility, who loved not the protector. However this be, the admiral could not bear the difference King Henry had put between him and the duke of Somerſet, tho' they were both uncles to the young King. He thought himſelf, by his birth and natural qualifications, as worthy as his brother of having a ſhare in the adminiſtration of public affairs. Preſently after Henry's deceaſe, he gave proofs of his ambition, in making his addreſſes to Princeſs Elizabeth: but finding he was not like to ſucceed, he turned his eyes towards the dowager Queen, Catherine Parr, and ſo gained her affections that he privately married her, without communicating it to the duke his brother, then in the protectorial dignity. Theſe nuptials were ſo ſuddenly after Henry's demiſe that had Queen Catherine become pregnant ſo ſoon as ſhe might have done, there would have been room to queſtion, whether her child was the King's or the admiral's. Having kept his marriage private for ſome time, he found means, unknown to the protector, to procure a letter from the King, recommending him to Catherine for a huſband. He thereupon declared his marriage, without uſing any ceremony with his brother: and here commenced their difference. But the protector, who was a perſon of ſingular moderation, prevented their quarrel from breaking out, tho' he ſtill continued highly diſguſted with his brother. The admiral's envy was greatly increaſed by the duke his brother's promotion, who from a nominal was become a real protector. This envy, added to his natural diſpoſition, carried him at length to form the project of ſupplanting him, by inſinuating himſelf into the King's favor, and forming a party among the nobility. It is not to be doubted, the protector's ſecret enemies cheriſhed the admiral's ambition by the praiſes they gave him, confirming him in his prepoſſeſſion againſt the duke his brother. About Eaſter he began his cabals, with gaining the King's ſervants to his intereſt, that they might continue their young maſter in a good opinion of him. By their means he ſo ordered it, that Edward often came to his houſe to viſit his mother-in-law. It was there he moſt ſedulouſly made his court, and even ſupplied his Majeſty's privy purſe with wherewithal to make his domeſtics ſmall preſents (1). This greatly pleaſed the young King, who found himſelf freed from the trouble of aſking his governor for money, and of being accountable to him for what he did with it. All this could not be done without the protector's knowledge. He therewith taxed his brother, who denied all, but ſo haughtily that the protector might eaſily comprehend he little regarded his diſpleaſure. However he was unwilling to quarrel with him openly, hoping he might in time be reclaimed.

Burnet.

The protector was no ſooner departed for Scotland, but the admiral renewed his cabals with leſs reſerve than before. He diſtributed money to ſeveral perſons, and never ceaſed making his court to young Edward: nay, unknown to his brother, he even obtained a new and more ample patent for the office of high-admiral, with two hundred marks added to the ſalary. Sir William Paget, who was devoted to the protector, and perhaps had orders to obſerve the admiral's movements, ſeeing how he increaſed in favor with the King, thought himſelf obliged to diſcourſe him on that ſubject. But not being ſatisfied with the admiral's anſwer, he ſpeedily advertiſed the protector of all proceedings; and on this intelligence it was that he ſo abruptly ended his campain in Scotland and haſtened to court, in order to fruſtrate his brother's projects.

The admiral aims at ſupplanting his brother, and gains the King to his ſide. Burnet.

The protector's arrival ſufficed not to interrupt the admiral's deſigns. He rather made greater haſte to put them in execution, not to give his brother time to prevent him. He had gained ſome privy counſellors, ſeveral peers of diſtinction, and many members of parliament. In fine, he perſuaded the King, that the two offices of protector and governor of his royal perſon gave the duke of Somerſet too much authority, and that it was proper to part them, and confer the ſecond on him, in order to balance the protector's power. The young King was much better pleaſed to have for governor an uncle who had for him all imaginable condeſcenſion, than one who was much leſs complaiſant, and kept him more dependent. So his years not allowing him to make other reflections, he wrote with his own hand a meſſage to the houſe of common, deſiring them to conſtitute the admiral governor of his perſon. The admiral himſelf was to have carried this meſſage: but the ſcheme took vent before his deſign could be executed. The council, being hereof informed, deputed ſome lords to argue the caſe, and diſſuade him from farther proceedings; but thoſe deputies returned not with the ſatisfaction was expected. On the contrary, inſtead of regarding their remonſtrances, he replied in menaces (2): whereupon, he was ſent for on the morrow, by order from the council, but refuſed to obey. At laſt, he was threatened to be turned out of all his offices, commited to the Tower, and proſecuted on the act of parliament which made it death for any perſon to diſturb the government. This menace frightened him. He plainly ſaw, tho' he had the King on his ſide, that the young Prince, who was but juſt entered his eleventh year, would not have reſolution enough to ſupport him, contrary to the advice of the protector and council; nay, it was hinted to him, there was no likelihood the parliament would give ear to meſſages from a minor King, but would doubtleſs ſuppoſe him to have been impoſed on. He therefore choſe to ſubmit to the protector and council, and to be reconciled to his brother, who deſired only to reclaim him by lenity. However this reconciliation was not perfect. Soon after he made appear that, he had not relinquiſhed, but only poſtponed his deſign 'till a more convenient ſeaſon: and, in reality, he never ceaſed indeavoring, as well perſonally as by thoſe whom he had gained, to infuſe into the King a diſlike of the protector, and his other miniſters. This induced the protector to place ſpies about him, to be informed of his proceedings, conſidering him as a very dangerous enemy.

Edw. VI. An' 1547.

This year the face of affairs in Germany was intirely changed. The Emperor defeated and took priſoner John Frederic, elector of Saxony, and declared his couſin Maurice elector, who at the ſame time took poſſeſſion of the electoral dominions. After this diſaſter, the landgrave of Heſſe, finding himſelf unable to maintain the war, made with Charles the beſt terms he could, and came to him on the faith of a ſafe-conduct, which expreſly ran, that he ſhould not be liable to any impriſonment. But, by a groſs and moſt notorious knavery, was inſerted the German word ewig, which ſignifies perpetual, inſtead of emig, which implies any: by which baſe fraud he was detained and thrown into priſon, not to be releaſed but at his Imperial Majeſty's pleaſure.

Affairs of Germany. Sleidan. April 24. Burnet.

The impriſonment of the two heads rendered the Proteſtant party very feeble, and the Emperor's triumphant. The archbiſhop of Cologn, who had imbraced the Proteſtant religion, was conſtrained to renounce his dignities of archbiſhop and elector of the Empire. After that Charles made ſundry alterations tending to deſtroy the reformation, or rather under that pretext to render himſelf abſolute in Germany. On this account, even his Sanctity conceived of him a jealouſy. As, after Charles's victory, his embaſſadors were for carrying themſelves too magiſterially at Trent, the Pontif ordered the council to be removed to Bologna, under the feigned pretenſe of Trent's being infected with the peſtilence.

Hitherto Germany had ſerved for ſanctuary to many Proteſtants perſecuted elſewhere: but ſince the Emperor's victory, they were no longer ſafe in any part of that country. For which reaſon many repaired to England, where they perceived the reformation to be in a proſperous way. Among theſe were Peter Martyr, Bucer, Ochinus and Fagius, to whom Edward gave penſions and benefices, as appears in Rymer.

Tho' Henry II had refuſed ratifying the two treaties concluded at London in March, the Engliſh notwithſtanding carried on the fortifications of Bullenberg, purſuant to an article of the treaty of peace, as has been obſerved. But after ſeveral complaints from France, Henry ſent ſo rough a meſſage by his embaſſador, that the protector, rather than hazard a rupture with France, ordered the works to be diſcontinued, before the fort was finiſhed.

In the begining of 1548, the council made ſeveral alterations, with reſpect to religion. Carrying candles on Candlemaſs-day, aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, palm on Palm-Sunday, with the rites uſed on Good-Friday and Eaſter-day, were prohibited (3). Moreover, it was left to peoples choice to go to confeſſion or to neglect that practiſe, hitherto deemed a duty indiſpenſible. Some days after, it was ordered, that all images in general ſhould be removed from the churches. As England was then divided into two parties, ſome approved, and others cenſured theſe changes: but the council, in ſpite of all oppoſition, cauſed their orders to be confirmed by the King's proclamation, in virtue of his ſupremacy. Only Gardiner biſhop of Winchester openly oppoſed theſe innovations, on the maxim, that no alteration in religion could be lawfully made 'till the King's majority. He was not the only perſon who indeavored to inſtil this notion. All thoſe of his party labored that way, but had not the courage to do it publicly: whereupon he was commanded to appear before the council; and as he offered to ſubmit to whatever ſhould be preſcribed him, he was ordered to preach at St. Paul's upon certain points, whereof one of the chief was, that the King's authority was the ſame during his minority as when of age. He preached; but ſo little to the council's ſatisfaction, that it was reſolved to ſend him to the Tower. This ſeverity produced a great effect, in that all the friends of the Romiſh church determined on conforming, at leaſt externally, to what ſhould be injoined by public authority, when they found one of their chief ſupporters was not ſpared.

Mean while, the Scotiſh war gave the protector no ſmall anxiety. He evidently found it was ridiculous to think of accompliſhing Edward's marriage with the Scotiſh Queen by the way of arms, in ſpite of the dowager Queen, the regent, and the council. Moreover, he knew France was preparing to ſend them a powerful aid; and therefore he perceived it would be very difficult to ſucceed in this enterpriſe: beſide that this war would, moſt probably, occaſion a rupture with France. In ſhort, nothing was more repugnant than a war to his deſign of perfecting the work of reformation. He would have been glad the regent of Scotland had accepted a ten years truce, which he offered him: but the Scots would not hearken to it, becauſe France had promiſed them effectual aſſiſtance. The protector was therefore, even againſt his will, conſtrained to continue the war: but as he would not himſelf command the army, he gave the conduct thereof to Francis Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, whom he appointed his lieutenant. On this occaſion he plainly ſhewed, that his meaning was to ſtretch the prerogatives of the protectorſhip as far as poſſible, ſince he would have the earl take from him his commiſſion. However, as the patent, obtained the twelfth of March laſt year, did not ſo clearly give him the power of nominating his lieutenants, he got another drawn up, wherein his prerogatives were more fully explained and inlarged. In this, the King ſaid, that having, by his letters patent of the twelfth of March, appointed his uncle, the duke of Somerſet, protector of the kingdom and governor of his perſon, his intention was, that the clauſes therein contained ſhould be underſtood in the ampleſt ſenſe, and the moſt favorable to the duke: that however, as the generality of the terms might occaſion ſome doubts, he declared that he conſtituted him his lieutenant-general, and captain-general throughout his whole dominions, with power to order his ſubjects to take arms whenever he ſhould think proper, and to appoint lieutenants to command in his place, both by ſea and land. It cannot be denied, all this was very contrary to the late King's eſtabliſhment, and conſequently to the act of parliament by which it was previouſly authoriſed. All the favors granted by King Edward to any but the protector, could be juſtified by the protector's and council's advice. But thoſe done to the protector himſelf, muſt have been aſcribed wholly to the perſuaſions of the perſon who received them: nay, in favors which were ſomewhat extraordinary, this rendered in ſome meaſure ridiculous ſuch patents granted by his Majeſty, who was made to ſay, he granted them to the protector by advice of the protector himſelf.

Mean time, in the begining of ſpring, while the Engliſh court was conſidering whether the war with Scotland ſhould be continued, the regent of that kingdom had opened the campain with the ſiege of Broughty caſtle (1), which, tho' a fortreſs of very little conſideration, held him buſied three whole months, and all to no purpoſe. On the other ſide, while he imployed his whole force on this ſiege, the Engliſh took the caſtle of Hadington, and fortified it with all poſſible diligence. By means of this place, ſituated in one of the moſt fertile counties of Scotland, they made excurſions to the very gates of Edinburg, only twelve miles diſtant. They alſo took Lauder, and made there ſome works.

About the end of May, the Scots received from France a ſuccor of ſix thouſand French and Germans, commanded by Deſſé d'Eſpanvilliers. After theſe new troops were ſomewhat refreſhed, the regent joined with them eight thouſand Scots, and with theſe forces the two generals beſieged Hadington (2). During this ſiege it was that, after diverſe conferences between the French and Scots, it was determined to ſend the young Queen of Scotland into France. Many Scots however greatly diſliked that reſolution. They affirmed, when the Queen ſhould be in France, there would be no way to make peace with the Engliſh; whereas, without any prejudice either to Queen or kingdom, the ten years truce offered by the Engliſh might be accepted. This argument was combated by others, who maintained, that the aim of the Engliſh in this war being only to marry Queen Mary to King Edward, they would have no farther inducement to continue it, when once that expectation was deſtroyed. Nevertheleſs, it was eaſy to ſee that, by delivering up Mary to the French King, they were going to make that ally their maſter. But beſide its being by the French declared, that France would not ingage to aſſiſt Scotland on any other terms, the Queen-mother paſſionately deſired her daughter ſhould be at the Gallic court where her brothers the Princes of Lorrain were in a manner omnipotent. Moreover, the whole body of eccleſiaſtics earneſtly urged the Queen's being ſent over to France, thro' dread ſhe muſt finally be delivered to the Engliſh, and that their religion would be exterminated by her marriage with Edward. In ſhort, to win the regent, the King of France ingaged to confer on him the title of duke of Châteleraut, with lands to the yearly value of twelve thouſand livres. All this produced the reſolution of tranſporting Queen Mary into France, by the ſame ſhips which had brought over the auxiliaries: but, to avoid incountering the Engliſh fleet, this convoy made the tour of Scotland, by the north (3), and landed the Queen in Bretagne. During this interval, admiral Seymour, who in perſon commanded the naval forces, made ſeveral deſcents in Scotland, where he was always repulſed with loſs, and at laſt returned to England without having done the Scots any conſiderable damage.

ſand ſtrong (1), entered Scotland, under command of the earl of Shrewſbury. At his approach, the French and Scots raiſed the ſiege of Hadington, and retired: ſo, the general eaſily ſupplied the place with proviſions, and then marching towards the enemies, who lay intrenched in a very advantageous poſt, offered them battle; but, after facing them about an hour, finding they would not move from their intrenchments, he re-conducted his troops into England. It is no eaſy matter to gueſs what could be the motive of this abrupt retreat, which gave the Scots opportunity to make great progreſs during the remainder of this campain. No ſooner was the Engliſh army retired, but Deſſé attempted to ſurpriſe Hadington. He was at the gate, and juſt entering, when a French deſerter, who had fled thither, gave fire to a cannon, which diſcharging among the thickeſt of the French troops, ſo diſcouraged them, that they retreated with precipitation. Then Deſſé marched and fortified Leith, then only a village, but now a very conſiderable town. His deſign was to recover Broughty caſtle; but receiving expreſs orders to make an inroad into England, he advanced as far as Newcaſtle, without meeting any reſiſtance, and returned loaded with ſpoil. It is not known what was become of the Engliſh army, led by the earl of Shrewſbury into Scotland, and conſiſting part of Engliſh and part of Landſquenets. Theſe laſt were German troops, who had ſerved the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Heſſé, and having no leader in the Empire, had offered themſelves to the protector, who had entertained them in his ſervice. This had raiſed great murmurs againſt him; the Engliſh naturally loſing all patience when they ſee among them foreign forces, generally too much devoted to the King. It was eaſy to perceive the protector's aim was to ſtrengthen himſelf perſonally with the aid of theſe foreigners.

Before the cloſe of this year, the dowager Queen of Scotland, complaining to the French court of the conduct of Deſſé, who behaved with great arrogance, and ill-treated the Scots, had him recalled, and his place was ſupplied by De Thermes. The new general was accompanied with Montluc biſhop of Valence, who, being returned from his embaſſy at Conſtantinople, was ſent to be chancellor of Scotland: but the Scots were ſo diſguſted at ſeeing that eminent dignity in the hands of a foreigner, that the King of France ordered his removal and return. They began to repent ſending their Queen to France, when they found that regard which the French uſed to have for their nation begining to be on the decline.

Quarrels between the Emperor and his Holineſs. Sleidan. Burnet.

During this year, 1548, the Pope and Emperor had great differences concerning the council's tranſlation. Charles V, as I obſerved, uſed the pretext of religion to render himſelf abſolute in the Empire. The council aſſembled at Trent, a city in Germany, as the Proteſtants had required, furniſhed him with a color to compel them to ſubmit to its decrees. He was not ſorry at their refuſal to conform: but deſired they ſhould have no other reaſons than thoſe which they drew from religion itſelf, becauſe then the pretenſe of conſtraint remained intire: but by tranſlating the council to Bologna, a city of Italy, and appertaining to the Pope, this ſame pretenſe was taken from him, becauſe the Proteſtants had cauſe to complain of non-execution of the diet's decrees. On the other hand, his Beatitude, finding that, by the ſucceſs of one campain, Charles V was become in a manner abſolute in the Empire, grew jealous of his power, fearing it would reach alſo thro' Italy, and be very detrimental to the Holy See. For this reaſon, he was far from ſorry to have him always at variance with the Proteſtants of Germany, that his affairs there might obſtruct his forming new projects. Theſe different intereſts were the cauſe that the Emperor and Pontif could not agree. The Emperor proteſted againſt the council's tranſlation to Bologna, and his Holineſs rejected the proteſtation.

Interim granted to the Proteſtants. Sleidan. Burnet.

Soon after Charles, deſirous the Holy Father ſhould be convinced he could do without him, ordered the drawing up certain articles of agreement, which were ſtiled The Interim, becauſe the form of religion therein contained was to laſt only 'till a general council ſhould meet in ſome town of Germany. The framers of theſe articles, by Charles's order, took care to ſet them forth in the ſmootheſt terms poſſible: but, in the main, they contained the doctrines of the Romiſh church, tho' ſomewhat diſguiſed. The only conſiderable ſoftenings were, that marriage ſhould be no bar to prieſt's orders, and the communion in both kinds not refuſed to thoſe who deſired it. This work being finiſhed, the Emperor ſummoned a diet to Augſburg, where this Interim was propoſed. The elector of Mentz (without being commiſſioned ſo to do) thanked the Emperor for it, in the diet's name; and his Imperial Majeſty, interpreting that as the whole body's aſſent would not afterwards receive the proteſtations of ſeveral towns of the Empire againſt the Interim. The Roman court was likewiſe thereat highly diſguſted, becauſe, without conſulting his Sanctity, the Emperor had preſumed to diſpenſe with the marriage of prieſts, and communion in both kinds. This occaſioned many troubles in Germany, and obliged numbers of divines and others, who diſliked the Interim, to abſcond or retire elſewhere, not to be expoſed to the reſentment of that victorious Monarch, who was bent at any rate to have his Interim univerſally received. At this diet, Maurice of Saxony was ſolemnly inveſted with the electorate, of which John Frederic had been deprived.

Parliament which forwards the reformation. Burnet. Statutes.

While Charles V was laboring to deſtroy the reformation in Germany, it was daily advancing in England. The parliament, which met the twenty-fourth of November, was almoſt wholly taken up with matters of religion. By an act made this ſeſſion, prieſts were allowed to marry. Another confirmed the new liturgy, about which commiſſioners, appointed for examining and reforming the ſeveral offices, had been imployed the whole ſummer. This new liturgy retrenched diverſe abuſes, both in the common ſervice, and all the other offices, and gave the whole a turn favorable to the reformation. It is the ſame the church of England makes uſe of at this day, a few alterations excepted.

The protector and Cranmer are blamed by the zealous of their party. Burnet,

The protector and archbiſhop of Canterbury were the chief ſupports, and moſt zealous promoters of the reformation, tho' always in purſuance of the maxim they had eſtabliſhed, namely, to advance gradually. Whatever reaſons they had thus to proceed, the zealous of the reformed party liked it not, as being apprehenſive leſt, by ſome ſudden and unexpected revolution, the work would be left unfiniſhed. They were not ignorant that the protector was hated and envied by many of the nobles, and that the Romiſh party in general had for him a mortal averſion. This ſufficed to create a dread, that his enemies would at length prevail over him; the adminiſtration wherewith he was intruſted being of ſuch a nature, that it was ſcarcely poſſible he ſhould avoid rendering himſelf in ſome meaſure obnoxious. They had the more reaſon to be alarmed, when they beheld him obliged to ar-

The admiral's project againſt the protector. Burnet. Hayward. Strype.

Tho' the admiral had already undergone a ſufficient mortification, he ceaſed not however his practiſes againſt the protector, ſpite of the warnings given him from time to time, that they would in the end prove his ruin. The Queen his ſpouſe dying in September laſt year 1548 (1), he would have renewed his addreſſes to Princeſs Elizabeth; but met not from that Princeſs with the incouragement he had expected: nay, even could he have obtained her conſent, that would not have been ſufficient without the protector's and council's approbation. The late King's will expreſly debared her from the ſucceſſion if ſhe married without the executors concurrence; ſo the admiral, having little hope of ſucceeding in this ſcheme, turned his thoughts another way, in order to gratify his ambition. It is pretended, he formed a deſign to carry away the King, diſplace the protector, and ſeize the government himſelf, and for that purpoſe had already liſted ten thouſand (2) men in ſeveral places. However this be, he loudly and publicly exclaimed againſt the protector, charging him with inſlaving the nation by means of the foreign troops in his ſervice. It is alſo ſaid, that the protector, being informed of his whole procedure, bore all with exemplary patience and moderation, and declined coming to extremity, 'till he was evidently convinced that one of them muſt neceſſarily periſh. But, to confeſs the truth, there is no great reliance on what the hiſtorians report of the admiral's private deſigns, or of the protector's forbearance. The reaſon is, as ſome make it their buſineſs to blacken the protector's reputation as much as poſſible, ſo others do the like to juſtify all his actions. Thus much is certain, the admiral was not ſatisfied with his ſituation, but ſtrove to ſupplant his brother, and put himſelf in his place: but we cannot be ſo poſitive as to the means whereby he intended to execute his deſigns.

He is ſent to the Tower. Informations againſt him. Hayward. Burnet. Stow. Strype.

At length the council, being informed he was projecting ſome miſchief againſt the government, ſigned a warrant to commit him to the Tower: which done, commiſſioners were appointed to receive the depoſitions of thoſe who appeared as witneſſes againſt him. The report made by theſe commiſſioners was, that the admiral was charged with having, in conjunction with diverſe other perſons, formed a conſpiracy againſt the government (3), and of commiting many miſdemeanors in the diſcharge of the admiralty: that he was accuſed of protecting pirates, and with refuſing juſtice, whether to private perſons or to Princes themſelves, who complained to him of theſe outrages, by which the King was in danger of a war. It is ſaid, before he was brought to his trial, the protector indeavored more than once to perſuade him to reſign his office, and withdraw from court; but to no purpoſe: ſo his accuſation was drawn, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, whereon ſome of the council were ordered to interrogate him; but he refuſed to anſwer, demanding a legal open trial, and to be confronted with his accuſers. Next day, all the privy-council went in a body to the Tower to examine him: but he ſtill refuſed to anſwer, inſiſting on his firſt demand; which was not thought proper to be granted. It is ſomewhat ſurpriſing that, as (if the council-book may be credited) the particulars of this charge were manifeſtly proved, not only by witneſſes but by letters under his own hand, they ſhould yet refuſe trying him according to the national laws, and bringing his accuſers face to face; even tho' he was a peer of the realm, lord high-admiral of England, and the King's uncle. At laſt, finding he could not obtain this favor, or rather juſtice, he deſired the articles of his accuſation might be left with him, and ſaid, when he had conſidered them he would anſwer: yet even this was denied him. I know not whether it was lawful then to leave with the party accuſed the articles of his charge, and to allow him time to examine them: but as for bringing his accuſers face to face, it is evident that could not be refuſed without injuſtice, tho' this pernicious cuſtom had been introduced in the late reign. Nay, it ſeemingly ought to have been aboliſhed during a minority, or practiſed againſt any other rather than againſt the King's uncle.

His accuſation brought before the parliament.

However, the council having made their report to the King, it was debated, whether the admiral's affair ſhould be brought before the parliament, and a bill put in for attainting him; to which all the counſellors agreed, the protector himſelf not excepted. Herein, undoubtedly, their deſign was to preſerve intire the King's reputation, and to throw on the parliament the odious part of this proſecution. King Edward, who believed his uncle guilty, conſented likewiſe that he ſhould be delivered up to parliamentary juſtice. Before the two houſes proceeded againſt him, ſome of their members were ordered to take his defenſe. He gave anſwers to the firſt three articles, and there made a ſudden ſtand, and would not go any farther. This being reported, the bill of attainder very readily paſſed the upper houſe (4): but in the houſe of commons the oppoſition was much greater. They could not forbear exclaiming againſt attainders in abſenſe, and the irregular manner of judging the accuſed, without confronting them with the witneſſes, or hearing their defenſe. Perhaps they would have thrown out the bill on this ſingle conſideration, had not the King ſent them a meſſage, that he did not think the admiral's preſenſe neceſſary, and that it was ſufficient they ſhould examine the depoſitions produced in the houſe of lords (5). When the King had thus notified his pleaſure, the commons, in a full houſe of four hundred, paſſed the bill, not above ten or twelve voting in the negative. Very probably, they were convinced the depoſitions were true, and the point in queſtion being only an irregularity, which was even become a cuſtom, they judged it not a proper ſeaſon to put a ſtop to it. However this be, the royal aſſent being given to the act, the admiral was beheaded the twentieth of March (6).

was only againſt his brother whom he would have ſupplanted, and that, moſt apparently, it was this ſame brother who was his adverſary, and had brought him to the ſcaffold. It was farther urged, that the council would never have proceeded ſo rigorouſly againſt the admiral, had they not thought it agreeable to the duke his brother, or been afraid of diſpleaſing him by a refuſal. The King himſelf, then only twelve years old, would never have been induced to compel, as I may ſay, the houſe of commons to overlook the irregularity of thoſe proceedings, had he not been ſollicited by the protector to take a ſtep ſo extraordinary. It is therefore very difficult to juſtify the duke of Somerſet's proſecuting to death his own brother, for crimes commited againſt his perſon only: nor was it indeed ever clearly proved, that he had formed any ill deſign either againſt King or ſtate, as he proteſted with his lateſt breath. But this is not the only inſtance of plots againſt miniſters having been counted high-treaſon. For my own part, I cannot help ſuſpecting that they who then thought of ruining the protector, feigning to be his friends, moved him with all their power to be revenged on his brother, and were ready to ſerve as inſtruments of his vengeance, to render him odious. Some ſay, the firſt occaſion of this quarrel between the two brothers ſprang from the ducheſs of Somerſet's envy to the admiral's conſort, Queen Catherine Parr, of whom ſhe pretended to take place, as the protector's lady. But it is extremely improbable that ducheſs ſhould be ſo void of judgment, or ſo ignorant of the Engliſh cuſtoms, as to diſpute precedence with the Queen-dowager (1).

Sanders. Hayward.

Before the parliament broke up, a ſubſidy was given the King to aſſiſt him in the conqueſt of Scotland, which in the act is ſtiled, a part of his dominions. Then the houſes thanked him for the great happineſs they injoyed under him, and for applying all his indeavors to the advancement of the true religion. The clergy alſo granted him a ſubſidy, after which the parliament was, on the fourteenth of March, prorogued to the fourth of November.

Subſidy granted to King Edward.

Preſently after, the council appointed commiſſioners to eſtabliſh the new liturgy in all the churches. It was every where received without oppoſition, except by Princeſs Mary, who would never ſubmit to this innovation. The King and council ſeemed determined on uſing compulſion: but on the Emperor's interceſſion, it was, for reaſons of ſtate, thought adviſable to promiſe leaving her for ſome time undiſturbed. He afterwards pretended that the promiſe was made without any reſtriction.

The new liturgy univerſally eſtabliſhed. Burnet. Princeſs Mary refuſes it.

At this time, the council having information of diverſe German Anabaptiſts being come over to England, and fearing they might ſpread their errors, commiſſioned Cranmer and ſome others to draw up informations againſt thoſe people, and bring them to trial. A wretched Engliſh woman, Joan Bocher, commonly called Joan of Kent, who had ſuffered herſelf to be ſeduced, being invincibly obſtinate, was pronounced a heretic, and as ſuch delivered over to the ſecular arm, and ſentenced to the fire. But when the King was moved to ſign the warrant for her execution, he could not be prevailed on to do it. He thought the ſentence very unjuſt and cruel. Archbiſhop Cranmer, who had over him great influence, was imployed to perſuade him to ſign. At length, the young King, ſilenced rather than convinced by Cranmer's reaſons (2), ſet his hand to the warrant, with tears in his eyes, telling him, if he did wrong, ſince it was in ſubmiſſion to his authority, he ſhould anſwer for it to God. Whatever the archbiſhop's arguments were, it may be affirmed, this was not one of his brighteſt actions. He would doubtleſs have done better, not to have concerned himſelf in this affair, ſo little becoming a Proteſtant biſhop. Accordingly this proceeding has been often objected to him, and even ſerved for foundation to very diſadvantageous reflections on the reformation and its partiſans. The King ſigns her warrant with tears Burnet.

While all England ſeemed to receive ſubmiſſively whatever came from court, the leaven of diſcontent was fermenting in the kingdom, and on the point of producing great alterations. The chief occaſion ſprang from the peoples not being able to gain their livelihood with the ſame eaſe as formerly. This affected all in general, as well of the new as of the old religion: but the prieſts, the ſuppreſſed monks, and they who were ſtill attached to the Romiſh creed, took thence occaſion to inflame the diſcontent univerſally ſpread among the populace, in order to incite them to a rebellion: moreover, the duke of Somerſet's enemies were not ſorry that the people appeared diſſatisfied with the government. But before I ſpeak of the inſurrections in diverſe parts of England, during the courſe of this year, it will be neceſſary to make known the cauſes.

Complaints of the people againſt the nobles. Hayward. Burnet.

After the ſuppreſſion of abbies, great numbers of Monks, diſperſed in the kingdom, were forced to work for their living, their penſions being either ill-paid, or not ſufficient for their ſubſiſtence: ſo, the work being divided among ſo many, the profit was much leſs than before. Beſide, while the monaſteries were on foot, their lands were let at eaſy rents to farmers, who were obliged to keep imployed a multitude of hands, to cultivate the eſtates they farmed: but after theſe lands became poſſeſſed by the nobility and gentry, the rents were much raiſed, whence the farmers, to make them turn to better account, were forced to imploy fewer hands, and lower the wages. On the other ſide, the proprietors of thoſe eſtates finding, ſince the laſt peace with France, the woollen trade flouriſhed, took to breeding ſheep, becauſe wooll brought them in more money than corn; and had therefore their grounds incloſed. Hence aroſe ſeveral inconveniencies. Firſt, the price of corn was inhanced, to the great detriment of the meaner ſort of people. Next, the landlords, or their farmers, needed very few people to look after their flocks in theſe incloſures; conſequently great numbers loſt the means of geting their livelihood; and the profit of the lands, which before was ſhared among many, was almoſt wholly ingroſſed by the landlords. This occaſioned numberleſs complaints and murmurs among the commonalty, who perceived they were like to be reduced to great miſery: nay, diverſe ſmall pamphlets were publiſhed, ſhewing the miſchiefs of theſe proceedings; but the nobility and gentry ſtill went on the ſame courſe, without concerning themſelves about what might inſue. The protector openly ſided with the complainants;

(2) King Edward thought it a cruelty too like that which the Reformers had condemned in Papiſts, to burn any for their conſcience. He aſked Cranmer, What my lord? Will you have me ſend her quick to the devil in her error? So that Cranmer himſelf confeſſed, that he had never ſo much to do in all his life, as to cauſe the King to ſign the warrant, ſaying, that he would lay all the charge upon Cranmer before God. But to bring him to a compliance, Cranmer argued from the law of Moſes, by which blaſphemers were to be ſtoned. He ſaid, he made a difference between errors in other points of divinity, and thoſe directly againſt the Apoſtles creed; that theſe were impieties which a Prince, as God's deputy, ought to puniſh. whether to mortify the nobles, by whom he was not beloved, or becauſe he foreſaw what ill conſequences might ariſe from this popular diſguſt. The inhabitants about Hampton-court complaining laſt year to the council, concerning a park incloſed there by Henry VIII, the protector gave them ſatisfaction, and the park was intirely laid open. Since the ſaid preceding year, he had appointed commiſſioners to examine, whether thoſe who had purchaſed the abbey-lands kept hoſpitality, and performed all the conditions on which theſe lands were ſold them (1): but he met with ſo many obſtacles in the execution of this order, that it had no effect: mean while, the protector thereby drew on himſelf the farther hatred of the nobility and gentry, whoſe intereſt it was to continue theſe abuſes: nay, it happened in the laſt parliament, that the lords paſſed an act for impowering all perſons, if they pleaſed, to incloſe their reſpective grounds. But the bill was thrown out by the commons; and yet the lords, and others, continued incloſing their lands. This bred a general diſcontent among the people, who imagined, there was a ſettled deſign to ruin and reduce them to bondage. Whereupon the common people roſe in Wiltſhire*: but ſir William Herbert diſperſed them, and cauſed ſome to be hanged. About the ſame time, happened the like inſurrections in Suſſex, Hampſhire, Kent, Gloceſterſhire, Suffolk, Warwickſhire, Eſſex, Hertfordſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, and Worceſterſhire.

The protector perceiving the flames were kindling throughout the whole realm, ſent to acquaint the mutinineers that he was ready to redreſs their grievances, and by that means put a ſtop to their fury. To make good his promiſe, he brought the affair before the council, hoping ſome expedient would be found to ſatisfy thoſe male-contents: but the oppoſition he there met with was ſuch, that he thought himſelf obliged to take care of it by his ſole authority: ſo, contrary to the whole council's ſentiment, he iſſued a proclamation againſt all new incloſures, and granted a general pardon for whatever was already tranſacted. He moreover appointed commiſſioners, with a very extenſive power, to hear and determine cauſes touching incloſures*, and adminiſter ſtrict juſtice to the people. Theſe commiſſioners were loudly exclaimed againſt by the nobility and gentry, who openly complained, that the protector groſly invaded their property, and would ſubject them thus to a deſpotic domination; nay, they directly oppoſed the commiſſioners when they offered to execute their commiſſion. For this reaſon, the protector, who every where, found opponents, could not render juſtice to the people ſo amply as he deſired. So, the male-contents, finding the court performed not what was promiſed, roſe again in ſeveral places, and particularly in Oxfordſhire, Devonſhire, Norfolk and Yorkſhire. The inſurrection in Devonſhire was more conſiderable and dangerous. That county abounding with ſuch as had only complied outwardly with the innovations in religion, the prieſts and monks glided in among them, and did their utmoſt to foment the rebellion. They gathered firſt into a body on the tenth of June, and were very ſpeedily ten thouſand ſtrong. The protector at firſt neglected this affair in expectation theſe revolters would as eaſily diſperſe as thoſe in the other counties had done; but finding at length that they perſiſted in their rebellion, he ſent againſt them lord Ruſſel, with a ſlender force. This commander, who found himſelf too weak to attack them, kept at ſome diſtance* and offered to receive and ſend their complaints to the council: but this proceeding, which was a plain evidence of his fear, ſerved only for their farther incouragement. At the ſame time they ſet at their head Humphrey Arundel, a Corniſh gentleman, who was come to join them. Mean while, to ſhow they had not taken arms thro' mere caprice, they ſent to the King's general their demands, which ſufficiently made appear that religion was the chief motive of their revolt. When the rebels found that the court granted not one of their demands, reduced them to eight, which were no better liked than the former: nevertheleſs, to convince the public of the juſtice of this refuſal, the council thought fit to anſwer theſe demands in the King's name. They beſiege Exeter. July 2. Hayward. Burnet. Hollingſh. Fox.

The negociation breaking off in July, the rebels beſieged Exeter, where they met with more reſiſtance than they expected from a place defended only by the citizens. As they had no artillery, they ſet fire to one of the gates, in order to ſtorm it as ſoon as the violence of the flames was over: but the inhabitants, inſtead of quenching the fire, fed it with much fuel, 'till they had raiſed a rampart within the gate. The beſiegers having miſſed their aim, made a mine; but the citizens found means to countermine, and ſpoil their powder. At length, finding they could do nothing by force, they turned the ſiege into a blocade, in hopes that the want of proviſion would compel the beſieged to ſurrender. But the citizens indured extreme famine for twelve days, with invincible reſolution (1).

Mean while, lord Ruſſel, who had but few troops, being too near the rebels, would have retired at a greater diſtance, for fear of being incloſed: but he found they were poſſeſſed of a bridge behind him, over which he was neceſſarily to paſs in order to be out of danger. As there was no other road, he briſkly attacked the guard, conſiſting of two thouſand men, and after a ſlight conflict became maſter of the bridge (2). This trial convincing him they were not ſo formidable as he apprehended, he reſolved to fall on them as ſoon as he had received a ſupply which he expected from Briſtol. Soon after, lord Gray joining him with ſome forces, and Spinola with a body of Landſquenets, he marched directly to the rebels. He found poſted on the ſide of a river a body of them who would have oppoſed his paſſage; but inſtantly attacking them, he cut off upwards of a thouſand, and then purſued his march to Exeter. At his approach, the rebels raiſed the blocade, and divided themſelves into ſmall parties, which one after another were eaſily diſperſed. Arundel their leader, the mayor of Bodmyn (3), and ſome others, were hanged ſoon after. Thus ended the inſurrection in Devonſhire (4).

Ket's rebellion in Norfolk. Nevil de Fur. Norf. Hollingſh. Burnet. Edw. Jour.

The riſing in Norfolk was no leſs dangerous. One Ket, a tanner, headed the rebels, who quickly became twenty thouſand ſtrong. The marquis of Northampton was ſent againſt them with eleven hundred men only (5), a number too ſmall to terrify ſuch multitudes: wherefore he had orders to keep at ſome diſtance, and only indeavor to intercept their proviſions. Ket, on his march for Norwich, was advanced as far as a certain mountain * very near the ſaid city, where he erected a ſort of tribunal to adminiſter juſtice as a Sovereign, under an old oak, thence ſtiled, The Oak of Reformation. This was becauſe theſe talked only of reforming the ſtate, religion being neither the cauſe nor pretenſe of their riſing. Their deſign was to deſtroy the gentry, and ſtation about the King ſome of their own body, as his governors and directors.

The marquis of Northampton, neglecting to obſerve his orders, marched on to Norwich, and even entered the city: but, as the rebels had correſpondents there, he was attacked the next day, and glad to eſcape, leaving dead on the ſpot a hundred of his men, with thirty priſoners. This repulſe obliged the court to ſend thither thoſe forces deſigned againſt Scotland, under command of the earl of Warwick; which army conſiſted of ſix thouſand foot and fifteen hundred horſe. With this conſiderable body the earl of Warwick entered Norwich, where he waited for a favorable opportunity to attack the rebels. As they had themſelves waſted the circumjacent country, and the earl never failed to cut off their convoys of proviſions, they were finally obliged to decamp. Warwick followed cloſe at their heels, and without allowing them time to put themſelves in order, fell upon them, killed two thouſand, and took many priſoners, among whom was their captain Ket, who on a gibbet at Norwich expiated his diſloyalty.

The protector's conduct during theſe commotions. Burnet.

During theſe troubles, the protector by his whole procedure ſhewed a manifeſt unwillingneſs to come to extremities with the rebels; whether he was perſuaded the people had reaſon to complain, or was deſirous of ingratiating himſelf with the commonalty, ſince he was hated by the nobility: nay, when all was quiet, he moved in council, that a general amneſty might be proclaimed for reſtoring the kingdom's tranquillity. But this was ſtrongly oppoſed. Many of the council were for laying hold on this occaſion to curb the inſolence of the populace: but the protector, being of a different ſentiment, did, by his ſole authority, iſſue a general pardon for whatever had been tranſacted before the twenty-firſt of Auguſt, and excepted only a few of the rebels in priſon. He had, by virtue of his patent, power to act thus; but it inflamed the hatred of the nobles, and alſo drew on him the reſentment of a good part of the counſellors, who could not but be diſguſted at finding themſelves conſulted only for form, and that their opinions were of no weight.

The King of France enters the Boulonnois. Mezerai. Burnet. Strype.

While the court was imployed in queling thoſe inſurrections, freſh troubles unexpectedly aroſe from another quarter. Henry II, finding it a promiſing juncture, entered the territory of Boulogne at the head of an army, tho' there had not been any declaration of war between the two crowns ſince the laſt formal pacification. No treaty was ever more expreſs than that, wherein Francis I and Henry VIII agreed, that Boulogne ſhould be reſtored to France in eight years, on payment of two millions of gold crowns to the King of England. But Henry II was no ſooner ſeated on the Gallic throne, than he formed the deſign of recovering Boulogne before the time appointed, and without paying the ſum ſtipulated. His pretext was, that Henry VIII had unjuſtly made war upon Francis I, when Francis was imployed againſt Charles the Emperor. Thence he infered, that he might himſelf improve a favorable opportunity to repair the loſs ſuſtained by the King his father. It is not neceſſary to examine here Henry's grounds, I mean, the pretended injuſtice done to his predeceſſor: it ſuffices to obſerve that, according to this maxim, the moſt ſolemn treaties are to go for nothing: nevertheleſs, this maxim is but too much in vogue, and, as if it were a truth not to be conteſted, proves a moſt inexhauſtible ſourſe of wars among Sovereigns.

His troops repulſed at Bullenberg. Thuanus. A ſea-fight. Edw. Jour. Stow.

However this be, Henry ſeeing that the commotions in England preſented him with a fair opportunity to execute his deſigns upon Boulogne, took ſeveral caſtles in the Boulonnois. Then, he ordered the fort of Bullenberg to be attacked, where his forces met with a vigorous repulſe. At the ſame time happened a naval ingagement between the French and Engliſh near Jerſey, each claiming the victory (1), as is often the caſe in ſuch incounters. At length, Henry beſieged Boulogne in September, and the Engliſh, believing they could not keep Bullenberg, carried away their cannon, and blew up the fortifications. The plague, which raged in the French camp, obliging Henry to retire, he left the management of the ſiege to Gaſpar de Coligni, baron de Chatillon, who, after ſome fruitleſs attempts, was finally obliged to turn it into a blocade.

War with Scotland. Buchanan. Burnet.

The war with Scotland was not ſucceſsful to the Engliſh during this campain. De Thermes, who had ſucceeded Deſſé, took Broughty caſtle. On the other hand, the protector, finding himſelf obliged to imploy the forces deſigned for Scotland againſt the rebels of Norfolk, and not even daring to ſend that army far from the center of the kingdom, he finally determined on demoliſhing Hadington; which was done the fifteenth of September.

The protector thinks of reſtoring Boulogne. Burnet. His reaſons.

Mean while, the war commenced by the King of France gave the protector great uneaſineſs. He had certain advice that Henry II was entered into a treaty with the German Proteſtants, and had promiſed them a powerful ſuccor, as ſoon as he had recovered Boulogne. Hence it was eaſy to comprehend, that he would make a ſtrong effort the inſuing campain, and that England, in order to oppoſe him, would be obliged to make a conſiderable armament. But the King's exchequer was very low, and there was danger of raiſing new commotions in demanding freſh ſubſidies of the parliament. On the other hand, as the protector was fervently zealous for the reformation, he plainly ſaw nothing could be more to its advantage than the union of France with the German Proteſtants: but he was ſorry it was to coſt the Engliſh Boulogne. The protector alſo conſidered, if the war with France ſhould be of any long continuance, there was ſome reaſon to apprehend the Romiſh party would excite diſturbances in the realm. In that caſe, he foreſaw how difficult it would be to maintain three wars at once. Laſtly, there was another reaſon which concerned him in particular, and made him deſirous of a peace with France, namely, the war might give his enemies too great advantage, on account of the ſiniſter events it might produce, whereas a peace inabled him to parry their blows. He was not ignorant there was a ſtrong faction already formed againſt him, as well by reaſon of the envy at his greatneſs, and of his diſobliging the nobility and gentry in the affair of incloſures, as on account of his having groſly injured many of the counſellors, in depriving them of the dignity of regents, and reducing them to the bare ſtate of privy-counſellors. Among theſe, the chief were, the earl of Southampton (who had reſumed his place in the council) and the earl of Warwick. This latter was exceſſively ambitious; he both envied and very little regarded the protector. As of all the peers who had moſt acceſs to the court, he deemed himſelf the only perſon fit to ſucceed him in the adminiſtration of the government, he reckoned, if he could but ruin him, he ſhould infallibly profit by his diſgrace. On this account, he had formed even in the council a ſtrong party, of which the protector had ſome knowledge, but which he ſaw himſelf unable at once to ruin.

Edw. VI. An' 1549.

Burnet.

All theſe conſiderations induced the protector to determine on propoſing to the council the reſtitution of Boulogne to France. He ſeconded his motion with all the reaſons he thought moſt plauſible, adding that, by concluding a peace with France, England would at the ſame time be freed from a burdenſome, and withal a fruitleſs war with Scotland, ſince it was not poſſible to obtain the end propoſed in begining it. This propoſal was by the council received with tokens of indignation, and conſidered as a real cowardice. It was a point of too great nicety for the protector to determine it by his own authority: and therefore, tho' he manifeſtly ſaw the faction againſt him would carry it, he was willing his propoſal ſhould be debated in form. The reſult of this debate was, that Boulogne ſhould not be reſtored, but that the Emperor's alliance ſhould be indeavored, for the ſecurity of that place. Paget was appointed for the embaſſy, becauſe, being devoted to the protector, the ill ſucceſs which was expected from this negociation was deſigned to be thrown upon him, in order to blacken the protector himſelf.

The duke of Somerſet's adverſaries being bent on executing the conſpiracy they had formed againſt him, began with ſpreading reports to deſtroy his reputation. It was ſaid, he was crueler than any wild beaſt, ſince he ſcrupled not ſacrificing his own brother to his boundleſs ambition: that he was the cauſe of the inſurrections this ſummer, by countenancing the commonalty, and giving it as his opinion that they were unjuſtly oppreſſed: that he afterwards favored the male-contents, to the utmoſt of his power, during their actual rebellion; and, when their fury was ſomewhat curbed, granted them a general pardon, contrary to the council's opinion: that, to ſupport himſelf in the poſt he had uſurped, he entertained foreign troops, having extorted the council's concurrence: that he was raiſing a much larger and more ſtately palace than the King's, and had demoliſhed diverſe churches for the materials, and alienated church-lands to ſupply the expenſe (2): that he had the raſhneſs and preſumption to ſtile himſelf "by the grace of God, Duke of Somerſet," as if he was a ſovereign Prince: that he had appropriated to his own uſe the monies raiſed by the ſale of chantry lands: that he had broke thro' the eſtabliſhment ſetled by the late King, by ſeizing the regency alone, and excluding the other executors, who had no leſs right than himſelf: that he had ill-provided the forts of the Boulonnois, that their loſs might render a peace with France abſo-lutely neceſſary: that he had demoliſhed Hadington in Scotland for the like reaſon: that he had moſt preſumptuouſly aſſumed the government of the kingdom, and procured the King's letters patent to countenance his ambition: that beſide, he uſed his power tyrannically, rejecting the council's opinions, and acting on many occaſions by his own authority. To conclude, Paget being returned from his embaſſy, without ſucceeding in the negociation, it was rumored, that he had the protector's orders to repreſent the impoſſibility of ingaging the Emperor in the defenſe of Boulogne, that it might give a color to the baſe project of ſurrendering that place.

He uſes precautions which ſerve his enemies for a pretext. Burnet.

As it was impoſſible all theſe reports ſhould be publiſhed and the duke not hear of them, and gueſs the authors, the whole month of September paſſed in diſputes and feuds, the adverſe faction ſeeking only ſome occaſion of quarrel to execute what they had reſolved. Mean while, the protector, ſeeing his enemies acting in a manner openly, apprehended their having formed a ſcheme to carry off the King, and to that end had corrupted thoſe about him. For this reaſon, to ſecure himſelf againſt ſuch a deſign, he placed his own ſervants about the King (1), with injunctions to watch narrowly what occurred. This proceeding furniſhed his adverſaries with the pretenſe they were ſeeking.

The preſident and ſeveral counſellors meet and make reſolves againſt the protector. Edw. Jour. Hollingſh. Burnet. Vol.II.p.135. Hayward.

On the ſixth of October lord St. John, preſident of the council, the earls of Southampton, Warwick, and Arundel, ſir Edward North, ſir Richard Southwel, ſir Edmund Peckham, ſir Edward Wotton, and doctor Wotton, met at Ely houſe in Holbourn (2), and ſat as the King's council. Secretary Petre being ſent to them, in the King's name, to aſk the reaſon of their meeting, they conſtrained him to ſtay with them. Being thus met, they conſidered the ſtate of the kingdom, and loaded the protector with the blame of all the pretended diſorders, and recent loſſes in France, urging, that none of this would have happened had he followed the council's advice. Then they declared, they had that very day intended to confer with him, but underſtanding his having armed his ſervants, and many others whom he had placed about the King, judged it not prudent to expoſe themſelves to his violences. This done, they ſent for the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, with the lieutenant of the Tower, and expreſly charged them not to acknowledge the duke of Somerſet for protector. The lieutenant of the Tower promiſed to obey: the mayor and aldermen anſwered more cautiouſly; but, moſt undoubtedly, the majority of them were already gained, as it evidently appeared two days after.

The protector removes the King to Windſor. Hollingſh. Ed. Jour.

On Somerſet's firſt notice of what the counſellors were about, he removed the King to Windſor, and armed ſuch as he could aſſemble there or at Hampton-Court. This furniſhed his enemies with a freſh occaſion to complain, that he had carried the King to a place deſtitute of proviſions fit for him; ſo they took care to ſend him what he might want from London. The ſame day, being the morrow after their meeting, they were joined by ſeven others of the counſellors, namely, the lord chancellor Rich, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Shrewſbury, ſir Thomas Cheney, ſir John Gage, ſir Ralph Sadler, and the lord chief juſtice Montague.

The counſellors of London complain of it. They are joined by ſeven more.

They write to the King. Edw. Jour. Burnet. Vol.II.p.137. and Collect. p. 183.

Whereupon they wrote to the King a letter full of expreſſions of their duty, complaining of the duke of Somerſet's not liſtening to their counſels, and of his gathering a force about his perſon, to make him believe they had ill deſigns againſt him, tho' they had nothing in view but his proſperity and welfare. They wrote alſo to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and to Paget, injoining them to ſee that the King's own ſervants, and not thoſe of the duke of Somerſet's, ſhould attend on his royal perſon.

They win the common-council of London to their ſide. Stow. Hollingſh. Burnet.

On the eighth of October, they went in a body to Guild-Hall, where the common-council was aſſembled. They declared, they were ſo far from having any ill deſigns againſt the King (3), that their ſole aim was to deliver him from the power of Somerſet, who regarded only his own particular intereſt. Whereupon the common-council readily declared, they would ſupport them to the utmoſt of their power.

The protector loſes courage. Burnet.

The duke no ſooner heard that the city of London, and the lieutenant of the Tower had forſaken him, but he was utterly diſpirited. He called together the few counſellors then about the King, and proteſting, he had no deſign againſt any of the council, offered to ſubmit to the judgment of two of thoſe there preſent, and two of thoſe at London. This offer occaſioned him to loſe five other counſellors, who, ſeeing him thus condeſcending, judged it not prudent to expoſe themſelves for the ſake of a perſon whom they believed already ruined. So, notwithſtanding they approved not the proceedings of thoſe at London, they joined them on the morrow, being the ninth of October. Theſe five were, lord Ruſſel, lord Wentworth, ſir Anthony Brown, ſir Anthony Wingfield, and ſir John Baker, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

Five counſellors forſake him.

He is declared by the council unworthy to be protector. Burnet.

From that day, the duke of Somerſet's affairs hourly declined, every one abandoning him when he himſelf ſo viſibly deſpaired of maintaining his ground: nay, on information given in to the privy-counſellors his enemies, that he had ſaid, if they had any deſigns againſt his life, the King ſhould die firſt, and boaſted, it was in his power to carry the King out of the kingdom, they declared him unworthy of the protectorſhip, tho' they had no proofs of his ſpeaking theſe words. After that, they publiſhed a manifeſto, to inform the public of the reaſons of their conduct. Then, they wrote to the King, that his royal father having appointed them executors of his will, and regents of the kingdom, they had choſen the duke of Somerſet to exerciſe the office of protector, with the expreſs condition, that he ſhould do nothing without their advice; which condition he had not obſerved, but had made himſelf abſolute maſter of the government: wherefore they judged him unworthy of that honor, and prayed his Majeſty's leave, to diſcharge the office commited to them by the late King, and that the forces gathered about his perſon by the duke of Somerſet might be diſmiſſed.

Of all the privy-counſellors, only the archbiſhop of Canterbury and Paget continued with the King; and they, ſeeing the impoſſibility of withſtanding the oppoſite party, adviſed his Majeſty and the duke to gratify the council in their requeſt. The King conſenting, the counſellors at London had notice of it by a meſſenger. As they had foreſeen that Somerſet would be obliged to ſubmit, they had already ſent deputies to Windſor, with a charge to take care the ſaid duke ſhould not withdraw, and that ſome of his confidents ſhould be put under arreſt. On the twelfth of October, the counſellors, Somerſet's enemies, came in a body to the King, who received them graciouſly, and aſſured them, he took all they had done in good part. Next day they proceeded to the examination of the duke's friends, who were ſent to the Tower, except Cecil, who had his liberty. On the fourteenth, they called the duke of Somerſet before them, and cauſed to be read to him his accuſation, conſiſting of many articles, whereof theſe are the principal, viz.

I. That he had not obſerved the condition on which he had been made protector.

II. That he had treated with embaſſadors without notifying it to the council, and by his own authority had diſpoſed of governments and biſhopricks.

III. That he had held a court of Requeſts in his own houſe.

IV. That he had imbaſed the coin.

V. That he had iſſued proclamations in the affair of incloſures, againſt the mind of the whole council.

VI. That he had not taken care to ſuppreſs the late inſurrections, but had even ſupported and incouraged them.

VII. That he had occaſioned the loſs of the forts in the Boulonnois, by neglecting to furniſh them with proviſions and ammunition.

VIII. That he had indeavored to inſtil into the King a bad opinion of his counſellors, by perſuading him they intended to deſtroy him, and had even ordered ſome perſons to put the King continually in mind thereof, leſt he ſhould forget it.

IX. That he had cauſed the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors.

X. That he had, maliciouſly, not only put the King in great fear, by carrying him ſo ſuddenly to Windſor, but caſt him into a dangerous diſeaſe.

XI. That he had armed his friends and dependants, and left the King's ſervants unarmed; and that he intended to flee to Jerſey or Guernſey.

He is commited to the Tower. Burnet.

On theſe accuſations, to which it was then not a time to reply by way of defenſe, he was ſent to the Tower; they whoſe depreſſion he had ſo ſtrenuouſly labored being become his proper judges. He could not indeed deny the truth of moſt of the facts wherewith he was charged: but the queſtion was, whether they were really criminal; for he was accuſed neither of fraud, nor rapine, nor extortion: but that was to be decided only by the peers of the realm, or by parliament. No ſooner was Somerſet in the Tower, but it was ordained that ſix nobles ſhould be appointed governors of the King's perſon, by two of whom, in their courſe, his Majeſty was to be conſtantly attended (1). Then it manifeſtly appeared that the earl of Warwick had been the chief promoter of the protector's ruin, ſince all the other counſellors ſuffered him, without oppoſition, to aſſume the chief adminiſtration of public affairs, tho' without any title which might give him a peculiar authority.

The council appoint ſix governors of the King. Edw. Journ.

The earl of Warwick aſſumes the chief authority.

The enemies of the reformation triumphed at the protector's fall. They were perſuaded, the earl of Warwick was, in his heart, more Catholic than Proteſtant, and his ſtrict union with the earl of Southampton confirmed this belief. Accordingly Bonner and Gardiner, then in the Tower, did thence in a letter moſt heartily congratulate him on his having delivered England from the tyrant. It was even thought, for ſome time, that the duke of Norfolk was on the point of being releaſed: but the earl of Warwick was not yet fully known. That nobleman, who was wholly ſwayed by ambition, was properly of neither religion. He was therefore far from undertaking to deſtroy the reformation, which had too many partiſans in the kingdom: on the contrary, knowing how zealous the young King was for its eſtabliſhment, he openly declared in its favor. Thus had the zealots for Pope and Popery but a ſhort rejoicing for this recent revolution at court.

The Romiſh party are no gainers by this revolution. Burnet.

Bonner, biſhop of London, had been deprived and impriſoned ſome time before this turn. His heart was well known to be ſtrongly addicted to the Romiſh creed, and to pay only external compliance to what was eſtabliſhed by public authority, while by his equivocal behavior he manifeſted a diſlike of theſe innovations: wherefore thoſe who then governed reſolved on puting him to a proof which could not fail either of giving advantage againſt him, or making him forfeit the eſteem and confidence of his party. He was ſummoned before the council, and after a declaration of the cauſes of complaint againſt him, he was ordered to preach on a Sunday at St. Paul's croſs, and to prove in his ſermon certain points, whereof one of the principal was, that "the authority of the King was the ſame "when in his minority, as when of full age." He preached the firſt of September before a numerous audience, and touched on all the points injoined him, except the laſt: nor failed he introducing certain matters offenſive to the court. The King thereupon appointed judges to proceed againſt him (2). Burnet ſays, he behaved before them more like a lunatic than a biſhop. However, he was deprived and ſent to the Tower. It was doubtleſs with joy a pretenſe was found to be rid of ſuch a prelate, who imbaraſſed the Reformers.

The earl of Southampton was no leſs deceived in his expectations than the reſt of his faction. He imagined, that having been a main inſtrument of Somerſet's ruin, he ſhould for his ſervice be rewarded with the office of high-treaſurer, or be at leaſt reſtored to the chancellorſhip: but he found himſelf greatly deceived. Rich ſtill held the great ſeal, and the treaſurer-ſhip was confered on lord St. John, who, ſome time after, was alſo created earl of Wiltſhire. It was not Warwick's intereſt, to advance to any high ſtation ſo intriguing a perſon as the earl of Southampton, who was beſide looked on as head of the party againſt the reformation. He would thereby have quite forfeited young Edward's favor, whom it was his buſineſs to perſuade, that religion was not any way concerned in what had paſſed with regard to the duke his uncle: ſo, without a moment's heſitation, he abandoned not only the earl of Southampton, but alſo the whole Popiſh faction, who had flattered themſelves with ſeeing ſome notable change in religion. Such was Southampton's indignation to be thus ſlighted, that he could not forbear cabaling againſt the earl of Warwick; but finding Warwick had intelligence of his practiſes, and being conſcious of his revengeful diſpoſition, he relinquiſhed his projects. Not long after, he withdrew from court without taking leave, and reſided at one of his manors, where he died thro' mere grief and vexation: ſome even aſſert that he poiſoned himſelf.

Mean while, the war with France gave the council no ſmall uneaſineſs. It was very evident that Henry II was reſolved to beſige Boulogne, and it was juſtly feared that place was not tenable. When the duke of Somerſet was alone burdened with that incumbrance, his enemies would have it cowardice to reſign Boulogne to avoid a war wherein they hoped to find occaſion of working his deſtruction: but when they had the reins in their own hands, they found in that affair obſtacles which they would not acknowledge while they thought the event would be laid to his charge, They determined therefore on ſending Charles V a ſecond embaſſy, to perſuade him to take Boulogne under his protection, imagining Paget had magnified the difficulties. But the embaſſadors found his Imperial Majeſty extremely cold, and conſtantly alledging his alliance with France. He even told them, that ſo long as religion continued in England on its preſent footing, the Engliſh ought not from him to expect much aſſiſtance. The parliament meets. Burnet.

The parliament met the fourth of November, without any alteration in matters of religion being occaſioned by the duke of Somerſet's diſgrace. It was ſtill the ſame parliament that duke had called, and the council had ſtill the ſame maxims with reſpect to the reformation; the earl of Warwick's policy not permiting him therein to countenance any innovations. The parliament began with a ſevere act againſt unlawful aſſemblies, in order to prevent any more inſurrections: but by another act, the ſtatute againſt vagrants, as too rigid, and repugnant to the nation's liberties, was repealed, and a ſtatute, on that ſubject, inacted under the late reign revived.

An' 1550. Act of attainder againſt the duke of Somerſet. Burnet.

He throws himſelf upon the King's mercy. Stow. p. 603.

He is fined. Edw. Jour.

Burnet.

The ſecond of January 1550, a bill of attainder againſt the duke of Somerſet, with a confeſſion ſigned by his own hand, was read in the upper houſe: but as ſome of the peers ſuſpected this confeſſion to be extorted, four temporal and as many ſpiritual lords were ſent to know the truth from his own mouth. Next day, they made their report, that the duke thanked the houſe for their kindneſs, and owned he had freely ſubſcribed the paper, after having confeſſed its contents before the King and council: he however proteſted, he had no ill intention againſt either King or ſtate. Hereupon, by act of parliament, he was fined in two thouſand pounds ſterling per annum of land, with the forfeiture to the King of all his moveables, and deprivation of all his imploys. Many thought his confeſſion very ſtrange, and loudly cenſured ſo abject a procedure: but it was doubtleſs becauſe they wiſhed he had taken another courſe, which would not have failed proving fatal to him. It is certain, among the articles of his accuſation, there were ſeveral which could be juſtified only by the intention, which would have been little ſerviceable to him in the houſe of peers, moſt of whom were not much diſpoſed to favor him. For inſtance, to mention only the chief article: could he deny that, contrary to the condition whereon he was made protector, he had as it were degraded the other regents, and reduced them to bare counſellors? It is true, he might have alledged the King's patent: but it was the patent of a minor King, not eleven years of age, who, looking on him as his governor, acted only by his advice, as it was ſaid in the very patent which confered on him his authority: wherefore, the duke could never have cleared himſelf on this article, nor on ſeveral others: conſequently, his ſole remedy was to own himſelf guilty of all, and caſt himſelf on the King's mercy. Beſide, it concerned him highly to get out of priſon on any terms, ſince it was very dangerous for him to remain any longer in the hands of his enemies. Herein he was really ſucceſful enough. They who wiſhed his deſtruction, ſeeing the King had been very hardly prevailed with to conſent to his trial, thought it was not yet time to puſh their hatred any farther, 'till they had ruined him in the King's favor. He was therefore releaſed from the Tower, the ſixth of February, giving bond of ten thouſand pounds for his good behavior, and ten days after obtained his pardon. Thus his fall was not ſo complete as had been hoped by his adverſaries. He forfeited however much of the eſteem he had acquired among the people, who not penetrating the reaſons of his conduct, could not help thinking him guilty, ſince he had ſo confeſſed: but the King judged otherwiſe, ſince, on the ſixth of April following, he reſtored him to a ſeat in his council (1).

Mean while, the parliament knowing the friends of the Romiſh church drew from the duke of Somerſet's diſgrace conſequences which might create pernicious effects, judged requiſite to fruſtrate their expectations. To that end was made in parliament a ſtatute confirming the new liturgy, and ordering all miſſals, breviaries, &c. to be delivered to ſuch as ſhould be appointed to receive them, and prayers to ſaints to be eraſed in all the primers ſet out by the late King. Moreover, ſuch as were poſſeſſed of any images taken from churches, were required to burn or deface them before the laſt of June. Then the parliament was prorogued on the firſt of February, after granting the King a ſubſidy, which was followed by a general pardon, in which the Tower priſoners were excepted. It was during this ſeſſion that the eldeſt ſons of peers were firſt permited to ſit in the houſe of commons (2).

The parliament confirm the new liturgy, and order images to be deſtroyed.

On the late revolution at court occaſioned by Somerſet's downfal, the earl of Warwick was not forgetful of himſelf. The twenty-eighth of October, he was made great maſter of the King's houſhold, a new title introduced by Henry VIII, inſtead of that of ſteward of the houſhold, when he confered this office on the duke of Suffolk. But it was not ſo much by his poſts that the earl of Warwick was grown powerful and conſiderable, as on account of his directing the council, who acted only by his advice. Some of the counſellors looked on him as their friend, others as head of their party, and ſome dreaded offending him. What he had lately done, with regard to the duke of Somerſet, demonſtrated how dangerous it was to have him for enemy.

The earl of Warwick made high admiral and great maſter. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 194, 208. He directs all affairs.

Nothwithſtanding all his greatneſs, the earl of Warwick was not a little imbaraſſed concerning the affair of Boulogne. He had himſelf much exclaimed againſt the duke of Somerſet, for propoſing to reſign that place, and ridiculed all his reaſons; and yet, for theſe very reaſons, he finally determined on doing what in another he had ſo clamorouſly condemned. But not to appear directly inconſiſtent with himſelf, he choſe to cauſe the reſtitution of Boulogne to be moved and reſolved in council, and to feign himſelf no otherwiſe concerned than in barely conforming to the ſentiments of a majority. It is no very great difficulty for one who directs any aſſembly, to procure what reſolutions he pleaſes, without acting openly: but here the difficulty conſiſted in the diſhonor of making the firſt ſtep, and the danger of expreſſing any ſort of willingneſs to ſtrike up a peace with France. The earl of Warwick ſoon found a good expedient to avoid this inconvenience, by imploying a certain Italian trader, named Guidotti, whoſe abode was at Southampton. This merchant, going to Paris on ſome pretenſe, inſinuated himſelf into the family of the conſtable, who was the King's chief favorite. In his converſation with ſome of that miniſter's officers, he ſaid, he verily believed the court of England might be eaſily brought to reſtore Boulogne for a ſum of money. The conſtable, to whom this was related, readily comprehended the meaning. He perſonally diſcourſed Guidotti, and charged him to intimate to ſome one of the Engliſh conncil, that the King of France had rather terminate the Boulogne affair by a treaty than by arms. Whereupon Guidotti took diverſe trips between London and Paris. He finally ſet the matter in ſo fair a way, that the two courts, being equally deſirous of ending it, agreed to ſend plenipotentiaries to ſome place in Picardy, to treat of a peace and the reſtitution of Boulogne (1).

The inſtructions of theſe latter manifeſtly evidenced that the council would have peace at any rate. The ſubſtance was:

II. They might offer the reſtitution of Boulogne.

III. But then they were to demand, that the young Queen of Scots ſhould be ſent home, to accompliſh her nuptials with the King of England.

VI. That, as for Scotland, they ſhould affirm England could not treat without the Emperor's concurrence. But if his Imperial Majeſty would thereto agree, the King of England would reſtore all the places he held in Scotland, except Aymouth and Roxburgh.

Conference about the peace Burnet. Strype's Mem. Vol. II. Repoſ. p. 114.

The plenipotentiaries meeting near Boulogne, thoſe of France flatly declared; that it was not to be expected the King their maſter would ſend back the Scotiſh Queen, ſince he deſigned her for his ſon the Dauphin: that as for the perpetual penſion, Francis I promiſed it when conſtrained by the poſture of his affairs, but the King his ſon never intended to be tributary to England: that however, they were ready to treat about the reſtitution of Boulogne for a ſum of money: that moreover, their royal maſter's meaning was not that the Engliſh ſhould keep any one place in Scotland. This was talking magiſterially. But Henry II had dived into the Engliſh council's intentions, and was reſolved to improve the occaſion, and if poſſible to obliterate for ever that grating claim of the Kings of England to the Gallic crown, or at leaſt to the perpetual penſion promiſed by Francis I in lieu of that pretended right. Some time after, the Engliſh embaſſadors received freſh inſtructions, impowering them to conclude a peace on terms leſs difficult to be obtained than thoſe firſt demanded. However, as the court of England would not abſolutely deſiſt from the penſion, means were deviſed to ſatisfy that court, viz. that all claims and pretenſions of the two Kings were to remain as before, except ſuch as ſhould be adjuſted by this treaty, which was at length ſigned the twenty-fourth of March, and was to the following purport:

Burnet, Vol. II. Collect. p. 201.

Edw. VI. An' 1550.

Treaty between the two crowns. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 211.

I. That the city of Boulogne ſhould be reſtored to France, with all the ordnance and ammunition found there by Henry VIII, when he took the place.

II. That, in conſideration of Henry's improvements and charges in tranſporting proviſions and ammunition, the King of France ſhould pay King Edward the ſum of four hundred thouſand gold crowns (2), half on the day of reſtitution, and the remaining moiety before the fifteenth of Auguſt.

It is to be obſerved upon this article, that the King of France very carefully avoided mentioning either the penſion ſtipulated in the laſt treaty of peace, or even what was due to the crown of England ſince the time of Charles VIII, which had afterwards been conſtantly augmented by ſeveral treaties.

III. That, for ſecurity of payment of the two hundred thouſand crowns in Auguſt, France ſhould give ſix hoſtages, and England the like number, for ſecurity of the reſtitution of Boulogne.

IV. As to Scotland, it was agreed, that the King of England ſhould deliver to the Scotiſh Queen the two forts of Lauder and Dunglaſs, with all the ordnance, except what was brought thither from Hadington.

V. That if theſe two forts remained in the King of England's power, he ſhould be obliged to demoliſh the fortifications of Aymouth and Roxburgh, which ſhould never be repaired by England or Scotland; but if he reſtored Lauder and Dunglaſs, he ſhould however be obliged to raze Aymouth and Roxburgh, provided the Queen of Scotland demoliſhed alſo Lauder and Dunglaſs, and that none of theſe four places ſhould be ever re-fortified.

VI. That the King of England ſhould make no new war upon Scotland, except he had freſh cauſe. —That is to ſay, Edward renounced his marriage.

VII. That the King of England's demands, claims, and pretenſions, as well upon France as Scotland, and all the King of France's and the Queen of Scotland's upon England, ſhould remain as before.

Thus all the pains Henry VIII had been at to ſecure a penſion, or rather a yearly tribute in lieu of the title he pretended to have to the crown of France, were rendered fruitleſs by this treaty, which contained in favor of England a mere indeterminate reſervation of the claim which had occaſioned ſuch vaſt effuſion of blood ſince the reign of Edward III. There remains to the Kings of England only the empty title of King of France, none of Edward VI's ſucceſſors having ever ſeriouſly thought of proſecuting their pretended right.

The earl of Warwick evades ſigning the ratification of this treaty. Hayward. Burnet.

The treaty being brought to London to be ratified, the earl of Warwick feigned ſickneſs, not to be obliged to ſign a peace againſt which he had ſo vehemently exclaimed: but this was only to impoſe on the public, ſince he had ſigned all the orders and inſtructions by virtue whereof the embaſſadors had concluded it.

The council's conduct cenſured.

The reſtitution of Boulogne opened peoples eyes with regard to the conduct of thoſe at the helm. They who had now actually ſurrendered that place for four hundred thouſand crowns, in lieu of the two millions Francis had promiſed to pay, were the ſame who ſome months before had reviled the protector for barely thinking on ſuch ſurrendry. The earl of Warwick, who had the chief direction of affairs, and whom it ſo much concerned to preſerve the peoples affection, finding them ſomewhat moved,

To that purpoſe he called to a ſtrict account thoſe who had managed the King's treaſure, or been guilty of miſdemeanors in the exerciſe of their offices. Herein he had alſo another motive; namely, to pay the King's debts, which were conſiderable. In this ſcrutiny, his chief friends, who had ſerved him as inſtruments to ruin the duke of Somerſet, were leaſt ſpared. The earl of Arundel was fined in twelve thouſand pounds payable in twelve years. Southwel was impriſoned; and the reſt compounded matters with the court as beſt they could. As few were quite clear from corrupt dealings, this inquiry proved Warwick's eſtabliſhment; each dreading he would find means to be revenged on ſuch as ſhould be defective in their ſubmiſſion (1).

Changes in the Sees. Rym. Fœds Vol. XV. p. 219, 221, 222, 237, 240. Edw. Jour.

This year occurred diverſe changes in the biſhopricks. The See of Weſtminſter, vacant by the reſignation of Thirleby, was united to that of London, and given to Ridley biſhop of Rocheſter. Thirleby had the See of Norwich; Poinet that of Rocheſter; and, on the third of July, John Hooper was made biſhop of Gloceſter.

This year, Polydore Virgil, born in Italy, who had been now forty years in England, was licenſed to depart, in order to paſs the reſidue of his days in his native country. King Edward granted him the injoyment of his benefices (2), in conſideration of his having imployed the beſt part of his life in writing the hiſtory of England (3).

Before we enter on a new year, it will not be improper to make ſome mention of this year's tranſactions in foreign countries.

Death of Paul III. Spond.

Paul III dying the thirteenth of November 1549, the cardinals, who entered the conclave the twenty-ninth of the ſame month, agreed in few days to raiſe cardinal Pole to the Papal throne, and even went in the night to his chamber to pay him the accuſtomary adoration: but he requeſted them to defer that ceremony 'till morning, telling them, it ought not to be a work of darkneſs. This ſcruple, unheard of 'till then, ſeemed to them ſo extraordinary, that ſome imputed it to downright ſtupidity. Others apprehended, if Pole was Pope, he would reform the Roman court, and the college of cardinals in particular. However this be, from that moment they meditated electing another Pontif. Being then divided into three factions, they could not agree on the perſon 'till February, when they choſe cardinal de Monte, who aſſumed the name of Julius III (4).

Affairs of Germany. Sleidan. Burnet.

In Germany, Charles V having, near the cloſe of July, opened the Imperial diet, would have obliged all Proteſtants to ſubmit to the determinations of the council, now removed back to Trent. Maurice, elector of Saxony, ſtrongly oppoſed it, but with ſuch caution and regard for the Emperor, that he loſt not his favor. On the contrary, that Monarch conſented, that the diet ſhould declare him general of the Imperial army, to terminate the war by the ſiege of Magdeburg, the only Proteſtant town which ſtill held out. Maurice had formed grand ſchemes, which the Emperor knew not 'till it was too late to prevent execution.

Scotland, ſince the late pacification, injoyed great tranquillity. James Hamilton, earl of Arran in Scotland, and duke of Chateleraut in France, ſtill governed that realm in quality of regent: but he was himſelf governed by the archbiſhop of St. Andrews, his natural brother, a man of a moſt debauched and infamous life. Let us examine what paſſed in England during the year 1551.

Affairs of Scotland. Burnet.

An' 1551.

After concluſion of the peace with France and Scotland, the grand affair in England was that of the reformation, which the young King wiſhed to bring to as high a degree of perfection as poſſible. He was kept in this diſpoſition by Cranmer, and the other Reformers. The earl of Warwick appeared alſo very forward to complete this work, becauſe he thereby the farther inſinuated himſelf into his young maſter's favor. The conſtant maxim of the Romiſh party, was with their utmoſt might to oppoſe all purpoſed innovations before they were eſtabliſhed by law: but they complied with them, at leaſt externally, when there was no remedy, 'till a favorable opportunity ſhould offer to throw off the maſk. It was not poſſible to be rid of theſe hypocrites at once, becauſe they gave no advantage by their outward deportment: but care was taken to have them narrowly watched, that their falſe ſteps might be improved. By this means Bonner was laſt year laid aſide, and by the ſame method Gardiner was this year deprived, on the eighteenth of April (5).

A confeſſion of faith prepared. Burnet.

During the reſidue of this year, choſen commiſſioners were preparing a confeſſion of faith, which was the ultimate mortal wound given to the old religion: ſome places of the new liturgy were alſo corrected. But Princeſs Mary abſolutely refuſed ſubmiting either to theſe or the former changes. She continued to have maſs ſaid in her houſe, and thereby drew on herſelf great mortifications from the council and the King himſelf, who ſeemed reſolved to force her to a compliance. Hereat ſhe was ſo alarmed, that ſhe had formed a deſign to quit the land, by means of ſome veſſels which the regent of the Netherlands was to ſend upon the coaſt of England: but her deſign being diſcovered, execution was prevented, tho', moſt probably, that Princeſs would have occaſioned abundantly fewer miſchiefs and confuſions had ſhe been out of the kingdom. Seemingly, the ſcheme of her excluſion from the ſucceſſion was not yet formed, neither was King Edward's death thought ſo near as it was.

The earl of Warwick's ambitious project. Burnet.

This Princeſs's obſtinacy drew on her the diſpleaſure of the King her brother, who thenceforward loſt much of the eſteem and affection he had for her. In all likelihood, it was this which inſpired the earl of Warwick with the thoughts of excluding her the ſucceſſion, and of forming in favor of his own family the project hereafter mentioned. It will be however neceſſary here briefly to obſerve, that this ſcheme was, to match Princeſs Elizabeth abroad, to ſet Mary aſide, and to marry one of his ſons to Jane Grey, eldeſt daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorſet, and of Frances Brandon, who was the next in ſucceſſion, after Henry VIII's two daughters.

He anſwered, as much as the cardinals had ſeen in him to make him Pope. But it was commonly ſaid, that the ſecret of this promotion was an unnatural affection to him. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 147.

At

Edw. VI. An' 1551.

At this time, the ſweating-ſickneſs broke out in England with great violence, carrying off in twenty four hours ſuch as were ſeized with it, in ſpite of all remedies (1). If we may credit the hiſtorians, this ſickneſs was peculiar to the Engliſh nation. It affected not the foreigners who were in England, and in other countries the Engliſh only had it; for which reaſon it was termed * The Engliſh Sweat. Much the like is obſervable among the Poles, who are alone ſubject to a diſtemper they call Plica (2), unknown, as is affirmed, in all other countries. The duke of Suffolk, ſon of Charles Brandon by his ſecond wife, died of the ſweating-ſickneſs, as did alſo two days after his brother, who had ſucceeded him. So, the title of duke of Suffolk being void, the earl of Warwick reſolved to procure that honor for the marquis of Dorſet, father of Jane Grey, whom he deſigned for one of his ſons. He wanted the concurrence of that peer, to ſet the crown on his daughter's head, to whom the mother was moreover to reſign her right. It is however very difficult to conceive, that the earl of Warwick ſhould have formed this project ſo early, ſince Edward was in good health, in his fifteenth year only, and very likely to have a numerous iſſue. The earl of Warwick muſt therefore have known the King's end to have been very near: and this is what would be inſinuated by thoſe who fix his forming this deſign at the time whereof I am now ſpeaking, and before King Edward was ſeized with his laſt ſickneſs, in order to make him looked on as the author of that Prince's death. Howſoever this may have been, it is pretended, that the whole procedure of this nobleman, from the death of Jane Grey's two brothers, to the end of this reign, had relation to this project; as, for inſtance, the marriage of Princeſs Elizabeth to the King of Denmark's eldeſt ſon, which he cauſed to be privately treated, but without effect.

Deſign of marrying Princeſs Elizabeth to the Prince of Denmark. Hayward.

King Edward's own marriage with a daughter of Henry II, King of France, which was negociated and concluded this year, ſeems directly contrary to the earl of Warwick's deſigns, ſuppoſing they were already formed: wherefore Burnet ſays, en paſſant, that this negociation was merely to amuſe the young King. Hayward, who wrote the hiſtory of Edward VI, ſays alſo, that after the marriage was concluded, Edward thought himſelf in perfect ſafety, tho' indeed he was in extreme danger. But whatever the earl of Warwick's motive might be, the marquis of Northampton, the biſhop of Ely, and ſome other embaſſadors, were diſpatched with a ſplendid retinue, to carry the order of the garter to Henry II, and to propoſe a marriage between his daughter, Princeſs Elizabeth, and King Edward. Henry being then at Chateaubriant, the Engliſh embaſſadors repaired to Nantes, whence they were conducted to court. The marquis of Northampton, as chief of the embaſſy, preſented to his Gallic Majeſty the collar of the order. Then the biſhop of Ely deſired him to appoint commiſſioners to treat with them on a particular affair tending to the common good of both realms. Commiſſioners being named, the embaſſadors propoſed marrying King Edward with Princeſs Elizabeth, and the treaty was ſigned at Angers, the nineteenth of July. This Princeſs's portion was to be two hundred thouſand crowns, and her dower as great as any Queen of England had ever injoyed: but the marriage was not to be contracted by words of the preſent tenſe, 'till a month after the Princeſs was twelve years of age. This prevented its accompliſhment, ſince King Edward died before that time. Some time after, Henry II ſent into England a magnificent embaſſy, whereof, marſhal de Montmorency was chief, with the order of St. Michael to King Edward.

All foreign matters being done with, the earl of Warwick applied himſelf to domeſtic, or rather to his own affairs. He cauſed Henry Grey, marquis of Northampton, to be created duke of Suffolk, and himſelf duke of Northumberland. William Paulet, earl of Wiltſhire and lord-treaſurer, was made marquis of Wincheſter (3), and ſir William Herbert, earl of Pembroke. They who were on this occaſion dignified with new honors, were the intimate friends of the earl of Warwick, now duke of Northumberland, who ſought to eſtabliſh himſelf in the ſtation he poſſeſſed of chief manager of public affairs, tho' without any patent intitling him to ſuch authority.

The earl of Warwick created duke of Northumberland. Other creations. October 11. Edw. Jour. Hayward. Burnet.

Nevertheleſs, this peer could not injoy a perfect tranquillity, while he had ſtill in his ſight ſuch a rival as the duke of Somerſet, who might be one day reſtored to favor, and who was actually attempting to regain the poſt he had formerly poſſeſſed. Edward approached the term of his majority, and daily increaſed in the knowledge of affairs. Northumberland had therefore to apprehend that, when the King ſhould compare his adminiſtration with Somerſet's, he would perceive this latter had been wrongfully deprived of his dignity: beſide, Edward ſtill expreſſed much eſteem for his ſaid uncle, and thereof gave him frequent and public tokens. All this bred great uneaſineſs in the duke of Northumberland, who evidently foreſaw, that it would be in a manner impoſſible to execute his projects while he had ſuch a vigilant and formidable inſpector as the duke of Somerſet. He determined therefore to be rid of this troubleſome rival at any rate, and to effect it uſed two different methods. The firſt was to ruin him in the King's favor, by means of certain emiſſaries who beſet him perpetually (4). The ſecond was, to procure his adverſary mortifications ſufficient to induce him to take ſuch falſe ſteps as would furniſh the deſired advantage. Both theſe methods had the wiſhed ſucceſs. The King by degrees took a diſguſt at his uncle, and was thereby diſpoſed to receive any ill impreſſions againſt him. On the other hand, the duke of Somerſet could not, without exceſſive impatience, ſee himſelf daily expoſed to affronts and inſults, by ſo much the leſs tolerable as done purpoſely to inſenſe him, and by way of provocation. Few have the prudence or moderation to avoid falling into ſuch ſnares. It is pretended, that ſeeing himſelf thus puſhed, he reſolved to kill the duke of Northumberland at a viſit he was to make him. Others ſay, he deſigned to have invited him to dinner at lord Paget's, and there he was either to aſſaſſinate or poiſon him: at leaſt the hiſtorians thus ſpeak of it, becauſe the report was ſpread both before and after his diſgrace, and even imbibed by the King; and yet, his impeachment contained not any ſuch matter, but ran only, that he intended to ſecure the duke of Northumberland's perſon. However this be, it cannot be denied, he had laid ſome ſcheme to be reſtored to his poſt, and deviſed, and alſo imparted to his confidents ſeveral expedients which were afterwards imputed to him as ſo many crimes, tho' he had not executed any. One of theſe confidents was the perſon who ruined him, being moſt apparently corrupted by his antagoniſt. This man, Palmer by name *, having been ſecretly brought to the King, told him all he knew, and probably ſo turned his diſcourſe as to make the King believe that bare projects or thoughts were fixed and determined purpoſes (1). However, the King being perſuaded his uncle would have aſſaſſinated the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, conſented he ſhould be proſecuted: ſo, the ſeventeenth of October, Somerſet was arreſted and commited to the Tower, with many others accuſed of being his accomplices. Next day, the ducheſs of Somerſet, with two of her women were taken up, and after that the earl of Arundel and lord Paget were likewiſe apprehended.

* Sir Thomas. Edw. Jour.

The duke ſent to the Tower. Edw. Jour. Hayward. Burnet.

No ſooner was the duke of Somerſet in the Tower, than his pretended crimes were every where publiſhed with circumſtances proper to amuſe the people. Theſe imaginary accuſations are the ground-work whereon all the hiſtorians, Burnet excepted, build their accounts of this event. What is moſt probable is, that the duke had projected to get himſelf declared protector in the next parliament, ſince the earl of Rutland affirmed it upon oath. As to the means he intended to uſe for that end, very likely he had deviſed ſeveral, but not yet fixed upon any, except that perhaps of ſecuring the duke of Northumberland's perſon. As the cuſtom of confronting witneſſes had been ſome time ſince laid aſide, we muſt be contented with knowing what was depoſed againſt him, yet without the leaſt poſſibility of receiving thence any convincing proof of truth in the facts. Every one is ſenſible, what great alterations confronting witneſſes is capable of producing in ſeemingly the moſt poſitive depoſitions.

The injuſtice of not confronting witneſſes.

Depoſitions of the witneſſes. Edw. Jour. Burnet. Hayward.

Palmer depoſed, that ſir Ralph Vane was to have headed two thouſand men to ſupport the deſigns of Somerſet, who, with a hundred horſe, was to have fallen upon the guard: that being done, the duke intended to have gone thro' the city, proclaiming, Liberty! Liberty! and in caſe he failed to raiſe the people, to have fled to the iſle of Wight. One Crane affirmed the ſame, and added, that the earl of Arundel and lord Paget were privy to the conſpiracy.

Edw. Jour. Burnet.

On theſe depoſitions, the duke was brought to trial before his peers on the firſt of December, the crimes laid againſt him being put into three articles:

Articles of accuſation. Burnet.

1. That he had deſigned to ſeize on the King's perſon, and the adminiſtration of public affairs.

2. That he, with one hundred others, intended to impriſon the duke of Northumberland.

3. And that he would have excited the city of London to rebellion.

Theſe three articles, to which the duke of Somerſet's crimes were reduced, plainly ſhew there was no proof of his having intended to kill or poiſon the three lords above-mentioned, tho' the King had been made believe ſo, and a like report ſpread among the people. Of theſe three articles, the firſt and third were high treaſon, and the ſecond, concerning the duke of Northumberland, was only felony. He poſitively denied the treaſonable articles, and for the other, which was placed the ſecond in the impeachment, he proteſted, that howſoever ſuſpiciouſly he might have talked, he never had any real deſign againſt the lives of either the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, or the earl of Pembroke.

Edw. VI. An' 1551.

We muſt acknowlege, here is a difficulty not eaſily to be reſolved. The duke of Somerſet is not charged with intending to kill thoſe noblemen, and yet he juſtifies himſelf on that head. This ſeems to intimate, ſome ſuch article to have been in the indictment: and yet, Burnet, a moſt exact hiſtorian if ever any was ſuch, and who affirms, he took the accuſation from the council's records, ſets down but three articles, wherein not the leaſt mention is made of the ſaid peers who even were of the number of his judges. On the other hand, it will immediately appear, that the duke was condemned for felony; which was ſtretching the rigor of the law as far as it could go, if he was guilty only of intending to ſeize the duke of Northumberland; whereas if he had actually reſolved the deaths of theſe three lords, there was nothing in his ſentence but what was agreeable to ſtatutes of parliament. It muſt therefore be ſaid, either the celebrated hiſtorian above mentioned has not exactly related the articles of accuſation, or the peers condemned the unfortunate duke for a crime wherewith he was not legally charged. The fidelity and exactitude doctor Burnet has profeſſed, will not admit his being taxed with ſuch a fraud. But the characters of Northumberland, and moſt of Somerſet's judges, who generally ſpeaking were his profeſſed enemies, afford but too much reaſon to ſuſpect, that the fear of offending the duke of Northumberland, or ſome other motives, prevailed over juſtice.

He is acquited of treaſon, but found guilty of felony. Edw. Jour. Burnet. Hollingſh.

After the peers had heard what was depoſed againſt the duke, and alſo his defenſes, they unanimouſly acquited him of treaſon; but found him guilty of felony. In all appearance, they proceeded upon a ſtatute made in the time of Henry VII, which declared it felony to intend to take away the life of a privy counſellor. This was ſtretching very far that ſevere law, which perhaps was never executed before, eſpecially upon a duke, peer of the realm, and uncle to the reigning King: beſide his charge did not run, that he intended to kill theſe three counſellors, but only had deſigned to ſecure the duke of Northumberland's perſon. But what is moſt unaccountable in this trial, is that theſe three peers ſat as judges. Sentence being given, he aſked pardon of the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, for his evil intentions againſt them. This aſking pardon has made ſeveral believe him guilty: but it is a queſtion, whether by theſe evil intentions we are neceſſarily to underſtand a deſign to aſſaſſinate them. When thoſe preſent at his trial found him returned not guilty of treaſon, they ſhouted for joy ſo loud, that they were heard at Charing-Croſs: but this rejoicing was ſoon converted to ſorrow, on finding him convicted of felony.

Edw. Jour. Edward perſuaded of his uncle's guilt. Burnet.

It was univerſally believed the duke would be pardoned, becauſe his execution was defered near two months. But ſuch particular care had been taken to prepoſſeſs Edward againſt him, that this young Prince, who had in abhorrence the crimes he believed him guilty of, was very far from any thoughts of granting him a pardon. It appears in his journal, that one Bartuile had affirmed upon oath, that the duke of Somerſet had hired him to kill the duke of Northumberland, and that the duke himſelf had owned it at his coming to the Tower, tho' he had denied it at firſt; but it is very ſtrange this evidence was not produced at his trial. Nothing argues his innocence in this reſpect ſo much as the indictment itſelf, which ran, not that he had intended to aſſaſſinate the duke of Northumberland, but only had deſigned to ſeize and impriſon him. Nevertheleſs it cannot be denied that the King believed him guilty of the firſt of theſe crimes, ſince we ſee, in his letter to Barnaby Fitz-Patrick his favorite, then in France, that the duke had confeſſed it after ſentence, tho' he had before ſworn the contrary (1). But the King's belief does by no means prove the fact: it much rather ſerves evidently to prove, that Somerſet's enemies had groſly abuſed the young King, who even afterwards expreſſed great ſorrow for having conſented to his uncle's execution. The duke of Somerſet was in hopes however of undeceiving his royal nephew. He had already gained the friendſhip of chancellor Rich, who thro' a miſtake in the ſuperſcription of a note he ſent the duke, diſcovered his deſign of laboring in his behalf. This occaſioned the great ſeal's being taken from him, and given to the biſhop of Ely.

Burnet. Fuller.

The chancellor is Somerſet's friend, and is deprived of his office. Hayward. Dec. 21. Edw. Jour. Burnet.

The duke of Somerſet had no ſooner received his ſentence, than great care was taken to entertain the King with pleaſing ſhews, in order to divert him from reflecting on this ſtrange condemnation. At the ſame time, all his uncle's friends were carefully kept from approaching him. Finally, on the twenty-ſecond of January, he ſigned the order for his execution. The duke appeared ſedate and undiſturbed on the ſcaffold, and made a ſpeech to the audience. He affirmed, "he had never offended the King "by word or deed. He glorified his creator for "making him his inſtrument to promote the refor- "mation, and exhorted his hearers to perſevere "therein." When he had gone ſo far, he was forced to ſtop, by reaſon of a very great noiſe among the people, which continued ſome ſpace. A certain perſon * riding towards the ſcaffold, and crying to the people to give way, made many believe he brought a pardon. On the other ſide, a band of ſoldiers who had been ordered to attend at the execution, coming too late, cauſed others to imagine they came to maſſacre them. This bred a terrible diſorder, and fatal to ſome of the ſpectators, who were crouded or ſmothered to death. When the clamor was over, he calmly went on with his ſpeech, and ſaid, "he had always been moſt dili- "gent about his Majeſty, in his affairs both at "home and abroad; and no leſs ſedulous in ſeek- "ing the common good of the whole realm." Here again he was interrupted by the people crying out, "it was moſt true." Then "he prayed for the "King, aſked forgiveneſs of all whom at any time "he had offended, forgave all his enemies without "exception, and deſired the people to bear him "witneſs that he died in the faith of Jeſus Chriſt," When he had done ſpeaking to the people, he turned to his private devotions; after which he laid his head on the block to receive the fatal blow.

The duke of Somerſet's character. Burnet.

Thus fell the duke of Somerſet, concerning whom opinions have been greatly divided. Some have repreſented him as a very wicked man, capable of perpetrating the moſt atrocious crimes; and others, as a very good Chriſtian. One may eaſily comprehend, religion alone created this diverſity. Had it not been for the prejudice religion begets in moſt men, his faults would not have been ſo agravated, which in reality, were ſome of the leaſt whereof mankind are guilty. On the other hand, without this ſame prejudice, there would not have been ſo much pains taken to color his ambition, which certainly was too much bordering on exceſs. They who have made it their buſineſs to juſtify his whole procedure, have alſo very lightly touched on the immenſe wealth amaſſed by him during his adminiſtration. Of this, Somerſet houſe, now ſtanding in London, is a moſt authentic proof. But then, his enemies have made bare accuſations, artfully ſpread among the people, and inſtilled into the King, to paſs for evidenced crimes, .tho' it manifeſtly appears, by the very articles of his indictment, that he was condemned only for intending to commit a miſdemeanor, not againſt the King or ſtate, but againſt certain particular perſons. It may therefore be affirmed, that the offenſes for which he was pardoned after his firſt condemnation, were abundantly more criminal than that for which he ſuffered death. The people, who are ſeldom miſtaken in their opinion of great men, were generally ſo perſuaded of his innocence, that many dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, conſidering him as a ſort of martyr: nay, it happened in the begining of Queen Mary's reign, that a woman ſeeing the duke of Northumberland leading to the Tower, ſhook one of theſe bloody handkerchiefs at him, ſaying, "behold, "the blood which thou didſt cauſe to be unjuſtly "ſhed, does now apparently begin to revenge itſelf "on thee."

About a month after this execution, ſir Ralph Vane, ſir Miles Partridge, ſir Michael Stanhope, and ſir Thomas Arundel, who were ſaid to be the duke of Somerſet's chief accomplices, were put to death: but they all proteſted they had never intended to form any plot, either againſt the King or any privy counſellor. Vane added, he did not doubt his blood would make the duke of Northumberland's pillow uneaſy to him. As for Palmer, Crane, and Bartuile, who had ſerved as witneſſes againſt the duke of Somerſet, they eaſily got their diſcharge: nay, it was obſerved, there was a great intimacy afterwards between Palmer and the duke of Northumberland, which gave occaſion to believe Palmer had been corrupted to betray the duke of Somerſet, who had honored him with his friendſhip.

During the year 1551, the ſtate of the Emperor's affairs was changed in Germany, when he leaſt ſuſpected it. Maurice elector of Saxony, having formed the deſign of reſtoring his country to liberty, had ſecretly negociated a league with France and the Proteſtant Princes of Germany: but before he declared himſelf openly, he was deſirous of knowing what might be expected from England. To that purpoſe, he ſent embaſſadors to Edward, to gain him to his intereſt, and procure a ſum of four hundred thouſand crowns, by telling him it was for the preſervation of the Proteſtant religion. The embaſſadors were told; that the King would moſt willingly enter into a religious league; but did not mean to be ingaged, under that pretenſe, in a war for political differences: that if the elector of Saxony would confer more particularly with the Proteſtant Princes, and then ſend the King embaſſadors with fuller inſtructions and ſufficient powers, he ſhould have a more poſitive anſwer. Hitherto Maurice had but coldly proſecuted the ſiege of Magdeburg. But when his private affairs were ſettled, he ſo ordered it, by the help of ſome friends in the town, that the inhabitants ſurrendered by capitulation. AN' 1552. Parliament. Act injoining the confronting of Witneſſes. Burnet.

The parliament met the twenty-third of January, 1552. The commons, ſenſible of the horrible grievance of that pernicious cuſtom of condemning people without confronting the witneſſes, were diſpoſed to ſtop its career. To that end, a bill was prepared, condemning under various penalties, thoſe who ſhould write or ſpeak againſt the King, with a proviſo, that none but thoſe who owned their faults ſhould be attainted as traitors, on this act, except two witneſſes come, and, to their face, did aver the fact for which they were to be tried. The lords were very unwilling to agree to this proviſo, (1) as if it leſs concerned them than the commons to be freed from oppreſſion: but at length the act paſſed as drawn in the lower houſe.

The marriage of eccleſiaſtics declared valid.

In this ſeſſion alſo ſome progreſs was made in the reformation. Among other matters, eccleſiaſtics marriages were declared good and valid, which for ſome time the people had conſidered as only tolerated.

Attempts to blacken the duke of Somerſet's memory. Burnet.

The ſeſſion of parliament being ready to cloſe, and no more than a hundred and thirty-ſeven members remaining in the lower houſe, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, to repeal the ſettlement of the duke of Somerſet's eſtate, made in favor of his children by his ſecond wife. In this bill, as its foundation, was inſerted a clauſe, that the duke of Somerſet and his accomplices were juſtly attainted: but the commons agreeing to the repeal, rejected the clauſe. This ſhews their opinion of the duke's innocence.

Another fruitleſs attempt to get the biſhop of Durham condemned. Burnet. Edw. Jour. Hayward. Strype.

In this ſame ſeſſion, the duke of Northumberland attempted to get ſentence paſſed upon Tonſtal biſhop of Durham, who had been accuſed of miſpriſion of treaſon. The lords readily paſſed the bill for attainting him, but the commons would not proceed upon it, becauſe it was intended to condemn the biſhop without confronting the witneſſes. The duke of Northumberland's aim was to have had the dignity of the Palatine of Durham, annexed to that See, confered on himſelf: we ſhall hereafter find his project attended with better ſucceſs. Mean while, having experienced how little condeſcenſion the lower houſe had for him, by reaſon this parliament had been called during the duke of Somerſet's adminiſtration, he reſolved to have another which ſhould be more at his devotion. Accordingly this, which had now ſat five years, was diſſolved on cloſing the ſeſſion. Then the council came to a reſolution to call a new parliament for the next year only, in order to have time to take the neceſſary meaſures to get elected repreſentatives who ſhould be more favorable to the court.

The parliament diſſolved. Burnet.

Alteration as to the biſhops. Burnet. Vol. II. p. 28. and III. p. 195, &c.

During this year's courſe were ſeen two conſiderable changes with regard to prelates. Firſt Heath and Day, biſhops of Worceſter and Chicheſter, were deprived, for too openly oppoſing the reformation. The ſecond change was more conſiderable. After the parliament had given the King power of nominating to the vacant Sees, his patents ran, that he appointed ſuch a one, biſhop of ſuch a See, "during his natural life." But at the time I am ſpeaking of, it was thought proper to change the words into, "ſo long as he ſhall behave himſelf well." So the biſhops made by theſe patents might be deprived of their Sees by a bare act of the King's will, without being forced to obſerve the uſual formalities in ſuch caſes.

EDW. VI. AN' 1552.

The duke of Northumberland's abſoluteneſs.

The duke of Northumberland ſtill directed the affairs of the government, tho' he had no commiſſion to diſtinguiſh him from the other privy counſellors. His proceedings againſt the duke of Somerſet inſpiring each with a dread of being expoſed to his vengeance, not a man dared openly to oppoſe him. We have ſeen that, in the late parliament, he attempted to render odious the duke of Somerſet's memory, by cauſing his ſentence to be approved by the two houſes. That project not ſucceeding, he took another method. He ordered a ſtrict inquiry to be made of all who had been inriched by the chantry-lands, given to the King during the duke of Somerſet's adminiſtration. Great numbers were found, ſome of whom were condemned in heavy fines, and others found means to purchaſe the duke of Northumberland's favor. But it was not poſſible for lord Paget to divert the ſtorm which fell upon him, the duke of Northumberland mortally hating him for having been intirely devoted to the duke of Somerſet. He was not only fined in ſix thouſand pounds, but alſo, on pretenſe that he was no gentleman (2), was degraded from the order of the garter, which he had received from Henry VIII, as if that Prince, when he gave it him, was ignorant of his pedigree. Beſide the motive of hatred and revenge by which the duke of Northumberland was furiouſly agitated, he had alſo another, which was to make way for his eldeſt ſon (3) the earl of Warwick, for whom he eaſily procured the vacant garter (4).

The company of German merchants diſſolved. Burnet. Edw. Jour. Strype.

About this time, the corporation of German merchants, whoſe abode was in the Still-yard, was diſſolved, becauſe it was become detrimental to England, by ingroſſing the whole woolen trade. It was proved that, in 1551, thoſe of the Still-yard had ſhiped off no fewer than forty-four thouſand cloths, and all the Engliſh merchants together did not export eleven hundred. The regent of Flanders and the city of Hamburgh earneſtly ſollicited to have the company reſtored, but in vain. The court alſo laid a ſcheme advantageous to the Engliſh commerce, namely, to open in England two free mart-towns, Hull and Southampton: but they had neither time nor leiſure to put in execution this project.

Cardan in England. Burnet.

This year Cardan, the famous Italian philoſopher, paſſed thro' England in his return from Scotland, where he had been to cure the archbiſhop of St. Andrews of a dropſy. His indeavors were crowned with ſucceſs, but he predicted to the archbiſhop that he ſhould be hanged. As he paſſed thro' England he waited on young King Edward, and was ſo charmed with him, that he every where ſpake of him as of a prodigy (5). It is ſaid, he caſt Affairs of Scotland. Buchanan. Burnet. Edw. Jour.

This year, the affairs of Scotland underwent some alteration. The dowager Queen had been in France on pretense of seeing her daughter, and had obtained of that court the regency of Scotland, in the earl of Arran's room. In November 1551, she returned to Scotland thro' England, where she was magnificently entertained by the King, and her charges borne to the frontiers of the two kingdoms. At her arrival in Scotland, she easily enough prevailed on the earl of Arran to resign to her the regency, according to the desire of Henry II and his ministers, the earl finding he could not keep it against their will. The archbishop of St. Andrews approved not of his brother's resigning his dignity. He cabaled against the Queen regent, who had the address to support herself by the assistance of the Reformed, promising them free exercise of their religion in their own houses. By this means, she established herself in the government, spite of all opposition from the archbishop.

Revolution in Germany. Sleidan. Burnet.

The revolution this year in the affairs of Germany was much more considerable. The elector of Saxony at length discovered his project: but not 'till after the King of France had proclaimed war against the Emperor, and constable de Montmorency taken Metz by surprise. Then Maurice assembling his forces, marched directly to Inspruck, where Charles V was, and had like to have taken him prisoner. Maurice's declaration obliged the Emperor at last to give the Protestants some satisfaction, by granting them the famous edict of Passau (1). That Monarch soon met with another mortification. He invested Metz; but, thro' the gallant resistance of the duke of Guise, who defended that place, he was constrained to withdraw. Let us return now to the affairs of England.

An' 1553. Parliament favorable to the duke of Northumberland. Strype. Vol. II. p. 394. Somerset's memory blackened.

A new parliament meeting the first of March 1553, the lower house consisted of representatives, whose majority were wholly disposed to follow the court's directions. They gave the King a very considerable subsidy, grounded on the extravagant dissipation of his treasury during the duke of Somerset's administration. This plainly evidenced the duke of Northumberland's great power and credit in the house. His said lordship procured also the bishoprick of Durham to be suppressed, having first caused Tonstal to be deprived. This See being suppressed, King Edward founded two others; one at Durham, and another at Newcastle (2). But the temporality of the bishoprick, being converted to a county palatine, was given to the duke of Northumberland. In all appearance, Tonstal was deprived, and his See suppressed, for that very purpose.

Tonstal deprived, and his See suppressed. The duke of Northumberland made count palatine Strype. Burnet.

The parliament sat but one month. It was dissolved the thirty-first of March, after the duke of Northumberland had procured a subsidy for the King, and a stain for the memory of the late duke of Somerset. The court had no farther need of a parliament, and the duke of Northumberland's interest required there should be none, when he was preparing to execute his designs.

The young King had, since January, been seized with a distemper which finally laid him in his grave (3). This prevented not his being made to sign an order for visiting the churches, and taking thence all superfluous plate and ornaments. The visitors were likewise very strictly to examine what imbezzlements had been made. All this was done under color of selling the superfluities, and giving the money to the poor, who had however the least share.

The council jealous of France's progress. Burnet. Hayward. Strype.

Mean while, Edward was still afflicted with a defluxion upon his lungs, which gradually wasted him, and daily became more dangerous. Some scruple not asserting, that a slow poison was given him, and throw the suspicion on the duke of Northumberland: others content themselves with insinuating such a matter, without saying it positively; but after all, both speak only by conjecture, without giving any proof. The young King beheld death's approach without any fears as to himself, but could not, without extreme concern, reflect on the future state of religion under his sister Mary, who was to be his successor. Very probably, the duke of Northumberland, who constantly attended him in his illness, took care to increase his apprehensions purposely to lead him more easily to the point he desired. However, all hopes of the King's recovery were not given over 'till mid-May, when seemingly the physicians told Northumberland, his case was desperate. Then it was that duke married lord Guilford Dudley, his fourth son, the only one unmarried, to Jane Grey, eldest daughter of the new duke of Suffolk, by Frances Brandon, who was in Henry VIII's will next in the succession after Princess Elizabeth. At the same time, Jane's two sisters were also married, lady Catherine, the second daughter, to lord Herbert, the earl of Pembroke's eldest son; lady Mary, the third, to Martin Keys (4). These marriages were solemnised towards the close of May, when there was no farther hope of the King's recovery. At last, one day, as the young King was expressing his great concern at the thoughts, that his sister, Princess Mary, would do her utmost to destroy the reformation, Northumberland brake the ice. He represented to the King, that there was but one way to prevent the misfortunes wherewith England was menaced, in case Princess Mary ascended the throne after him: and that was, to settle the crown on lady Jane Grey, his daughter-in-law. Indeed, it was natural for Edward, in excluding Mary, to transfer the crown to his sister Elizabeth, whom he dearly loved, and who was a hearty friend to the reformation: but, very probably, the duke told him, that, as he could exclude Mary only on the specious pretense of her being illegitimate, the same reason subsisted with regard to Elizabeth, since the marriages of their mothers were equally annulled: wherefore, either the succession was to be left as settled by the late King, or the Princeſſes were to be both excluded together. To all appearance, the young King, who found himſelf dying, and only thought of ſaving the reformation from the impending deſtruction, was prevailed with by this argument, to ſacrifice Princeſs Elizabeth: beſide, he had much eſteem and affection for Jane Grey, who was, both internally and externally, a moſt accompliſhed young lady.

The judges refuſe to draw the ſettlement. Burnet.

However this be, Edward having taken the reſolution ſuggeſted to him by the duke of Northumberland, three judges of the realm were ſent for, and required to draw his aſſignment of the crown to Jane Grey. The judges deſired a little time to conſider of it. At laſt, they anſwered, they could not preſume to do any ſuch thing, without being guilty of high treaſon: adding, that all ſuch privy counſellors as conſented to the aſſignment would be inevitably liable to the penalties expreſſed in the act of ſucceſſion. Hereat the duke of Northumberland was in ſuch a fury, that he had like to have beaten the judges; but they ſtood to what they had ſaid. On the fifteenth of June, they were again ſent for, and, by threats and the expedient of a pardon under the great ſeal, were finally prevailed on to draw the ſettlement of the crown, which was ſigned by all the judges, except Hales, who could never be perſuaded. All the privy counſellors ſet their hands to it likewiſe on the twenty-firſt of the ſame month. Cranmer was abſent that day on purpoſe to avoid ſigning; but the King ſo importuned him that he at laſt ſet his hand as a witneſs, as is pretended, and not as a privy counſellor.

The ſettlement ſigned by the whole council.

Mean while, the King's diſtemper increaſing, without poſſibility of finding any remedy, the council thought fit to diſmiſs the phyſicians, and put him into the hands of a certain woman, who undertook his cure. It was ſaid, this was done by the duke of Northumberland's advice, and that the woman ſhortened the King's days: but he was already ſo far exhauſted, that it was wholly needleſs to haſten his end. True the woman, inſtead of curing, only put him to more pain by the medicines ſhe adminiſtered; and this was ſufficient to inſpire the people with violent ſuſpicions of the duke of Northumberland, who was not beloved, and was thought capable of any atrocity. At laſt the phyſicians were again ſent for: but it ſurpaſſed their ſkill to ſtop the violence of his malady, which carried him off on the ſixth of July, after his giving ſenſible proofs of unfeigned piety. Some days before Edward's deceaſe, the duke of Northumberland got the council to write to Princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth, deſiring them to come and keep the King company in his ſickneſs. His aim was to have them in his power, that they might not obſtruct the promotion of his daughter-in-law Jane Grey. The two Princeſſes, not imagining their royal brother ſo near his end, were on the road; but hearing he was expiring, turned back, and Northumberland was diſappointed of his expectation (1).

MARY I. Twenty-ſecond Sovereign of ENGLAND ſince the CONQUEST.

MARY I. AN' 1553.

HENRY VIII's divorces from Catherine of Aragon and Ann Boleyn; the acts of parliament confirming theſe divorces: other ſubſequent ſtatutes which ſeemed to repeal what the firſt had ordained; the power given King Henry to appoint his ſucceſſors, and to range them in what order he thought fit; and finally, that Prince's laſt will it ſelf, had alſo imbroiled the ſucceſſion affair, that it appeared full of contradiction and obſcurity. It would not have been poſſible, by the ancient laws and cuſtoms of the realm, to reſolve the queries ariſing from ſo many inconſiſtent acts, becauſe the authors of theſe new laws had not in view juſtice and equity, but only the gratifying a Prince whom to have any way contradicted would have been dangerous. Henry VIII had foreſeen the difficulties and perplexities his two divorces might one day occaſion, and even ſeemed deſirous to prevent them: but he only increaſed them by the new ſtatutes he obtained of the parliament, wherein his aim was not ſo much to procure the kingdom's welfare, as to humor his caprice and make his will a law. To ſet this matter in a clear light, it will not be unneceſſary here to inſert a brief recapitulation of that Monarch's proceedings with reſpect to the ſucceſſion.

MARY I. AN' 1553.

It has been ſeen, in the hiſtory of his reign, that after eighteen years cohabitation with his firſt conſort, Catherine of Aragon, and having by her ſeveral children, of whom only a daughter was living, he was diſpoſed to a ſeparation. He pretended his marriage was void, and becauſe the court of Rome, for reaſons of ſtate, would not condeſcend to annul it, he got a ſentence of divorce pronounced by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, before he had aboliſhed the Papal authority in his kingdom. He thereby afforded a very ſpecious pretenſe to queſtion the authority of that prelate who paſſed the ſaid ſentence. What is more, he re-married before being juridically freed from his firſt matrimonials, and by this precipitation gave freſh cauſe of diſputing the validity of his ſecond nuptials. Here are already two contradictions in theſe his two firſt ſteps. He applied to the Pope, as his proper judge, and, before he had ſolemnly renounced his authority, contemns it, and in ſpite of his ſaid Beatitude, whoſe juriſdiction was yet owned in England, gets himſelf divorced from Queen Catherine. On the other hand, he acknowledges the neceſſity of a judicial ſentence to juſtify his divorce, and yet he prevents the ſentence by hurrying into a ſecond marriage before its being pronounced.

Mary I. An' 1553.

In the next place, he beheaded his ſecond wife for adultery, and yet, before execution, pretended ſhe could not be his wife, and was divorced from her on a frivolous pretenſe. Theſe two divorces were confirmed by act of parliament paſſed in 1536, wherein was alſo a manifeſt contradiction. The act declared Mary and Elizabeth, born of the two firſt marriages, illegitimate and incapable of ſucceeding to the crown, and yet it impowered the King to place them on the throne, ſince, without any limitation, it inveſted him with all the authority requiſite to ſettle the ſucceſſion as he pleaſed.

There was likewiſe another contradiction in a ſtatute of the year 1540, wherein was declared, that a marriage after conſummation ſhould not be annulled on account of a pre-contract: nevertheleſs Henry's divorce from Ann Boleyn had no other motive. Thereby the King and parliament owned they had injured Elizabeth, in declaring her illegitimate. It will perhaps be ſaid, this act was not to regard what was paſſed: but, moſt certainly, it was made only with deſign to favor Elizabeth; notwithſtanding, ſhe was not reſtored by this act, but it ſtill lay in the King's breaſt either to include her in, or exclude her from the ſucceſſion.

In another act, made in 1544, was a contradiction no leſs manifeſt. By this act, the very parliament itſelf put in the line of ſucceſſion Mary and Elizabeth, after their brother Edward. Seemed not this to be making them a moſt authentic reparation, and acknowledging them legitimate? And indeed, thitherto no baſtards had ever been on the throne of England: nay, it might be queſtioned, whether it was in the parliament's power to place there ſuch; at leaſt there would have been occaſion for a very expreſs and authentic law for that purpoſe. Nevertheleſs, by a particular clauſe of this act, the King was allowed liberty to impoſe conditions on theſe two Princeſſes, without which they could have no right to ſucceed; a thing the parliament would not, nay could not have done, had they been owned for legitimate. It was not therefore on account of their natural right, but by mere favor, that they were inabled to ſucceed to the crown.

Henry followed the ſame plan in his laſt will. He put Mary and Elizabeth in the line of ſucceſſion next their brother Edward, but in ſuch a manner that he let them ſee, it was by mere grace, ſince he bound them to certain conditions, without which they were to forfeit their right. The difference he made between them and Edward ſhewed he owned them not for legitimate, and thereby afforded a pretenſe to queſtion the right he gave them. But what conduced ſtill more to imbroil the affair of the ſucceſſion was, that his will, paſſing over in ſilence the iſſue of Margaret Queen of Scotland, Henry's eldeſt ſiſter, placed next to Elizabeth the children of Mary Queen-dowager of France and ducheſs of Suffolk, the younger ſiſter. This was a manifeſt abuſe of the power granted him by parliament, and conſequently a furniſhing the Queen of Scotland with a plauſible pretenſe to demand the annulling a will which ſubverted the moſt eſtabliſhed laws of the kingdom.

Edward VI completed this confuſſion in the affair of the ſucceſſion, by conveying the crown to Jane Grey, contrary to the rights of Mary and Elizabeth. This was an act of abſolute ſovereignty very unbecoming a King of England, and one who died a minor. But moreover, in this act of conveyance there were contradictions no leſs palpable than thoſe whereof Henry VIII had been guilty. Edward owned, for good and valid, the act which declared Mary and Elizabeth illegitimate: but, at the ſame time, by his own authority, he repealed that which gave the King his father a power to ſettle the ſucceſſion. On the other hand, he followed his father's will, in giving the preference to the younger ſiſter's children; but therewith annulled the will, by excluding Mary and Elizabeth.

Mary I. An' 1553.

Four Princeſſes might pretend to the crown.

By this brief recapitulation, it may be eaſily perceived what a door to diviſions and civil wars was opened by Henry VIII and his ſucceſſor. By the above-mentioned acts, four Princeſſes, Mary, Elizabeth, the Queen of Scotland, and Jane Grey, could lay claim to the crown on Edward's demiſe, and each could find in theſe very acts arguments to combat her adverſaries pretenſions.

Examination of Mary's right.

Mary reſted on her father's will: but ſhe received, in her opinion, a much ſtronger ſupport, tho' ſhe durſt not openly alledge it, from her natural right, and the want of authority in thoſe who annulled her mother's marriage. On the other hand, it might be objected to her, that having been declared illegitimate by act of parliament, that act was never repealed, and it was not in the King's power to place baſtards on the throne, in excuſion of the lawful heirs: that beſide it was known to the whole nation, that the parliament was far from being free when ſhe was placed in the ſucceſſion after Edward; however this act ought to have been preceded by an expreſs repeal of that whereby ſhe was declared incapable of ſucceeding.

Of Elizabeth's

The like allegation might be made againſt Elizabeth: but ſhe might reply, that her mother's divorce was grounded only on a clauſe which was afterwards declared inſufficient, and that, by the act of the year 1540, ſhe was reſtored to her rights: conſequently it was to her the crown was devolved if her ſiſter Mary was incapable of ſucceeding.

Of Mary Queen of Scotland's.

The Queen of Scotland could plead the illegitimation of Mary and Elizabeth, and affirm, it was her right to aſcend the Engliſh throne, as granddaughter to Henry VIII's eldeſt ſiſter. As to the objection of her being born out of the land, it was a groundleſs cavil, ſince in England Princes of the Blood are never deemed foreigners, tho' born out of the realm.

Of Jane Grey's.

Jane Grey had for her Edward's aſſignment, approved by the whole privy-council, and all the judges of England: but it muſt be confeſſed to be a very ill-grounded right. Herein it is certain the King, the council, and the judges had undertaken what exceeded the bounds of their power: beſide, the duke of Northumberland was known to hold the council in ſubjection, and it would have been eaſy to prove the judges were conſtrained to draw and ſign the inſtrument.

Mary and Jane Grey are the only competitors.

Had this affair been to be decided by law and impartial judges, many difficulties would doubtleſs have occurred. On the other hand, if each of the four Princeſſes who might have pretended to the crown would have maintained her right, and had been ſtrong enough to ſupport her pretenſions, to what calamities would the nation have been expoſed? But the affair took another turn, becauſe neither Princeſs Elizabeth nor the Scotiſh Queen took any ſteps towards poſſeſſing the crown. So Mary and Jane were the only competitors. This was very advantageous to Mary, becauſe her right was thereby put in the balance with only Jane's, the weakeſt of all. Undoubtedly this is what induced all the hiſtorians to declare for Mary's right, becauſe they compared it only with that of her rival. But had Elizabeth and the Queen of Scotland been each ſupported with a good army, perhaps all the advantage would not have been ſo readily given to Mary. Having thus ſeen the grounds of this quarrel, let us now proceed to the deciſion.

The duke of Northumberland's error. Burnet.

The duke of Northumberland took care to conceal Edward's death, becauſe he expected Mary would throw herſelf into his hands. We muſt acknowledge that this miniſter, politic as he was, commited a very groſs error, in neglecting to ſecure Mary and Elizabeth, immediately after Edward had ſigned the conveyance to Jane Grey. He might have eaſily effected it while Edward lived: but inſtead of ſuddenly taking ſo neceſſary a precaution, he expected they would voluntarily run into the ſnare he had laid for them, by having them ſent for to keep their brother company in his ſickneſs. Mary had like to have been caught in the trap: ſhe was within half a day's journey of London, when ſhe had notice from the earl of Arundel of King Edward's death, his aſſignment of the ſucceſſion, and the deſign upon her perſon.

This intelligence obliging her to take other meaſures, ſhe immediately altered her courſe, and went to Kenning-Hall in Norfolk. Thence ſhe wrote to the council a letter, which plainly evidenced her being informed of what they intended to conceal from her. She told the counſellors, ſhe thought it very ſtrange, that the King her brother being three days dead, ſhe had not been advertiſed of it by them, ſince they could not be ignorant of her juſt right to the crown: that their neglect on this occaſion was a plain intimation of ſome ill deſign againſt her; but that ſhe was ready to take all in good part, and to pardon ſuch as would have recourſe to her clemency: that, in the mean while, ſhe required them to proclaim her Queen. After writing this letter ſhe departed from Kenning-Hall, and repaired to the caſtle of Framlingham in Suffolk. Two reaſons induced her to retire to this place: the firſt, that the duke of Northumberland was much hated in thoſe parts, ever ſince the great ſlaughter he had made of the rebels who had taken arms under Ket: the ſecond, that the caſtle of Framlingham being near the ſea, ſhe might, if the ill ſucceſs of her affairs obliged her to it, have a more eaſy opportunity of eſcaping into Flanders.

She aſſumes the title of Queen, and calls the nobles to her aid.

On her arrival at this place, ſhe took the title of Queen, and being proclaimed at Norwich, ſent circular letters to all the nobility, requiring them to aſſiſt her in maintaining her right. Let us now ſee what paſſed at London.

The duke of Northumberland abſolute in the council.

It has, in the preceding reign, been obſerved, that the duke of Northumberland was become ſo abſolute in the council that not one of the counſellors durſt oppoſe his will. Seemingly, Edward's death ſhould have freed them from their ſervitude: but as probably that duke would have more authority under his daughter-in-law Jane, than under Edward, all dreaded having him their enemy. It is not therefore to the council ſo much as to the duke of Northumberland, by whom the board was directed in all their reſolutions, that what was done in Jane's favor, after Edward's death, is to be aſcribed. This miniſter ſoon found it impoſſible to keep the King's death long concealed. Two days after, it became public in London: beſide, Mary's retreat plainly ſhewed how fruitleſs were the pains taken on that account. Wherefore Northumberland, judging it no longer proper to make a ſecret of his deſigns, went with the duke of Suffolk to give Jane notice of her being to aſcend the throne (1), by virtue of Edward's letters patent, whereby he aſſigned her the crown. Jane was then in her ſixteenth year: but at that age, wherein human judgment ſcarce begins to be formed, hers had acquired ſuch a degree of perfection as is rarely found in one ſo immature. All the hiſtorians agree that the ſolidity of her mind, joined to a continual application to ſtudy, rendered her the wonder of her age. She perfectly underſtood French, Latin and Greek, and made uſe of theſe languages as helps to attain to the higheſt knowledge in the ſciences (2). Herein ſhe greatly reſembled her kinſman King Edward, who had for her a tender friendſhip, as on her part ſhe had for him a ſingular eſteem. She expreſſed great concern at his death, which however ſhe muſt have expected, ſince his recovery had been deſpaired of ſome time: but as ſhe knew not that his death was to procure her the crown, ſhe was exceſſively ſurpriſed at the tydings brought her by her father and the duke of Northumberland. Inſtead of receiving it with joy, as they doubtleſs expected, ſhe told them, That ſhe deſired not to inrich herſelf by the ſpoils of others: that the crown appertained to Princeſs Mary, and after her to Princeſs Elizabeth, and being acquainted, as ſhe was, with King Henry's will, ſhe was unwilling to aſpire to the throne before her turn. Againſt theſe reaſons were urged King Edward's authority, with the judges approbation, and it was indeavored to convince her, that this unanimity was a clear evidence there was not therein any thing repugnant to the national laws. Theſe arguments ſomewhat moved her, and the importunities of Guilford Dudley her huſband finally prevailed on her to receive the proffered diadem: yet was it in ſuch a manner as convinced the two dukes that ſhe did it not ſo much from a perſuaſion of the juſtice of her title, as thro' complaiſance and want of reſolution. Accordingly, the duke of Northumberland declared, in his report to the council, that ſo far was Jane from aſpiring to the crown, that ſhe was rather by inticement and force made to accept it.

No ſooner had the duke of Northumberland obtained Jane's conſent, but it was reſolved that the council ſhould with her withdraw to the Tower, and ſhe be proclaimed. This reſolution taken, the lord mayor of London was ſent for, and being informed of the King's death, and of the ſettlement in favor of Jane Grey, the ceremony of proclaiming her was fixed to the next day, July ten, and the fifth after Edward's deceaſe. Mean while, the council wrote a reply to Mary's letter, ſigned by twenty-one counſellors, to this effect, "That Mary "could not pretend to the crown, ſince ſhe was "born of a marriage not legal and diſſolved by a "juridical ſentence, confirmed by more than one "parliament: that ſhe ought to deſiſt from her "pretenſions, and acknowledge for her Sovereign "Queen Jane, who was now on the throne by "virtue of the late King's letters patent: that if "ſhe ſhewed herſelf obedient, ſhe ſhould find the "counſellors ready to do her any ſervice, conſiſtent "with her duty to Queen Jane."

was his daughter-in-law, when they heard her proclaimed Queen, they alſo imagined they heard that deteſted duke proclaimed chief governor; a ſound no way pleaſing to the Engliſh: nay, on this occaſion, happened a certain accident very ominous, and which confirmed the Londoners in their prejudice againſt the duke of Northumberland. A vintner's boy, having ſome way expreſſed a ſort of ſcorn at the proclamation, was inſtantly ordered to the pillory, his ears cut off, and nailed to it; which was done. This procedure, whereof the odium was caſt upon Northumberland, made it judged what was to be expected from his government, ſince this new reign began with ſuch ſeverity.

A vintner's boy puniſhed for making a jeſt of it. Burnet. Strype. Stow.

The duke of Northumberland took care not to omit the cuſtom long ſince introduced, that the new Sovereigns ſhould, in the begining of their reign, retire with their council to the Tower. He could not doubt Mary's pretending to the crown, and uſing all poſſible indeavors to take poſſeſſion, neither was he ignorant how the nobles and people ſtood affected with regard to the ſtate's then ſituation. For this reaſon he was very glad to have the counſellors in the Tower, in order to be maſter, and bring them to reſolutions agreeable to his intereſt.

Northumberland's reaſons for keeping the council in the Tower.

As the change, which ſoon after happened, proceeded from the diſpoſition of the ſeveral ſtate members, it will be abſolutely neceſſary to have a diſtinct notion how they ſtood inclined, in order to comprehend the cauſes of this revolution.

Diſpoſition of the ſtate members.

The council conſiſted of twenty-one perſons, among whom few were the duke of Northumberland's real friends; but all in general feared him. Some, as the earl of Arundel, ſtill adhered to the Romiſh creed, tho' outwardly they conformed to the novel inſtitutions. Others, as the archbiſhop of Canterbury, were ſincerely zealous Proteſtants. But the majority, without being bigots to either religion, blindly followed that which happened to be predominant: as they had eaſily imbraced that of Henry VIII, they had with the ſame eaſe followed that eſtabliſhed by Edward VI, being ready to reſume the Romiſh belief if it ſuited beſt with their temporal intereſt. This was particularly the duke of Northumberland's character: ſo, tho' he profeſſed the reformed religion, even the Proteſtants had of him but a very indifferent opinion. They were perſuaded his pretended zeal for the reformation's advancement was mere grimace, and purely the effect of his policy. This diſpoſition of the counſellors, manifeſtly evidences, that a religious zeal alone was not capable of keeping them in Jane's intereſt: no, they needed a more powerful motive. But inſtead thereof, there was a reaſon which wholly diſingaged them from her party; namely, the ſlaviſh ſubjection they were held in by Northumberland. That duke, whoſe pride was inſufferable, could not brook the leaſt contradiction. The council ſeemed to have nothing to do, but to follow his directions without examination: then, he was one of thoſe difficult taſk-maſters with whom a ſingle failure cancels all former ſervices. This the earl of Arundel in particular had ſadly experienced. Tho' he had been greatly ſerviceable to the duke in ruining Somerſet, yet afterwards, becauſe he found him not ſufficiently pliant to his humor, he got him heavily fined, under color of his having imbezzled the royal treaſure. This uſage was ſtill remembered by the earl, who only waited a proper occaſion of taking vengeance; nor were the other counſellors a whit leſs deſirous to free themſelves from the yoke of that arrogant miniſter; but they were as priſoners in the Tower, where they apprehended the leaſt falſe ſtep would coſt them their lives before the quarrel between Jane and Mary was decided, and therefore, they approved of whatever the duke pleaſed to order, and the reſolutions tending to eſtabliſh Jane on the throne were made in the council's name, tho' Northumberland was the ſole author.

Of the council.

The other peers, who had no ſhare in the government, had ſentiments much like thoſe of the counſellors. While the duke of Somerſet was protector, he was hated by the nobility, as appeared in the former reign; and therefore, to their utmoſt, they aſſiſted Warwick in working his deſtruction: but when that was effected, they ſoon perceived they were no gainers by the change, ſince it gave them a maſter abundantly more imperious and formidable than him from whom they were freed: the new miniſter treating them afterwards with ſuch haughtineſs, that they had cauſe to regret the duke of Somerſet. Conſequently, they moſt ardently wiſhed his ruin, which was not to be expected while his daughter-in-law ſhould ſit on the throne. This made them incline to Mary, tho' in reality that Princeſs was little beloved by the Engliſh.

Of the nobility.

The duke of Northumberland had been chief author of the fall of Somerſet, who was the peoples idol. This ſufficed to render him odious: beſide, he was looked on as a perſon cruel and moroſe, whoſe councils always leaned to ſeverity. On his routing the Norfolk rebels under the late reign, ſuch were his executions, that he drew on him the hatred of that whole county and Suffolk. This hatred afterwards ſpread over the kingdom, when he came to be at the head of affairs: wherefore, all in general languiſhed for deliverance from this deteſted miniſter; and that could be only by the ruin of Jane's party. The Londoners in particular hated him mortally.

Of the people.

Let us now conſider the Engliſh nation in reſpect to the two religions. Jane openly profeſſed herſelf a Proteſtant, and that ſhe was intirely convinced of the truth of that doctrine. Mary, on the contrary, was vehemently bigoted to Popery; and tho' under Edward ſhe had feigned conformity to the belief eſtabliſhed by Henry VIII, it was well known to be merely with deſign to ſilence thoſe who governed during her brother's minority. She was not only believed a ſtanch devotee to his Beatitude, but alſo zealous for all the moſt outrageous exceſſes injoined by the Romiſh church. It may eaſily be gueſſed, that all who were ſtill cordially inclined to the ancient creed, paſſionately wiſhed this Princeſs might aſcend the throne; that being the ſole means whereby they could hope to ſee their religion reſtored: whereas if Jane reigned, they could expect only a continuance of the meaſures taken to aboliſh it. The duke of Northumberland, who probably was to be Jane's prime miniſter, had even appeared zealous for the reformation: ſo, to judge of him by his former conduct, the friends of the old religion could not from him hope for any advantage. Some who knew him better than the reſt, were very ſenſible how remote he was from being a good Proteſtant: but they knew alſo, tho' he might have favorable thoughts of their religion, they could expect nothing from him but what ſuited his temporal intereſt, and that this intereſt would naturally hold him attached to the Proteſtant party: ſo, the Roman Catholics were all for Mary, and ready to lend their hands to ſet her on the throne.

Of the Roman Catholics.

The better to comprehend how the Reformed ſtood affected at this juncture, it muſt be obſerved that, to conſider England in general, it may be ſaid the nation was wholly Proteſtant. Scarce was one perſon to be found who had not ſubmited, at leaſt outwardly, to the laws made for that purpoſe in the reign of Edward: but among the great numbers deemed Proteſtants, many were only ſo in name. Some ſtill halted between the two religions: others were Papiſts in their hearts; and abundance, regarding only temporal advantages, had imbraced the the reformation to make their fortunes. The ſmalleſt number was of ſuch as, truly convinced of the new religion's tenets being undeniable verities, were ready to ſacrifice their All for its ſake. None but theſe therefore were Jane's real friends. Among the others, many indeed wiſhed the reformation might prevail, and conſidered Mary's acceſſion to the throne as a calamity, but were not at all diſpoſed to hazard their lives and fortunes to prevent it. However, there was one thing wherein all the Reformed, as well the zealous as the luke-warm and timorous, were agreed; namely, in their hatred of the duke of Northumberland, and their dread of falling again under his tyrannical government. Theſe two paſſions made them look on Jane's acceſſion as a misfortune to them and the kingdom: they were the more confirmed in this opinion as, not foreſeeing what was to happen in Mary's reign, they flattered themſelves that, content with the private exerciſe of her own religion, ſhe would leave the reformation in the ſame ſtate ſhe found it, or at moſt would be ſatisfied with allowing her party liberty of conſcience; and this was what her friends every where, and on all occaſions, were extremely ſedulous to inſinuate. So Jane's cauſe muſt naturally not be well ſupported, eſpecially as, Mary not having any other competitor, the Engliſh did not believe they ought, merely thro' a principle of religion, to depart from the rules of juſtice and equity, by depriving of the crown her who had the beſt title. If their poſterity have not continued in the ſame opinion, it muſt wholly be aſcribed to the inhuman violences exerciſed on the Proteſtants, where-ever the Romiſh perſuaſion prevails.

The public hatred of the duke of Northumberland advantageous to Mary.

It is certain, tho' Mary had for her all the wiſhers to the old religion, that party would not have been able to place her on the throne, had not the peoples hatred of Northumberland determined the very Proteſtants to declare for her. Moſt of the Engliſh hiſtorians take great pains to prove the juſtice of Mary's title, and infer from thence that the Proteſtants prefered right to their own intereſt. I will not deny that ſeveral acted from that principle: but, very ſeemingly, the dread of falling again under the duke of Northumberland's domination helped Mary to more friends than the juſtice of her title, eſpecially as this title was not ſo clear but that it was liable to many objections. However this be, Mary being proclaimed at Norwich, the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk declared for her, and furniſhed her with troops. The men of Suffolk, tho' ſtrongly attached to the reformation, ſignaliſed themſelves on this occaſion. It is true, they deſired to know of her, whether ſhe would leave religion in the ſame ſtate ſhe found it; which ſhe poſitively promiſed, reſerving to herſelf the liberty of profeſſing her own creed. On theſe aſſurances, they reſolved to hazard their lives and eſtates in her quarrel. Many lords and gentlemen came alſo to Framlingham to offer their ſervice; and the earls of Bath and Suſſex, the ſons of lords Wharton and Mordant (1), with many more, raiſed forces for her.

During this, inſtructions were expediting by the counſellors for Richard Shelley, who was to go and inform Charles V of what paſſed in England. It was believed there was moſt danger from that quarter. Shelley went indeed, but the Emperor would neither give him audience, nor receive Jane's letter, to notify her acceſſion to the crown, and to deſire his friendſhip.

Mean while, the council received from all parts intelligence, that Mary's party gathered ſtrength, that ſhe had been proclaimed in many places, and had already an army which daily increaſed. Theſe ill tidings, which flowed in very faſt, obliged the miniſters to raiſe forces to oppoſe Mary's. Immediate orders were given to ſuch as were in a readineſs, to meet at Newmarket, with whom were joined ſome regiments haſtily levied at London. At the ſame time they ſent ſir Edward Haſtings, the earl of Huntington's brother, to raiſe Buckinghamſhire, and the earl of Northampton undertook alſo to raiſe Herefordſhire. The duke of Suffolk was appointed to command this army, Northumberland being unwilling to leave London, leſt his abſenſe ſhould produce ill effects: but the earl of Arundel, who wiſhed ſome occaſion to act for Mary, ſeeing the duke of Northumberland's preſenſe was an inſuperable obſtacle to the execution of his deſigns, found means to break his meaſures. He intimated to Jane, that her father would be expoſed to extreme peril; that it would be properer the duke of Northumberland ſhould head the army, and the duke her father continue with her. On the other hand, he inſinuated, or cauſed it to be inſinuated to the duke of Northumberland, that it would be very dangerous to put the army under the command of Suffolk who had never been very fortunate in his expeditions: that, on ſuch a momentous occaſion, he ought inſtantly to head the troops himſelf, and that his name alone was capable of ſtriking terror in thoſe aſſembled by Mary, in a country where he had given ſignal proofs of his conduct and valor. Jane's tender affection for her father induced her to ardently to imbrace this counſel, that all Northumberland's efforts to make her deſiſt proved ineffectual.

The earl of Arundel takes meaſures againſt the duke of Northumberland.

He ſo manages that the duke of Northumberland heads the army.

At ſo critical a juncture, the duke of Northumberland was ſtrangely perplexed. He was indeed conſcious of his being much more fit than the duke of Suffolk to command the army againſt Mary, and was very ſenſible that thereon the whole abſolutely depended. But then he dreaded leaving the young Queen in the hands of the council, of whom he was not well aſſured, and who complied with him purely thro' fear: and the more, as Suffolk, the Queen's father, was reckoned no great genius. However, as it was not intirely in his choice to accept or refuſe the command, and beſide all depended on the ſucceſs againſt Mary's army, he reſolved to march. He left London on the fourteenth of July, without being wiſhed ſucceſs (as is uſual on ſuch occaſions) by the great crouds looking on as he paſſed in order to head ſix thouſand men aſſembled at Newmarket (2).

Tho' moſt of the counſellors had no great inclinations to favor Northumberland's deſigns, they were however obliged to uſe great caution. They ſaw themſelves as priſoners in the Tower, under direction of the duke of Suffolk, who was concerned to prevent all attempts againſt his daughter. It was neceſſary therefore to ſeem very zealous for Jane's intereſts, 'till a favorable opportunity offered to declare for Mary. To this end, they appointed Ridley, biſhop of London, to ſet out Queen Jane's title in a ſermon at St. Paul's, and to warn the people of the dangers to which they would be expoſed ſhould Mary aſcend the throne. Ridley diſcharged his commiſſion like one who was fully convinced that the reformation would greatly ſuffer under Mary's government; and therefore, he largely inſiſted on Mary's attachment to the Romiſh religion, and informed the audience of certain paſſages between her and himſelf, and which were plain indications of her averſion to the reformation and the Reformed (1). Mary never forgave him this ſermon, which at that juncture was capable of doing her great prejudice, it being at a time when her friends were uſing their utmoſt indeavors to perſuade the people of her not being ſo zealous for Popery as ſhe was repreſented, and that ſhe would not make any alterations in the religion which was by law eſtabliſhed. Sands, vice-chancellor of Cambridge (afterwards archbiſhop of York (2) in the reign of Elizabeth) having received the ſame orders from the duke of Northumberland (3) managed it more artfully and, by keeping to more general terms, gave no offenſe to either party.

Deſertion in Northumberland's army.

Mean while, the duke of Northumberland was terribly imbaraſſed. He had marched to Cambridge with ſix thouſand men (4), and from thence was advanced to St. Edmundſbury: but, inſtead of ſeeing his army increaſe by the way, as he expected, it daily diminiſhed by deſertions. On the other hand, he heard of Mary's progreſs in Norfolk and and Suffolk, and to complete his misfortunes, news was brought him, that ſir Edward Haſtings, who was to have joined him with four thouſand men he had raiſed, had declared for Mary, and proclaimed her at Buckingham. In ſhort, he was likewiſe informed, that the ſix warlike ſhips, ſent to cruiſe on the coaſt of Suffolk to prevent Mary's eſcape, had followed the example of Haſtings. All this made him reſolve on returning to Cambridge, whence he wrote to the council for a ſpeedy ſupply. But the counſellors were then otherwiſe imployed.

Some of the counſellors reſolve to act for Mary. Godwin. Burnet.

The news they received, from all parts, of the proſperous ſtate of Mary's affairs, had now determined ſome of them to provide for their ſafety, by ſhifting ſides, while their change might be of ſervice to them. In all appearance, the earl of Arundel had already labored to take off ſome of his colegues from Jane's party. The marquis of Wincheſter, who always went with the ſtream, was eaſily prevailed on. The earl of Pembroke had been one of the moſt zealous for Jane, becauſe his ſon had eſpouſed this new Queen's younger ſiſter: but finding her affairs taking a bad turn, he reſolved, either voluntarily, or thro' Arundel's ſollicitations, to ſcreen himſelf from the impending ſtorm, in doing Mary ſome ſignal ſervice (5). Theſe three peers gained other counſellors, and they all determined to declare for Mary as ſoon as it was poſſible. The difficulty was to get out of the Tower, without giving umbrage to the duke of Suffolk. Had Northumberland been preſent, they would not have found it a very eaſy matter to ſucceed; but the duke of Suffolk was far from having his penetration. The letter lately received from the duke of Northumberland furniſhed them with the wanted pretenſe. They repreſented to Suffolk, that the readieſt way to procure the required ſuccors was applying to the mayor of London; and, to that end, it was proper the council ſhould meet ſomewhere in the city, the more eaſily to confer with the mayor concerning means of ſpeedily raiſing a body of forces: that the earl of Pembroke's houſe was convenient for that porpoſe, and there the buſineſs would be forwarded more in two hours, than at the Tower in ſix. But, as it might be objected, that the mayor and aldermen could be eaſily ſent for to the Tower, they added, that at the ſame time audience might be given to the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, who ſcrupled to receive it in the Tower. Whether the duke of Suffolk did not ſuſpect them of any ill deſign, or durſt not at ſuch a juncture diſcover his ſuſpicions, he ſuffered the council to meet at the earl of Pembroke's (6), whom he did not miſtruſt. July 19.

They were no ſooner aſſembled than the earl of Arundel began a harangue, repreſenting to them, that now or never was the time to ſhake off the tyranny of Northumberland: that they had ſufficiently experienced his inſolence, injuſtice, cruelty and treachery to his friends, and if they were ſo unwiſe as to ſupport Jane on the throne, they would but render heavier the yoke which that duke had already laid on their necks: that the only way was to declare for Mary, and when the people ſhould ſee the council take that courſe, Northumberland would be univerſally abandoned. The council's ſudden reſolution to imbrace Arundel's propoſal evidences this affair to have been already determined among the principal members. After a ſhort debate, they ſent for the mayor and aldermen of London, and, declaring their reſolution, they went together and proclaimed Mary in diverſe quarters of the city. Then they repaired to St. Paul's, where Te Deum was ſung. The London magiſtrates ready compliance can be aſcribed only to the hatred they bore Northumberland. Let it be ever ſo much affirmed that theſe magiſtrates languiſhed for the ancient creed's re-eſtabliſhment, and therefore joyfully ſeized this opportunity to ſet Mary on the throne; it is not likely, that men placed in their offices in Edward's reign ſhould be ſo well inclined to the old religion as to come to ſo ſudden a reſolution with that view only, had there not been ſome other motive. However, they no ſooner returned from St. Paul's, but orders were ſent the duke of Suffolk, requiring him to deliver up the Tower, and that Jane ſhould lay down the title of Queen, and deſiſt from her pretenſions. Suffolk inſtantly obeyed, ſeeing no poſſibility of keeping the Tower at this melancholy juncture. As for Jane, ſhe beheld her deprivation from the royal dignity, injoyed only nine days, with more pleaſure than ſhe had conceived at her being therewith inveſted. Then the council diſpatched orders to the duke of Northumberland to diſband his army, and behave himſelf as became a loyal ſubject to Queen Mary. At the ſame time, the earl of Arundel and lord Paget were deputed to acquaint Mary with theſe tranſactions.

His firſt thoughts were to quit the land: but it is ſaid that he was prevented by the band of gentlemen penſioners, who flatly told him, they had need of his teſtimony to juſtify their conduct. After that, he thought only of gaining Mary's favor, by expreſſing a zeal for her ſervice, as if it was likely he could deceive her by a few outward appearances. To that purpoſe, he went to the market-place in Cambridge, and proclaimed her, flinging up his hat in token of joy (7). But all this ſignified nothing. Next day, the earl of Arundel arreſted him by the Queen's order. Then appeared that proud and haughty man no leſs meanly ſubmiſſive than he had ſhewed himſelf inſolently elate during his proſperity. When the duke of Northumberland was in the Tower, Mary found no farther oppoſition. All Jane's adherents ſtrove to atone for their fault by a ready ſubmiſſion, and ſupplication of the new Queen's mercy. She received very graciouſly thoſe who came to pay their duty to her, tho' ſhe was determined to ſacrifice to her ſafety, or vengeance, ſome of thoſe whom ſhe deemed her chief adverſaries. Of this number were Jane Grey, the duke of Suffolk, the marquis of Northampton, Ridley biſhop of London, Cheek who had been Edward's preceptor, Robert Dudley the duke of Northumberland's ſon, Guilford Dudley Jane's huſband, Chomley and Montague judges. All theſe were ſent to or detained in the Tower by the Queen's expreſs order. But three days after, ſhe releaſed the duke of Suffolk, having pitched on him to exemplify her clemency, becauſe ſhe judged him not capable of creating her any diſquiet.

She makes her entry into London, and ſets at liberty the priſoners in the Tower. Godwin. Burnet. Strype. Stow.

On the third of Auguſt, ſhe came to London with her ſiſter Elizabeth, who had met her on the way with a thouſand horſe (1), ſhe had raiſed for her ſervice. When ſhe entered the Tower, ſhe releaſed the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, Bonner, the dutcheſs of Somerſet, and lord Courtney, the marquis of Exeter's eldeſt ſon, whom not long after ſhe created earl of Devonſhire. Thus, without any neceſſity to draw one ſword in her quarrel, ſhe was peaceably ſettled in the throne, notwithſtanding the efforts made to deprive her of it. She owed this good ſucceſs to the general hatred of Northumberland: for it may be truly affirmed, that as Jane Grey would never have been ſtiled Queen, had it not been for this duke, ſo, had it not alſo been for him, ſhe would undoubtedly have preſerved that title. Moſt apparently, reſtoring religion to the ſtate it was in before the alterations introduced by the two laſt Kings, and perhaps taking vengeance on her enemies, were Mary's main views, when ſhe aſcended the throne: at leaſt, we ſhall ſee no other projects during the whole courſe of her reign.

Council about religion. Burnet.

As the new Queen had ſcarce any thing in her thoughts but the re-eſtabliſhment of her religion, her firſt care was to conſult her truſty friends how to effect it. She was herſelf diſpoſed to keep no meaſures, but to force the kingdom to return immediately to what ſhe termed, "the union of the Catholic church." To that end, ſhe had already determined to ſend for cadinal Pole, as legate, to reconcile England to his Sanctity the Roman Pontif: but Gardiner, who was conſidered as a man of great experience, was of a different ſentiment. He knew the reformation muſt be brought down the ſame way it was ſet up, that is, gradually, and therefore it ſufficed at firſt, to reduce religion to what it was at Henry VIII's deceaſe. This advice was moſt prudent, and withal more ſuitable to the intereſt of the perſon who gave it. He was ſenſible, the Queen had a great eſteem and affection for Pole, and was afraid this cardinal being in England, would diſpoſſeſs him of the chief place in the Queen's favor, nay, quite ruin him with her, becauſe he was not his friend. Mean while, as this counſel was not reliſhed by the Queen, it was in danger of being rejected, had not Gardiner uſed other means to compaſs his ends. He ſent a meſſenger to the Emperor, to repreſent to him, that what the Queen propoſed was too hazardous, and in caſe Pole came ſo ſoon into England, his zeal for the See of Rome would undo all, becauſe the Engliſh were not yet prepared to ſubmit to the Pope's yoke (2): that on the contrary, by this method, all things would ſucceed to the Queen's ſatisfaction, and to the advantage of religion, provided her Majeſty would be pleaſed to make him chancellor, and thereby give him the authority neceſſary to conduct a buſineſs of ſuch nicety. Probably, it was now the Emperor projected the marriage between his ſon Philip and Queen Mary, either of himſelf, or by Gardiner's ſuggeſtion. However this be, the Emperor approved Gardiner's meaſures, wrote diverſe letters to Mary, to perſuade her to moderate her zeal, leſt too much precipitation ſhould mar her deſigns. As ſhe had a great deference for his counſels, ſhe brought herſelf by degrees to comply with the projects of Gardiner, to whom ſhe finally gave the great ſeal.

Gardiner's ſentiments.

His intrigues with the Emperor. Burnet.

King Edward's funeral was ſolemniſed at Weſtminſter the eighteenth of Auguſt. The new miniſters were for having the old aboliſhed Office made uſe of on this occaſion, but Cranmer, ſupported by acts ſtill in force, ſtoutly oppoſed it, and officiated himſelf according to the new Liturgy, giving the communion to as many as were deſirous to receive it (3). But the Queen had a ſolemn ſervice in her own chapel performed with all the ceremonials of the Romiſh church.

King Edward's funeral Godwin. Burnet. Strype.

On the twelfth, the Queen in council declared, ſhe would uſe no force upon conſcience in affairs of religion. Great care was taken to diſperſe this declaration, and to magnify it as a ſignal inſtance of her majeſty's generoſity. But the Proteſtants readily diſtinguiſhed the difference between her declarations in council, and her promiſes to the Suffolk men. She had told theſe, that religion ſhould be left in the ſame ſtate as it was in at King Edward's deceaſe; but in this declaration thought it ſufficient to give a general aſſurance, that Proteſtants ſhould not be forced to imbrace the Romiſh belief: for this was the moſt natural meaning of her expreſſions. This reſtriction to her firſt promiſe could not but give them ſenſible alarms.

Mary declares that ſhe will not force any one's conſcience. Burnet.

The Roman Catholics in favor with the Queen.

Thoſe of the Romiſh faction were ſo confident of Mary's intention to reſtore their creed, that they made no difficulty of owning it publicly, and of even inveighing againſt the Proteſtant religion, tho' it had ſtill the countenance and protection of the laws. The day after Mary had made this declaration in her council, Bonner went to St. Paul's church to hear a ſermon preached by his chaplain Bourn. The preacher ſpake ſo honorably of Bonner, that he raiſed the indignation of his audience.

The other was, the fear they had of the Papal dominion, which had been for about twenty five years repreſented to them as a moſt intolerable tyranny. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 242.

(3) Day, the deprived biſhop of Chicheſter, preached the funeral ſermon, Goodwin, p. 334. And very probably performed the reſt of the ſervice; for it does not appear likely, that Cranmer ſhould be ſuffered to officiate, he being now under diſpleaſure, and about this time confined to his houſe. See Burnet, Vol. III. Collect. p. 409; and Hollingſh. p. 1089.

Then,

Mary I. An' 1553.

Then, exagerating the pretended perſecutions ſuffered by this prelate in the late reign, he ſpake of King Edward in terms ſo injurious (1), that the hearers loſt all patience. Some reproached, and others threw ſtones at him. One even threw a dagger, which he luckily avoided, and which ſtuck faſt in the wood of his pulpit. The people became at length ſo furious, that very likely the preacher had been torn piece-meal, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent Proteſtant miniſters, interpoſed and conveyed him from the danger, into a neighboring houſe. What compenſation this ſervice met with will appear hereafter.

Is in danger of his life, but reſcued by two Proteſtant miniſters. Burnet.

The Proteſtants ſtill flattered themſelves that the Queen would keep her word, and even favorably conſtrued that reſtriction ſhe had added to her firſt promiſe by her declaration in council. But they were not long left in this hope. Very ſoon after, ſhe iſſued a proclamation, which but too well ſufficed to diſabuſe them. The terms were ſo artfully compoſed, that they implied abundantly more than they ſeemed to expreſs. The Queen ſaid, ſhe had the ſame belief in which ſhe had been educated from her infancy, and intended to adhere to it during her life; ſhe paſſionately wiſhed all her ſubjects would follow her example; but would uſe no force; "till "public order ſhould be taken by common aſſent." This plainly diſcovered her intention to change religion by the parliament, and that then ſhe ſhould think herſelf diſcharged from her promiſe of not forcing conſciences. Then ſhe prohibited her ſubjects from giving each other the odious appellations of Papiſt and Heretic. The Proteſtants conſidered this prohibition as leveled intirely againſt them, becauſe they clearly underſtood, that a diſobedience to it would be puniſhed in them, but not in their adverſaries. After that, all kinds of illegal aſſemblies were forbid, and this article had the ſame conſtruction with the foregoing. By another clauſe of the proclamation, it was forbid to preach without her ſpecial licenſe. A man muſt have been wilfully blind, not to ſee this was intended to exclude the Proteſtants from every pulpit. Finally, the Queen ſaid, it was her intention, no man ſhould be puniſhed for the laſt rebellion, "without her order." Hereby, ſhe left all in fears. The proclamation ended with ſaying, her Majeſty was reſolved to puniſh rigorouſly all thoſe who ſhould foment pernicious deſigns; but ſhe hoped to have no cauſe to execute the ſeverity of the law. This clauſe naturally inſpired the Proteſtants with terror, for it was eaſy to foreſee, that religion and the laws were going to be changed, and that thoſe who ſubmited not blindly to the new ſtatutes, would be conſidered as rebels.

The Queen diſcovers her intention by a proclamation. Fox. Aug. 18. Burnet. Vol. II. p. 245. Strype.

The ſame day this proclamation was publiſhed, came on the trials of the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, the earl of Warwick, ſir Andrew Dudley, ſir John and ſir Henry Gates, and ſir Thomas Palmer. On the evidence of Palmer and ſir John Gates, King Edward had conſented to the execution of his uncle the duke of Somerſet, and they were become Northumberland's principal confidents. Mary appointed the duke of Norfolk, lord high ſteward at the trial of theſe three lords. He was ſtill under condemnation, ſince the act of attainder againſt him had not been reverſed. But the Queen had granted him a pardon, tho' in reality the ſaid pardon was not diſpatched 'till eleven days after. It was undoubtedly preſumed, that the Queen's promiſe was ſufficient, otherwiſe it is not eaſy to conceive, by what ſort of right a man under ſentence of death could preſide in a capital trial, or even give his vote (2).

The duke of Northumberland brought to his trial, with the earl of Warwick, marquis of Northampton &c. Godwin. Burnet. Strype. Stow. Hollingſh. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 337.

Mary I. An' 1553.

The duke of Northumberland being brought before his peers, deſired information upon two points, before he anſwered to the articles exhibited againſt him. The firſt was, whether a man acting by order of council, and under authority of the great ſeal, could be guilty of treaſon? The ſecond was, whether perſons who acted with him in the ſame affair, and were equally guilty, could ſit as his judges? This doubtleſs related to the marquis of Wincheſter, and the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, who were actually members of the council when Jane was proclaimed, and had given orders for her proclamation. After a ſhort conſultation, it was anſwered, that the great ſeal of a uſurper could give no authority nor indemnity to thoſe who acted by ſuch a warrant. To the ſecond point, he was anſwered, that none of the peers who ſat in judgment upon him having been either condemned for, or even accuſed of the ſame crime, could be deprived of their right on a bare ſurmiſe or report. It belongs to the lawyers to conſider whether theſe anſwers carry with them much ſolidity. It ſeems, as to the firſt, that if this maxim was admited in its utmoſt extent, it would draw after it very dangerous conſequences. Let us, for inſtance, ſuppoſe a uſurper on the throne of England, it is certain, the adherents to the lawful King cannot avoid great danger, which way ſoever they turn: if they obey the uſurper, they will be guilty of treaſon when the lawful King is on the throne; if they refuſe obedience, they will be puniſhed by the uſurper. That maxim, which allows that every ſubject ought to be faithful to the Prince on the throne, and who exerciſes the ſovereign power, is ſeemingly liable to fewer inconveniencies. As to the ſecond, let the peers inſiſt ever ſo much on their privileges, it is contrary to reaſon and equity, that accomplices of a crime ſhould ſit in judgment on him who commited it with them, when it is notoriouſly certain they were equally guilty: at leaſt it is very unlikely this maxim ſhould be approved by the judges of the realm, if there was the leaſt room to believe the accomplices would vote for the accuſed, which might very eaſily happen.

Burnet. Stow. Hollingſh.

The duke, ſeeing theſe two points determined againſt him, confeſſed himſelf guilty, and ſubmited to the Queen's mercy. The other two lords followed his example, and they were all three found guilty of high treaſon. Of the ſeven condemned, three were deſtined to execution, the duke of Northumberland, ſir John Gates, and ſir Thomas Palmer. The Biſhop of Worceſter * being ſent to the duke with the meſſage of death, he confeſſed to the biſhop, and declared he had always been a Roman Catholic in his heart. He made the ſame confeſſion on the ſcaffold; but it was ſtill doubted whether

The matter of this ſermon tended ſo much to the derogation and diſpraiſe of King Edward, and his words ſounded ſo evil in the ears of the hearers, that they proceeded to the extremities here related. this was done in expectation of being pardoned (1) or he had really diſſembled during the whole courſe of his life. It is pretended that, to ingage him to this public declaration, he had been flattered with the hopes of pardon, even tho' his head were laid on the block. He died unlamented, his conduct not having given to any perſon whatever the leaſt cauſe to love him. His two companions were executed the ſame day, being the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt.

The deputies from Suffolk ill received at court. Burnet.

Mary's late proclamation, concerning religion, evidently demonſtrated in what ſpirit ſhe deſigned to rule: but immediately after there were more convincing proofs. The inhabitants of Suffolk, relying on her Majeſty's promiſe, and having tranſgreſſed the prohibitions contained in the proclamation, expreſs orders were ſent the magiſtrates of that county to look ſtrictly to the execution of it, and rigorouſly puniſh the diſobedient. Hereupon thoſe people, not believing Mary would falſify her word, after the great ſervice they had done her, ſent deputies to intreat her to remember what ſhe had promiſed them with her own mouth. This petition was moſt haughtily rejected, and thought the more offenſive, as it juſtly reproached the Queen with breach of formal promiſe. They were told; that ſubjects were not to controle the actions of their Sovereign; and one of them named Dobbe (2), for ſpeaking with more freedom than the reſt, was pillored.

Bradford and Rogers commited to priſon. Burnet. Fox.

A few days after Bradford, one of the two miniſters who had reſcued Bourn, was put in priſon, and Rogers his companion confined to his houſe: afterwards he was alſo impriſoned. The great changes reſolved on at court, gave the miniſtry apprehenſions of meeting with obſtacles from ſuch as had credit with the people, and therefore they were glad, on ſundry pretexts, to ſecure them. All theſe proceedings induced the Proteſtants to believe a terrible ſtorm was impending.

Prelates depoſed in King Edward's time reſtored. Burnet. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 334, 337.

At the ſame time, all the biſhops deprived in the reign of Edward, were reſtored, by commiſſioners whom Mary appointed to examine the cauſes of their deprivation. Five Popiſh prelates, Bonner, Gardiner, Tonſtal, Day, and Heath, were ſubſtituted in the room of five Reformed (3). Gardiner was at the ſame time made chancellor, and very ſoon after a commiſſion was given him by the Queen, impowering him ſingly to grant licences to preachers, in conſequence of what ſhe had before injoined by her proclamation.

Other biſhops impriſoned. Fox. Godwin. Strype.

Some Proteſtant eccleſiaſtics, not ſubmiting to this order, were ſent to priſon. Hooper, biſhop of Gloceſter, and Coverdale, biſhop of Exeter, were of this number (4). The firſt was actually impriſoned; the latter commanded not to ſtir out of his houſe without permiſſion.

Romiſh ceremonies performed contrary to the laws. Burnet.

When the Papiſts manifeſtly perceived Mary's drift, they had not patience to wait for the reſtoration of their religion by public authority, but boldly celebrated maſs in ſeveral places, juſt as before the reformation; and tho' this was contrary to law, the court connived, and by ſilence expreſſed approbation.

At the ſame time, Mary's and her miniſtry's partiality appeared evidently in favor of the Roman Catholics againſt the Proteſtants. Judge Hales, who had alone refuſed ſigning the inſtrument which transfered the crown to Jane Grey, was thrown into the Marſhalſea, for charging the juſtices of Kent to conform to the unrepealed laws of King Edward, or rather for being a Proteſtant (5). For the ſame reaſon Montague, who had been conſtrained to aſſiſt in drawing the ſaid inſtrument, was fined in a thouſand pounds, and deprived of his office, to make room for Bromley, who had drawn and ſigned it without ſcruple.

Injuſtices done to the Proteſtants. Burnet.

In fine, ſince the ſhort time Mary had been on the throne, Proteſtants were every where injured and oppreſſed, the magiſtrates either not daring or not caring to give them any protection. Peter Martyr, profeſſor of divinity in Oxford, finding himſelf expoſed to the inſults of ſuch as hated his religion, was finally obliged to quit the place, and retire to Cranmer: but that archbiſhop, whoſe deſtruction was reſolved, was little able to protect him. Mean time, Bonner launched out into invectives and railleries againſt Mr. Canterbury, as he was pleaſed to ſtile him, and publiſhed every where, that ſuch was his reſignation to her Majeſty's pleaſure, that he had promiſed her a ſolemn abjuration of his errors. Cranmer refuted this calumny in a writing. He called the Queen herſelf to witneſs, that he had never made her any ſuch promiſe, and offered to maintain publicly the truth of what he profeſſed, if her Majeſty would grant him leave. This writing being publiſhed, Cranmer was cited to the Star-chamber. He owned himſelf the author, tho' it was publiſhed without his conſent, and, contrary to general expectation, was diſmiſſed without incurring any penalty. But Mary was not therewith ſatisfied, tho' ſhe was counſeled to treat Cranmer with the ſame moderation, he himſelf had uſed while he was in authority. She herſelf owed him her life, which was ſpared merely by his ſolicitation, when her father Henry VIII had deſigned to put her to death (6). To this counſel was oppoſed; that if her Majeſty ſhould treat with lenity this chieftain of all the heretics, it was the direct way to render their whole body inſolent and contumacious; but that, on the contrary, her inflicting on Cranmer exemplary chaſtiſement would intimidate ſuch as durſt publicly defend hereſy. This latter advice was very agreeable to Mary, who had conceived a mortal averſion to the archbiſhop, by reaſon of the ſentence of divorce pronounced by him againſt the Queen her mother; this injury making on her a far ſtronger impreſſion than the ſignal ſervice he did her afterwards. So, three days after, Cranmer being ſummoned before the council, was commited to the Tower, on accuſation of treaſon, and of publiſhing ſeditious libels. The aged Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter in the reign of Henry VIII, was alſo ſent thither the day before.

a Poliſh profeſſor named John a Laſco, were included in the number (1). This was the only act of mildneſs and equity ſhewn in this reign, with reference to religion: but this ſufficiently diſcovered what was deſigned againſt the Engliſh Proteſtants. The court's daily proceedings, before the repeal of any one law, ſo intimidated thoſe who had religion at heart, that great numbers, paſſing for Frenchmen, withdrew out of England into foreign countries (2). Thoſe who made haſte to eſcape the impending ſtorm, were wiſeſt and happieſt: for ſoon after others, who had taken a like reſolution, were arreſted, by orders diſpatched away to all the ports, not to ſuffer any perſon to quit the realm, as a Frenchman, without a paſs from the French embaſſador.

It was time now for the Queen to reward thoſe who had done her ſervice. The earl of Arundel was made lord-ſteward, ſir Edward Haſtings, a peer of the realm, and ſome others who had early declared for her, had imploys and dignities confered on them (3). But the earl of Suſſex (4), who had been her general, obtained a certain honorable privilege very unuſual in England; namely, to be covered in preſenſe of the Queen, as it is practiſed in Spain by the grandees. He had his letters patent under the great ſeal, the twenty-ſecond of October.

Is crowned. Godwin. Burnet. Stow. Hollingſh. Strype.

As the parliament had been ſummoned to meet the fifth of October, it was requiſite the Queen ſhould firſt be crowned. Her coronation ceremonies were performed the firſt of that month, with the uſual ſolemnity, by the biſhop of Wincheſter, who forgot not one of the formalities practiſed before the reformation. The ſame day was publiſhed a general pardon, but with ſo many exceptions, that few perſons could therefrom reap any benefit. All thoſe who had been arreſted before September were excepted by name.

Remits a ſubſidy granted to K. Edward. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 335. Burnet. Strype.

Then came out a proclamation, whereby her Majeſty remited the ſubſidy granted the King her brother, by his laſt parliament, for diſcharging his debts. This was to gain the good will of the inſuing parliament, and render it ſubſervient to her deſigns with reſpect to religion. Before its meeting, the archbiſhop of York was ſent to the Tower, on a general accuſation of ſundry crimes. Six days before, John Veſey, ſome time biſhop of Exeter, but deprived in the laſt reign, was reſtored by Mary's order. This was with intent to ſtrengthen the Catholic cauſe in the houſe of peers.

The archbiſhop of York ſent to the Tower; and a deprived biſhop reſtored. Ibid. p. 340.

The court had determined on abrogating all laws made in favor of the reformation, and on re-eſtabliſhing the ancient creed. This was not to be done without the parliament's concurrence. But if elections had been left free, it would have been difficult, not to ſay impoſſible, for Mary to ſucceed in her projects. The number of the Reformed was incomparably greater than that of the Romaniſts, and conſequently the elections would ſcarce have been very favorable to her. But, beſide the ordinary ways made uſe of by Kings to have parliaments at their devotion, in this were put in practiſe all kinds of artifices and frauds, not forgeting even violence. As care had been previouſly taken to change the magiſtrates in cities and counties, and there was ſcarcely one who was not already, or had promiſed to be a Papiſt, every thing tending to the election of Catholic repreſentatives was countenanced. On the contrary, ſuch as were ſuſpected of being diſpoſed to chuſe Proteſtants, were diſcouraged by menaces, arreſts, and even impriſonments, on the moſt frivolous pretenſes. In ſeveral places, matters were carried ſuch lengths, that Proteſtants were not allowed to aſſiſt in the aſſemblies where the elections were to be made. In a word, where theſe direct means failed of ſucceſs, on account of the ſuperiority of the Reformed, the ſherifs, devoted to the court, made falſe returns: that is, they ſent to court the names of perſons as if duly elected, tho' they had but very few, or perhaps no votes. As the diſputes ariſing from ſuch elections can only be decided by the houſe of commons, it is eaſy to imagine that a houſe compoſed of ſuch repreſentatives failed not to approve all elections favorable to the court, and reject all others if ever ſo little conteſted. This is one of the greateſt abuſes belonging to parliaments, and which is but too frequent whenever the kingdom is divided by factions. By theſe methods, the court ſecured a houſe of commons prone to comply with its ſuggeſtions, and whoſe members were either intereſted in the change of creed, or who held all religions as matters of indifferency.

Methods to influence elections, and procure returns favorable to the court. Burnet.

As to the upper houſe, which cannot be thus modeled to the court's liking, to all appearance Mary had ſo ſtrenuouſly and ſo ſucceſsfully labored to ingage the peers in her intereſt, that ſhe found no oppoſition. It is very ſurpriſing that the lords, who but a few months before were all Proteſtants, and had in their whole body only ſeven or eight who uſually oppoſed the laws made in favor of the reformation during King Edward's reign, were ſo early in Queen Mary's become in a manner all zealous Catholics. I pretend not to decide in which reign they diſſembled their ſentiments; but it is too evident that, in the one or the other, they were guilty of a baſe and ſcandalous prevarication. Mean while, in order to find leſs oppoſition in this houſe, the court anticipated its care by making ſuch changes among the prelates as might beſt favor its deſigns. Beſide both the archbiſhops and the biſhops of Gloceſter and Exeter actually impriſoned, ſix others had been changed, as has been obſerved. Probably all the reſt, two excepted, were for prefering their ſees to their religion. The two I except, were Taylor of Lincoln, and Harley of Hereford, who were even thruſt out of the houſe the firſt day, for refuſing to kneel at maſs. Such was Queen Mary's firſt parliament, compoſed of a houſe of commons filled with court-creatures; and of a houſe of lords, who, thro' fear, avarice, or ambition, diſſembled their ſentiments, or, ſome few excepted, were very indifferent as to religion in general. It is eaſy to foreſee what might be expected from ſuch a parliament.

This act ſeemed unneceſſary, ſince the like had been paſſed ſince Henry's death: but as ſome crimes not contained in the ſtatute of Edward III had been ſince declared felony, the intent of this was to aboliſh the late acts. It is true, this might have been attended with ano-

The divorce between Henry VIII and Catherine repealed. Statutes. Burnet.

In the ſecond ſeſſions the court's deſigns appeared more manifeſtly. Her Majeſty's mother's divorce was inſtantly repealed. This act paſſed in fewer days than Henry had imployed years in proſecuting the ſaid divorce. In the preamble it was ſaid, "That the marriage of Henry with Queen Catherine was not repugnant to the divine law, and "that man ought not to put aſunder what God "hath joined: that King Henry's ſcruples had "been ſuggeſted to him by malicious perſons, and "ſupported by the deciſions of ſome univerſities, "which had been previouſly ſecured by corruption "and bribery: that Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had raſhly pronounced ſentence of divorce, on the authority of theſe deciſions, and "other groundleſs ſurmiſes, and by a blameable "preſumption had thought himſelf more knowing "than all the other doctors." On theſe foundations, the parliament repealed the ſentence, and all ſtatutes made for its confirmation. Gardiner, chief promoter of this act, muſt have been ſtocked with a plentiful ſhare of impudence to make the parliament talk thus of Henry's divorce, in which he was principally concerned, even before Cranmer was known at court, and which he had himſelf approved, adviſed, and had even aſſiſted as judge. But ſuch was this audacious prelate's character.

The Queen jealous of her ſiſter Elizabeth. Burnet.

Princeſs Elizabeth, being thus again declared illegitimate by a ſtatute which reſtored Mary, found a very great change in the behavior of her ſaid Majeſty, who no longer expreſſed for her the leaſt affection. It is even pretended, that another ſecret cauſe alienated Mary from her, and that was, her love for the earl of Devonſhire, whom ſhe had ſome thoughts of marrying; but that this nobleman, perhaps ſomewhat too indiſcreetly, continued paying his reſpects to Elizabeth.

The maſs reſtored.

The thirty-firſt of October, the lords ſent down to the commons a bill for repealing Edward's laws concerning religion; and ſix days after the commons ſent it back with their approbation. By this act it was ordained, that no other form of public worſhip ſhould, from the twentieth of December, be allowed, but what had been uſed in the laſt year of Henry VIII. This ſhews Gardiner's influence on the parliament, ſince this act preciſely followed the plan he had propoſed.

Act in favor of the eccleſiaſtics.

Another act paſſed, decreeing the moſt rigorous chaſtiſements againſt all who ſhould moleſt any preacher for his ſermons, or diſturb him in any part of the divine ſervice. The like penalties were ordained for thoſe who ſhould profane the ſacrament, or pull down croſſes, crucifixes or images.

A bill preferred by the commons, rejected by the lords.

The commons alſo then ſent up another bill againſt thoſe who frequented not the church and ſacraments. But the lords thought not proper to go ſo far at once.

Soon after, the parliament revived a ſtatute of the preceding reign, forbiding any, to the number of twelve or more, to meet with deſign to alter the eſtabliſhed religion, and declaring the offenders guilty of felony, which is to ſay, meriting death. This act was directly contrary to that made by this very parliament, to repeal all new treaſons and felonies: but the cloke of religion covered all.

Act againſt aſſemblies, to alter the eſtabliſhed religion.

The duke of Norfolk's attainder reverſed.

In this ſeſſion, the act of attainder againſt the duke of Norfolk, in Henry's reign, was reverſed, on pretenſe that all the neceſſary formalities had not been obſerved.

Theſe were the moſt remarkable tranſactions of this firſt parliament, which, in few days, overturned all had been done with regard to religion in the reign of Edward VI. King Henry's laws were not yet to be touched, becauſe they had difficulties concerning which the Pope was firſt to be conſulted.

Jane Grey, Cranmer, and others attainted of high-treaſon. Burnet. Stow. Hollingſh. Strype.

The third of November (1), the parliament ſtill ſiting, Jane Grey, Guilford Dudley her huſband, two other ſons of the duke of Northumberland, and Cranmer archbiſhop of Canterbury, were brought to their trial. They all confeſſed their indictments, and received ſentence of death as traitors (2). Cranmer's ſentence rendered him incapable of poſſeſſing any benefice, and conſequently the ſee of Canterbury was void in law: but two reaſons obliged Mary to diſpenſe with the ordinary forms, and leave Cranmer, tho' condemned, in poſſeſſion of his dignity. The firſt was that, deſigning to reſtore the eccleſiaſtics to all their privileges, ſhe was reſolved this prelate ſhould be canonically degraded; but this could not be done 'till Henry VIII's ſtatutes were repealed. The ſecond was that, by a refinement of ſelf-love, ſhe was willing to pardon Cranmer his treaſon, to make the world believe that ſhe did not proſecute him from any motives of private revenge: but, at the ſame time, ſhe deſtined him to the faggot, as a heretic, as ſoon as any laws ſhould be made on that ſubject; as if ſhe only acted thro' pure zeal for religion. Therefore at preſent, the archbiſhop's revenues were only ſequeſtered, and himſelf detained in priſon 'till a proper ſeaſon for his diſpatch.

Commendone's negociations in England. Burnet.

Since Mary's acceſſion to the throne, ſhe had appeared to be wholly buſied in theſe public tranſactions. But at the ſame time, ſhe was forming ſecret deſigns which were not known, 'till ripe for execution. The news of King Edward's death was no ſooner ſpread in the world, than the court of Rome conceived hopes of re-uniting England to the Holy See, and even began to project it. Cardinal Dandini, the Pope's legate at Bruſſels, as of himſelf, ſent Commendone, afterwards cardinal, to ſound Mary's inclinations. Commendone being unknown in England, eaſily concealed himſelf under a borrowed name, and repairing to London obtained of the Queen a private audience (3). This was ſoon after her arrival in that city, ſince the envoy was preſent at the duke of Northumberland's execution, which was on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt. At this audience Mary told Commendone, ſhe deſigned the reſtoration of the Pontifical authority in England, and deſired him to intercede with his Holineſs to ſend over cardinal Pole as legate: but ſhe intimated to him, that the diſcovery of this ſecret would blaſt the deſign. The Pope communicating to the conſiſtory his intentions of ſending Pole into England, found at firſt great op-

The Emperor projects a marriage for his ſon Philip with Queen Mary.

At the ſame time, Charles V was projecting a match between his ſon Philip and Queen Mary. Gardiner was in the ſecret, whether it was originally moved by him, or was only communicated to him by the Emperor. However that be, this prelate neglected no indeavors to accompliſh it. The news of Pole's nomination to the legateſhip was equally diſagreeable to Charles and Gardiner. Commendone had doubtleſs divulged at Rome the queſtion put to him by Queen Mary, viz. if Pole might not have a diſpenſation to marry? This occaſioned a belief of its being her intention to marry him herſelf. The Emperor being thereof informed, and apprehenſive that Pole's preſenſe might obſtruct the deſign he was meditating, reſolved to uſe efforts to prevent this legation, or at leaſt to retard it as long as poſſible. On the other hand, Gardiner could not, without the utmoſt concern, think on the approach of Pole, who might intercept his views upon the See of Canterbury, and perhaps the ſmiles of his royal miſtreſs: and indeed there was danger that if this cardinal, who neither loved nor eſteemed him, ſhould inſinuate himſelf into the Queen's favor, as was very probable, he would imploy his credit to work his deſtruction. He was therefore to find ſome expedient to keep him at a diſtance, and none was more natural, than inſinuating to Mary, that this cardinal's zeal for the Holy See would prejudice the affairs of religion in England: that the people were firſt to be managed and perſuaded to acknowledge the Papal authority, to which they were extremely averſe: that beſide, Pole was not ſufficiently the Proteſtants enemy; and religion, in the preſent juncture, required to be conducted by other maxims than thoſe of his ſaid eminence. On the other ſide Charles, believing it his intereſt to keep Pole where he was, wrote in like terms to the Queen, and repreſented to her, that Pole would ruin her affairs be her intentions ever ſo good. In fine, he propoſed her marriage with his ſon, and ſupported his propoſal with ſuch reaſons as were apteſt to perſuade her. Above all, he ſet forth the neceſſity of a foreign power in reſtoring religion in England, or at leaſt of ſome alliance capable to inſpire terror into thoſe who ſhould oppoſe her deſigns: then an alliance with himſelf, Emperor and King of Spain, would doubtleſs be moſt to her advantage, as France, being in a condition to form projects in favor of the young Queen of Scots, who was to eſpouſe the Dauphin, was in intereſt concerned to raiſe and foment diſturbances in England. his marriage. Mean while, Pole was to be kept at a diſtance 'till the Queen's eſpouſals were accompliſhed; and this his Imperial Majeſty effected, firſt by his own authority, detaining him in his dominions; but afterwards he got the Queen to diſpatch a courier, notifying to him, that the intereſts of religion required a ſtop to his journey, becauſe the nation was not yet diſpoſed to acknowledge the Papal authority.

Mary I. An' 1553.

While the legate was thus detained in Germany or the Netherlands, he tried ſeveral times to obtain leave to purſue his journey, but ſtill in vain. He knew not to whom this uſage was owing, and perhaps was never fully informed. However, he by letters held a conſtant correſpondence with Queen Mary on the affairs of religion, but his counſels were ſecretly oppoſed either by the Emperor or Gardiner. It was his opinion, that laying aſide all ceremony, the kingdom ſhould immediately be reconciled to the Holy See. Gardiner, on the contrary, believed the marriage ought to be concluded before the reconciliation was mentioned, that the conſideration of ſuch a powerful alliance might awe thoſe who were inclined to ſtir. He thought Pole, and would have had others think him, a weak man, a ſhallow politician, and of no uſe in the cabinet. Pole, on the other hand, believed Gardiner a very improper perſon to direct the affairs of religion, becauſe, in his opinion, he relied too much on his intrigues and the arm of fleſh. Their mutual diſeſteem at length ended in open enmity.

Oppoſite counſels given the Queen by Pole and Gardiner.

Burnet. Vol. II. p. 260, 261.

The deſign of the Queen's marriage was not conducted with ſufficient ſecreſy, to keep it from the commons. They were ſo alarmed, that they ſent the ſpeaker with twenty of their members, to requeſt her Majeſty not to match with a foreigner. This convinced Mary that ſhe muſt not expect any farther ſupplies from the commons, if ſhe refuſed gratifying them in that point: but as ſhe had no ſuch intention, ſhe choſe to diſſolve the parliament. Gardiner improved this conjuncture, to the obtaining from the Emperor conditions which he could not otherwiſe have expected. He repreſented to him, that the Engliſh were ſo averſe to this marriage, that the worſt was to be feared, except he complied with two particulars abſolutely neceſſary. The firſt was, his conſent that the treaty of marriage ſhould contain terms ſo advantageous to England, as to ſilence the moſt zealous opponents. The ſecond was, his remiting conſiderable ſums to gain thoſe who would be wanted to curb the people, or who could moſt eaſily induce them to rebel. Charles, not doubting of Gardiner's zeal for his intereſt, approved the advice, and left it intirely to him to preſcribe the conditions of the marriage; and moreover promiſed to ſend over to England twelve hundred thouſand crowns, to be diſpoſed of as he ſaw requiſite (1). Theſe particulars were printed in a little book, in form of a petition to the Queen, by the Engliſh exiles at Straſburg. The author added farther, that Gardiner denied common juſtice, in the court of Chancery, to ſuch as would not ingage to ſecond the Queen's intentions.

Care was taken to fill the lower houſe with perſons abſolutely devoted to the court; ſo that only ſix members had the inclination or courage to oppoſe the deciſion made in favor of tranſubſtantiation (2).

The Emperor ſends embaſſadors to conclude the marriage. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 337. Godwin. Burnet. Strype.

Very early in the year 1554, a magnificent embaſſy arrived at London from Charles V, at the head whereof was count Egmont (1), to ſettle the marriage articles. The Queen intruſted Gardiner with the management of this negociation, or rather with drawing up the treaty, ſince, according to appearance, every thing material was agreed before the arrival of the embaſſadors. That able politician had a double deſign. The firſt was, to have ſuch conditions inſerted in the treaty, as the parliament might approve. The ſecond, to exclude the Spaniards from any ſhare in the adminiſtration. Charles was all compliance, doubtleſs in belief, that his ſon would find ways to elude obſervance of ſuch articles as ſhould lay him under too much reſtraint. To be convinced that this was his thought (2), let it only be conſidered, that ſo profound a politician as Charles V would never have parted with twelve hundred thouſand crowns, to procure for his ſon the empty title of King of England: for, in reality, the treaty, as will appear, promiſed him no more. In all probability, Gardiner was in a like ſentiment with that Monarch: but the buſineſs was to dazzle the parliament with conditions advantageous to the nation, for whoſe intereſts, tho' he affected great zeal, he was probably but little concerned for what might happen after his death. Mean while, he acquired a high reputation, the public aſcribing to his capacity and prudence the terms of this marriage, which ſeemed to ſecure England from all Philip's attempts. The principal articles of this treaty, which was ſigned the twelfth of January 1554, a few days after the embaſſadors arrived, were as follow:

The chief articles thereto relating. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 337, 393, 403.

That Philip, in virtue of this marriage, ſhould jointly with Queen Mary injoy the title of King of England, while the marriage ſubſiſted; ſaving always the rights, laws, privileges, and cuſtoms of England. It was likewiſe ſtipulated, that the Queen ſhould have the ſole diſpoſal of all revenues of the kingdom, the nomination to all imployments, offices and benefices, which ſhould be confered on the natural ſubjects of her Majeſty, and no others.

That the Queen ſhould alſo bear the titles appertaining to the King her conſort.

That her dowry ſhould be ſixty thouſand florins, forty gros each, of which forty thouſand ſhould be aſſigned her upon Spain, and twenty thouſand upon Brabant, Flanders, Hainault, and Holland. That ſhe ſhould injoy this dowry in the ſame manner it was injoyed by Margaret, ſiſter of Edward IV, and wife of Charles duke of Burgundy.

That the children born of this marriage ſhould inherit their mother's eſtate, according to the cuſtom of the reſpective countries.

With regard to the father's eſtate, it was agreed, that the archduke Charles, ſon of Philip, ſhould ſucceed to the kingdoms of Spain, Naples, Sicily, the duchy of Milan, and all other properties and domains ſituate in Lombardy or Italy; but in default of Charles and his iſſue, the eldeſt ſon of Philip and Mary ſhould ſucceed to the ſame ſovereignties.

MARY I. AN' 1554.

That the firſt born of Philip and Mary ſhould inherit Burgundy and the Netherlands, from which the archduke Charles ſhould be excluded, as the children of Philip and Mary were excluded from Spain and Italy.

That the younger ſons and daughters of Mary and Philip ſhould have their appenages and portions aſſigned them in England, without prejudice however to what they might expect from Philip, their father, or Charles V, their grandfather, in the Netherlands or Burgundy.

That in caſe only daughters proceeded from this marriage, the eldeſt ſhould ſucceed to Burgundy and the Netherlands, provided that, with the conſent of the Infante Charles, her brother, ſhe married any perſon out of theſe countries, or the dominions of the Queen her mother. That, on her refuſal or neglect to perform this covenant, Prince Charles ſhould preſerve his right to the ſaid countries, with obligation however to aſſign his ſiſter a portion both from Spain and the Netherlands.

That if Prince Charles died iſſueleſs, the eldeſt ſon or daughter of Philip and Mary ſhould ſucceed as well to Spain and Italy, as the other dominions.

Laſtly, it was expreſly agreed, that in all the abovementioned caſes, thoſe children who ſhould ſucceed to either the paternal or maternal eſtates, ſhould leave them poſſeſſed of all laws, rights, privileges and cuſtoms belonging to the reſpective countries, and ſhould adminiſter the government by only natives of the ſaid domains.

Clauſe annexed to the Treaty.

By this clauſe it was expreſly ſtipulated, that, before conſummation of the marriage, Philip ſhould ſolemnly ſwear to the obſervance of the ſubſequent articles: viz.

That he would not retain any domeſtic, who was not either a native of England, or otherwiſe the Queen's ſubject, nor introduce any foreigner to give uneaſineſs to the Engliſh. That if any of his retinue tranſgreſſed this article, he ſhould be puniſhed in ſuch manner as ſhould be thought convenient.

That Philip would make no alteration in the laws, rights, ſtatutes, and cuſtoms of England.

That he would never take the Queen out of her own dominions, except at her own particular requeſt; nor carry out of England any of the children born of this marriage, without conſent of the nobility.

That if the Queen ſhould die firſt, without iſſue, he would pretend to no right upon England or its dependencies, but leave the ſucceſſion to the rightful heir.

That he would not carry out of the kingdom any jewels, or other things of much value; nor alienate any of the crown's appurtenances, nor ſuffer the ſame to be alienated by any perſon whatſoever.

That England ſhould not ever, by virtue of this marriage, be concerned directly or indirectly in any war depending between France and Spain; but that the alliance between England and France ſhould ſubſiſt and remain in full force.

That he would not give any occaſion of rupture between France and England.

Remark on this treaty.

It would not be a very eaſy matter to comprehend what advantages could accrue to England from this marriage, if the intereſts of the Sovereign and miniſtry were not commonly confounded with thoſe of the kingdom, tho' frequently quite oppoſite. The court had in view the reſtoration of the Popiſh creed in England, and therefore believed they needed Spain's aſſiſtance. On the other hand, this marriage was advantageous to the chancellor, who ſecured his credit by Philip's protection. But at the ſame time England ran a great riſk of becoming ſubject to Philip, whoſe meaning it doubtleſs was not to be bound with chains of parchment.

The day after this treaty was ſigned, Queen Mary granted a pardon to the marquis of Northampton, who had been condemned with the duke of Northumberland.

Queen Mary ſuſpends the act againſt the German merchants. Ib. p. 364.

It was obſerved that, towards the cloſe of Edward VI's reign, the court had taken meaſures to prevent the company of German merchants, named The Still-yard Men, from ingroſſing the whole woolen trade, in prejudice to the Engliſh, as thitherto had been practiſed. For this purpoſe the parliament had laid a heavy duty on goods exported or imported by that company; and this act was renewed in Mary's firſt parliament. But, in the begining of this year, her Majeſty, to gratify the Hanſe towns, ſuſpended the execution of theſe acts for three years, and diſcharged the company of German merchants from payment of the extraordinary taxes impoſed on them, "all acts to the "contrary notwithſtanding." This was the firſt effect of Mary's alliance with the Emperor.

Murmurs againſt the Queen's marriage. Godwin. Burnet.

After the treaty of the Queen's marriage with Philip was made public, complaints and murmurs were every where heard. The Proteſtants in particular believed themſelves loſt, as dreading they were ſoon to ſee erected in England a Spaniſh inquiſition: but they were not the only murmurers. Independently of religion, the generality of people could not but apprehend King Philip's introducing into England the Spaniſh tyranny, whereof both the Indies, the Netherlands, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the duchy of Milan, afforded recent inſtances. In a word, few perſons could believe that his Imperial Majeſty had agreed to the articles ſtipulated in the treaty, with any deſign to obſerve them. At laſt, theſe murmurs grew into a conſpiracy againſt the Queen, of which the marriage was either the cauſe or pretenſe. The duke of Suffolk, ſir Thomas Wyat, and ſir Peter Carew formed the deſign of a general inſurrection. Carew was to act in Cornwal, Wyat in Kent, and the duke of Suffolk in Warwickſhire, which is in the center of England.

Wyat's conſpiracy. Godwin. Burnet. Stow. Hollingſh.

Carew managed ſo ill, that his practiſes were diſcovered, and one of his accomplices ſeized before he had concerted his affairs. This drove him away to France, and Wyat on his flight haſtened the execution of his enterpriſe, tho' it was the conſpirators intention to wait the arrival of Philip for a more plauſible color to their inſurrection. Wyat therefore reſolving to puſh his point, tho' he was yet unprepared, went with a few followers to Maidſtone, and gave out, that he took arms to prevent England's being invaded. Next he marched to Rocheſter, whence he wrote to the ſheriff to deſire his aſſiſtance: but that magiſtrate, inſtead of eſpouſing his cauſe, required him to deſiſt, and aſſembled forces to oppoſe his progreſs.

This rebellion alarmed the court, where nothing was ready to diſperſe it, the Queen having diſmiſſed her forces when ſhe thought herſelf free from farther danger. Wherefore ſhe ſent a herald to Wyat with a full pardon, if he would lay down his arms in twenty-four hours: but this gracious offer he refuſed. Mean time, the court was ſo unprepared, that the duke of Norfolk was ſent with only ſix hundred of the London militia (1), commanded by a certain officer named Bret. While this paſſed, the ſheriff of Kent, as he was going to join the duke of Norfolk, met and defeated Knevet, who with ſome troops was marching to join Wyat, and killed ſixty of his men. This ill ſucceſs ſo alarmed Wyat, that he had already reſolved to conſult his own ſafety (2), when a very unexpected accident inſpired him with freſh courage. Sir George Harper, one of Wyat's adherents, pretending to deſert him, went to the duke of Norfolk, and intrigued ſo artfully with his London trained-bands, that they declared for the rebels, and quiting the duke joined Wyat (3).

Godwin. Burnet. Stow. Hollingſh.

With this reinforcement, and his other troops, making together a body four thouſand ſtrong, Wyat marched away for London; near Deptford he met two meſſengers from the Queen. Theſe, in her name, aſked what would content him. He demanded the Tower and the Queen's perſon to be put into his hands, and the council to be changed and new modeled as he ſhould judge proper. This demand being rejected, the Queen repaired to Guild-Hall, and acquainted the magiſtrates with Wyat's reply. She then ſpake of her marriage, and told them, ſhe had done nothing in it but by the advice of her council: and, to give them a proof of the confidence ſhe repoſed in them, ſhe reſolved to ſtay in the city, tho' many adviſed her to withdraw to the Tower.

Mean while Wyat purſuing his march, arrived at the borough of Southwark, the third of February, expecting to enter the city without difficulty. But the bridge being ſtrongly baricaded and guarded, he was obliged to march along the Thames to Kingſton, ten miles from London. Here he found the bridge broken, and imployed ſome hours in repairing it. He then paſſed to the other ſide with his army, increaſed now to near ſix thouſand. After that, he continued his march to London, and, after ſome time loſt in mending one of his broken carriages, reached Hyde-Park about nine in the forenoon, the ſeventh of February. The time unſeaſonably loſt about the ſaid carriage rendered abortive his enterpriſe: for in that interval Harper, who had been ſo ſerviceable to bring over the trained-bands, deſerted, and poſting to court, diſcovered his intentions to march thro' Weſtminſter, and enter the city by Ludgate. This intelligence came very opportunely to the earl of Pembroke and lord Clinton who, at the head of a few companies, had reſolved to ingage him as he entered the city: but obſerving he was intangling himſelf in the ſtreets where he could not extend his troops, they thought it better to let him paſs, after orders given to ſhut the gate thro' which he deſigned to enter.

loſt all courage. As he was indeavoring to return, a herald came to him, and exhorting him not to ſacrifice ſo many mens lives, he ſurrendered quietly, and was ſent to priſon. This unhappy gentleman, who doubtleſs was no very great genius, fooliſhly imagined, without having good aſſurances, that the city of London would declare in his favor; and this proved his deſtruction. Had his meaſures been better taken, the Queen and her miniſters would have been ſtrangely imbaraſſed at a juncture when the government, weak as it was, had already created numbers of male-contents. But the ill ſucceſs of this enterpriſe ſo ſtrengthened Mary's authority, that thenceforward ſhe met with no more reſiſtance. While Wyat was acting in Kent and London, the duke of Suffolk had made but ſlender progreſs in Warwickſhire. He would not have been even ſuſpected, had not a letter been ſeized, ſent him by Wyat, to inform him of the reaſons which had obliged him to expedite the execution of his undertaking, and to requeſt his being as expeditious as poſſible. Upon this advice, the earl of Huntington had orders to arreſt him. The duke had thereof information, and being not yet ſecure of fifty horſe, he choſe to conceal himſelf in the houſe of one of his domeſtics, who baſely betrayed and delivered him to the earl of Huntington, by whom he was conveyed to the Tower, the eleventh of February. Such was the ſucceſs of this conſpiracy. Had it been managed by abler heads, it might have been attended with better conſequences: but few men of reputation cared to put themſelves under the conduct of ſuch leaders. If it had cauſed only the death of the principal actors, they might have been ſaid to meet the juſt reward of their folly. But it produced two conſiderable effects, one fatal to a moſt noble and innocent perſon, and the other, to all Proteſtants: not that religion had any ſhare in the combination, Wyat himſelf being a Roman Catholic, and the Queen in her proclamation not accuſing the Proteſtants, tho' ſince ſome hiſtorians have been pleaſed to brand them. But as the Queen's authority was corroborated by the ill ſucceſs of this undertaking, ſhe turned it intirely to the ruin of the Reformed, and the reformation. The duke of Suffolk being concerned in the conſpiracy, the court readily conſtrued it, that his deſign was to replace his daughter Jane, on the throne, and this determined Mary to ſacrifice that lady to her own ſafety.

Execution of Jane Grey, her huſband, and father. Godwin. Burnet. Stow. Hollingsh.

Two days after taking Wyat, a meſſage was ſent to Jane Grey and her huſband to bid them prepare for death. Jane, as ſhe had long expected it, received the meſſage with great reſolution. Mean while, doctor Feckam who brought it, and had orders to exhort her to change her religion, prepoſterouſly imagining ſhe deſired ſome time to be determined, obtained three days reſpite of her execution: but ſhe gave him to underſtand it was not to her any manner of ſatisfaction. She was well aſſured, the government's jealouſy would not ſuffer her to live, and therefore ſhe had imployed the whole time of her confinement in preparing for death. Some have believed that, without this laſt attempt of the duke of Suffolk, Mary would have ſpared his daughter: but as afterwards ſuch numbers were butchered on account of religion, it is not likely that Jane, ſo firmly attached to the Proteſtant belief, would have been more mercifully uſed than the reſt, even tho' the Queen could have prevailed with herſelf to pardon her treaſon. However all this might have happened, ſhe was executed the twelfth of February, after having beheld the headleſs trunk of her huſband paſs by her as he was brought back from execution to be interred in the Tower-chapel. She evidenced to her lateſt moment a ſingular conſtancy and piety, and immoveable adherence to the reformation, owning however herſelf guilty of a great ſin, in accepting a crown which appertained not to her. Her father, the duke of Suffolk, was tried the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, and executed the twenty-firſt, with the mortifying regret of having occaſioned the death of his daughter.

Next, Wyat was brought to his trial, where he offered to make great diſcoveries if his life might be ſpared. He accuſed even Princeſs Elizabeth, and the earl of Devonſhire, as concerned in his conſpiracy. This prevented not his condemnation, but only gained him a two months reſpite, in hope of drawing from him conſiderable diſcoveries. Mean time the earl of Devonſhire was commited to the Tower, and Princeſs Elizabeth, tho' indiſpoſed, was brought to London, and cloſely confined in White-Hall, without liberty of ſpeaking to any. On the eleventh of March following, ſhe was ſent to the Tower.

The fourteenth and fifteenth of February, Bret, commander of Wyat's forces, and fifty-eight more, were hanged. Some days after, ſix hundred priſoners, with halters about their necks, appeared before the Queen, and were pardoned: but this clemency effaced not the impreſſion made in peoples minds at ſight of ſo many executions done on men not guilty of any blood-ſhed. The whole blame was thrown on Gardiner, who was charged with puſhing on Mary to be exceſſively jealous of her authority, and to the utmoſt extremities of ſeverity. A certain affair happened at the ſame time, which alſo greatly alarmed and inſpired the people with apprehenſions of the Queen's intending to rule with too extenſive a power. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton being accuſed, and tried as concerned in the rebellion, was by his jury acquited, for want of ſufficient proof to condemn him; for which they were rigorouſly fined. Thus were juries deprived of the liberty of judging according to their conſciences, and inſtead of being governed by proofs, they were to examine how the court ſtood affected towards priſoners, and thereby determine their verdict. This ſeverity to the jury proved fatal to ſir John Throgmorton, who was found guilty on the ſame evidence whereon his brother had been acquited.

The reſpite granted Wyat had a quite different effect from what the court expected. This unhappy man, who had accuſed Princeſs Elizabeth and the earl of Devonſhire only in hope of a pardon, finding he muſt die, fully cleared them in his ſecond examination: and for fear his laſt declaration ſhould be ſuppreſſed, he renewed it at the place of execution. As there was no other proof againſt them, and their accuſer himſelf had acquited them with his laſt breath, no proceſs could be formed againſt them, tho' Gardiner paſſionately deſired the death of lady Elizabeth: nay, there is abundance of probability that Mary herſelf would gladly have conſented to it, could ſhe have ſupported her rigor with any color of juſtice (1).

Mary's orders againſt the married prelates. Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 376.

The diſturbances occaſioned by Wyat's conſpiracy being intirely appeaſed, Queen Mary reſumed her firſt deſign of utterly deſtroying the reformation. Tho' to effect this the authority of parliament was neceſſary, ſhe failed not anticipating the project by her own authority, in virtue of her ſupremacy, which ſhe held in deteſtation, and yet made no ſcruple to uſe it againſt the Proteſtants! For this purpoſe, ſhe gave inſtructions to the biſhops to viſit their reſpective dioceſes. Their inſtructions, which were of Gardiner's pening, contained a moſt virulent detail of all the pretended diſorders introduced into the church during King Edward's reign. She afterwards gave the chancellor a particular order to purge Holy mother church of all married eccleſiaſtics.

Four biſhops deprived: Rym. Fœd. Vol. XV. p. 370.

Some days after, the Queen granted a ſpecial commiſſion to Gardiner, and five others, to deprive four prelates who had wives, viz. the archbiſhop of York, the biſhops of St. Davids, Cheſter and Briſtol, and all in actual confinement. Two days after, the ſame commiſſioners were ordered to deprive the biſhops of Lincoln, Gloceſter, and Hereford, for preaching erroneous doctrines, and having otherwiſe mis-behaved. The pretenſe to deprive theſe biſhops, by a bare order of the Queen, on account of mis-behavior, was taken from the letters patent of King Edward, in which it was provided, that they ſhould hold their biſhopricks ſo long only as they behaved well, and therefore it was no injuſtice to deprive them, ſince their conduct was diſpleaſing. This was the pretenſe; but the true reaſon was, the court's deſire to fill theſe Sees with their creatures, before the parliament aſſembled. As to the inferior clergy, Burnet pretends that, of ſixteen thouſand then in England, twelve thouſand were turned out for having wives: and indeed, in Rymer, we meet with multitudes of preſentations to livings, which ſufficiently manifeſt the alterations made in the church. Mean time, in conſequence of the act of parliament, the maſs was every where reſtored, with the liturgy uſed towards the cloſe of Henry VIII's reign. Diſpoſition of the commons of this new parliament.

The court's diligence to have a parliament at their beck was no leſs in this than it had been in the preceding year: nay, it was ſo much more ſucceſful, as Gardiner had money in his hands to gain the electors and repreſentatives. The miniſtry had a double deſign; the firſt, to have the Queen's marriage approved; the ſecond, to reſtore the Pope's authority. For the firſt, it was not ſufficient to have repreſentatives well inclined to the intended alterations in religion; it was farther requiſite, they ſhould be little zealous for the good of their country, ſince the Queen's marriage put England in evident danger of becoming one day a province to Spain. For the ſecond, it was neceſſary, not only that a great majority of the lower houſe's members ſhould be convinced the Romiſh doctrines were verities, but alſo ſhould be Papiſts in reality; i. e. perſuaded that religion could not ſubſiſt without a Pope. Now thoſe of this opinion were not very numerous among the Roman Catholics. There were abundantly more who, believing tranſubſtantiation, invocation of ſaints, adoration of images, &c. were however perſuaded, that Pontifical government was not any way neceſſary to the church, and were very well ſatisfied at its being aboliſhed. To get returned perſons proper for the court's deſigns, or to gain thoſe who were not ſo compliant, it was that Gardiner imployed all his intereſt with the Emperor and Queen to promiſe penſions, &c. This was tranſacted with ſo little caution and ſecreſy, that it was publicly known what penſions were aſſigned to a good number of the members. The parliament meeting, tho' Mary ſometimes found oppoſition, yet was ſhe often obliged to check the commons, ſo impetuous was generally their zeal to gratify her in all ſhe propoſed.

Act to confirm her Majeſty's rights. Burnet.

The firſt act paſſed in this ſeſſion gave occaſion to many reflections: but its drift remained a ſecret 'till long after, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when a certain perſon, appriſed thereof, diſcovered it to the earl of Leiceſter. The bill was brought in by the ſpeaker. It imported, "That, as the "laws declarative of the royal prerogatives had "been made in favor of Kings, it might be pre-"tended that the Queen had not thereto any right; "it was therefore declared: that theſe prerogatives "appertained to the crown, whether it was poſ-"ſeſſed by male or female: and whatſoever the "law did limit or appoint for the King, was of "right alſo due to the Queen, who was declared "to have as much authority as any of her proge-"nitors." This bill occaſioned ſome debates in the houſe of commons. Some feared that the pretenſe of ſecuring to the Queen her juſt rights, covered a deſign of inlarging them beyond their juſt bounds, and that the laſt clauſe, that ſhe had "as "much authority as any of her progenitors," might incourage her to exerciſe the ſame power as William the Conqueror, who ſpoiled the Engliſh of their lands, to beſtow them on foreigners. The Queen's marriage with the Prince of Spain ſtill increaſed this ſuſpicion, by the fear of having a deſpotic government, like that of Spain, introduced into England. It was therefore judged proper to alter the words of this act, in ſuch manner as they ſhould ſecure to the Queen all her legal rights, without giving her opportunity to uſurp ſuch as were not ſo. The court found no fault with this correction. Gardiner, who promoted the bill, had no intention to make the Queen abſolute, but to prevent Philip from ſeizing the government, on pretenſe of ſex. The example of Henry VII furniſhed a juſt cauſe of apprehenſion. That Prince had at firſt no pretenſion to the crown, but what flowed from his promiſe of eſpouſing Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV: nevertheleſs, when he thought himſelf ſufficiently able, he reſolved to reign in his own right, as heir to the houſe of Lancaſter. Philip might have done the like, as deſcended from the ſame houſe. So that here Gardiner conſulted at once the intereſt of the nation, and his own. It was the nation's intereſt, that Philip ſhould not have any opportunity of ſeizing the government. Gardiner's likewiſe required the ſame; but if Philip ſhould once become maſter of England, the adminiſtration of affairs would probably be put into the hands of Spaniards, and conſequently Gardiner be excluded. In a word, the true occaſion of Gardiner's bill was this: a certain perſon had contrived a model of government, according to which the Queen was to declare herſelf a Conqueror; or assert that, as she acceded to the crown by common right, she was not bound by the laws which limited the regal power, because these restrictions were made for Kings and not Queens. This plan was communicated to the Imperial embassador, who put it into the Queen's hands, and desired her to peruse it attentively. The Queen doubtless read, and then delivered it to her chancellor, to examine it and thereon give her his sentiments. He thereby discovered the Spaniards drift, and set before her Majesty the consequences and peril of following, or even listening to such counsels. In a word, he so managed her, that she threw the project into the fire. It was not without reason that Gardiner began to be alarmed with respect to the Spaniards. Beside, that such schemes as this gave him just cause to suspect them of some design upon the liberties of England, there was another particular which confirmed this suspicions. This was, the Spaniards had studiously published a genealogy of Philip, which derived him from a daughter of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, and son of Edward III. Gardiner therefore thought it high time to break the Spanish measures; and this he undertook to do by the fore-mentioned act: but he took singular care not to be known for the author, for fear of losing Philip's favor (1).

The duke of Suffolk's sentence, and the marriage treaty confirmed. Burnet.

The sentence against the duke of Suffolk, and the fifty-eight persons executed for the late rebellion, was likewise confirmed.

Lastly, the parliament approved the treaty of marriage between the Queen and Philip. But as Gardiner began to dread the Spaniards, he so ordered, that the parliament, in approving the treaty, more clearly explained and inlarged the articles, by which the realm's government was declared to belong to the Queen only.

No more was desired of the parliament in this session (2). Had the lower house's zeal to please the court been indulged, many rigorous acts against the reformation and the Reformed would have passed: but, by direction from court, the peers threw out such bills on that subject as were sent up by the commons. Undoubtedly, the ministers judged it not proper to commence a persecution before the Queen's marriage was accomplished, lest some unforeseen accident should retard the Prince of Spain's arrival. For this reason the parliament was dissolved (3) the twenty-fifth of May, Mary's principal desire, the approbation of her marriage, being obtained.

Dispute at Oxford between the Popish and Protestant clergy. Fox. Godwin. Burnet. Strype.

At the end of this session of parliament, the court thought proper to interrupt the convocation, in order for a new conference to be held at Oxford, touching the eucharist. The Protestants loudly complained of the treatment they had met with, in the dispute held at London. Hence was occasion taken to spread for them a new snare, by appointing another disputation at Oxford, in presence of the whole university, as if more justice was intended them, but this was in effect only to give them a fresh mortification. Had the court's meaning been to have acted with candor, they would never have chosen, as they did, for managers of the dispute on the Protestants side, Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, all prisoners in the Tower, and the two first, indisputably the ablest and most learned men of their party: but as it was resolved to confound them otherwise than by reasons and arguments, pleasure was taken in exposing these three great prelates to the insults of their enemies. They were therefore removed to Oxford, to dispute against some of the Romish clergy, at the head of whom was Weston, prolocutor of the lower-house of convocation. This disputation or conference was managed like the former at London. The three Protestant bishops were forced to be silent, by reason of the continual interruptions and noises which hindered them from being heard, whence it was infered they were vanquished. Such as are curious to see the particulars of this dispute, may find them in the history of the reformation of England. But barely to mortify these bishops was not thought sufficient: the dispute, which lasted three days, being ended, they were summoned to abjure their pretended errors, and, on their refusal, excommunicated.

The Prince of Spain's arrival. Godwin. Burnet. Stow. Fox.

Prince Philip being informed that nothing now retarded the accomplishment of his marriage, left Corunna, the 16th of July, and arrived the 19th at Southampton (4). At his landing he drew his sword, and carried it naked some time. This mysterious action was variously interpreted. Some said he thereby devoted his sword to England's defense. Others believed, that he intimated to the English by this action, that he intended to govern them by the sword. The magistrates of Southampton presenting him with the keys of their town, he both received and returned them without uttering a syllable. This gravity disgusted the English, accustomed to be treated more affably by their Sovereigns. The Queen met him at Winchester, where Gardiner married them the 25th of July. The same day they were proclaimed King and Queen of England, France, Naples, Jerusalem, and by many other Titles (5). The Emperor had lately made a present to his son of the kingdoms of Naples and Jerusalem. Philip's age was twenty seven, and Mary's thirty eight. Many Chests of Bullion (6), brought by Philip, were landed. This was doubtless the whole, or great part of the twelve hundred-thousand crowns which Charles V promised to remit over to England, but which he was not disposed to part with before the marriage was ascertained. This infused fresh zeal into those whom Gardiner had already gained to Mary's interest (7).

ceeded Mary, her own Intereſt would lead her to ſubvert whatever ſhould be done, as to religion, under the preſent reign; beſide, it was known that, notwithſtanding all her caution, ſhe was moſt cordially a Proteſtant. Now, as it was reſolved to proſecute the Reformed, there was ſome room to fear diſturbances, under color of aſſerting her rights. The Queen herſelf was not far from Gardiner's ſentiments; but Philip interceded for the Princeſs, and delivered her from that peril. This was, doubtleſs, at firſt from a motive of generoſity. It has been pretended that policy had afterwards a great ſhare in the preſervation of this Princeſs, and two ſeveral reaſons are aſſigned. Firſt, it is ſaid that, when he had no longer hopes of iſſue by his Queen, he reflected that, if Elizabeth died before Mary, the crown of England would devolve to the Scotiſh Queen, who would tranſmit this rich inheritance to the Dauphin of France. It is indeed true that, by Henry VIII's will, the Queen of Scots could not claim the Engliſh crown, 'till after the dutcheſs of Suffolk's poſterity: but there was no likelihood the Dauphin would regard this will; and he might happen to join the crowns of England and Ireland to thoſe of France and Scotland, which could not but be prejudicial to the Houſe of Auſtria. The ſecond reaſon which, as ſome pretend, induced Philip to ſave Elizabeth was, his hope to marry her, if Mary died firſt. Beſides Princeſs Elizabeth, ſome other Perſons obtained their pardon by Philip's interceſſion; namely, nine knights, and the archbiſhop of York. It is preſumed, this prelate was not firm to his religion, becauſe all the reſt who were releaſed were men who ſuited their religion to the times: probably, they had been ingaged in Wyat's or lady Jane's cauſe; moreover the archbiſhop of York was ſuffered to live unmoleſted during the reſidue of this reign.

Mary's third parliament met, the 11th of November, diſpoſed as the court could wiſh (1). The money brought from Spain produced ſuch effects, that moſt of the repreſentatives only wanted occaſions to ſignaliſe their zeal for her Majeſty. The court was thereof ſo ſenſible, that without any law yet made to reſtore the Papal authority, two noblemen were ſent to receive cardinal Pole as legate, and bring him over into England. One of theſe was lord Paget, who, having been a principal friend and confident of the duke of Somerſet, and one of that protector's inſtruments to eſtabliſh the reformation in King Edward's reign, was nominated in this of Mary to receive his Beatitude's legate (2): ſuch alteration had a new reign produced amongſt the nobility. While the legate in Flanders was preparing for his voyage, an act paſſed in parliament to repeal his attainder in the reign of Henry VIII. Pole arrived the twenty-fourth of November, and after communicating his inſtructions to the King and Queen, he laid before them, and both houſes of Parliament ſent for to that purpoſe, the occaſion of his legation. This, he ſaid, was to bring back to the fold of Chriſt the ſheep which were gone aſtray: that the Pope, who held on earth the place of Sovereign Paſtor, was ready to receive them; and therefore he exhorted the Engliſh to imbrace this occaſion, at once ſo favorable and ſo felicitous. Queen Mary, who had paſſionately longed to ſee his Sanctity's authority reſtored in England, was ſo moved on this occaſion, that ſhe fancied ſhe felt a child ſtir in her womb. This news was immediately publiſhed in all places, and even by order of council (3), Te Deum was ſung at St. Paul's. Some flatterers ſpared not ſaying, that as John Baptiſt leaped in his mother's womb at the ſalutation of the Virgin, ſo here, a happy omen followed on the ſalutation from Chriſt's vicar ſpeaking by the mouth of his legate. The Queen's women, who ſaw her ſo fond of her imaginary conception, humored her in this belief, 'till the middle of the ſucceeding year, when, to her exceſſive mortification, ſhe was convinced of her miſtake.

Thereupon, the legate came to the parliament, and in a long ſpeech inlarged on his Beatitude's affection and tenderneſs for the kingdom of England, and the extraordinary favors which in every age this nation had received from the Holy See. Then he injoined for penance the repeal of all the laws made againſt the Pontifical authority, and, granting full abſolution, which was received by both houſes on their knees, abſolved alſo the realm from all cenſures and interdictions.

Burnet. Vol. III. p. 231.

The Pope firſt gave Pole a general power, which was not, however, deemed ſufficient to remove the uneaſineſs of the perſons concerned. Afterwards he ſent him another, authoriſing him, "to tranſact "with the poſſeſſors of church-lands for the rents "they had illegally received, and for the move- "ables they had conſumed; in reſtoring firſt, if "the legate thought proper, the lands they unjuſtly "poſſeſſed." This clauſe "in reſtoring firſt, if "the legate thought proper," had a very equivocal meaning. It might ſignify, that the legate had liberty to oblige the poſſeſſors to reſtitution, or to diſpenſe with it; or elſe, that he had power to tranſact with them for the received rents before or after reſtitution of the lands. Very ſeemingly, his Sanctity underſtood this clauſe in the latter ſenſe, but was deſirous of giving room for a belief of his taking it in the former.

This power appearing to Charles V and the Engliſh court inſufficient, the Pope gave a third, no leſs equivocal, and which, under a heap of general terms, contained certain reſtrictions which left him free to act afterwards as he ſhould judge requiſite: for his preſent buſineſs was to amuſe both the parliament and the poſſeſſors of thoſe lands, in giving them a ſeeming ſatisfaction. This latter power ran:

Burnet, Vol. III. p. 232.

"That whereas before, he had given power to his "legate to tranſact with the poſſeſſors of the "church's goods, and to diſcharge them from the "rents they had unjuſtly received, or the move- "ables they had waſted; nevertheleſs, to the end "that the intire reduction of England might be- "come ſo much the more eaſy, by the greater "hopes of condeſcenſion and compliance given "on this occaſion by his Beatitude (unwilling "as he was to keep back the great work of "the ſalvation of ſo many ſouls, by any human "conſiderations, and deſirous to imitate the good "father going out to meet the prodigal ſon) he "gave power to his legate, agreeably to the con- "fidence he in him repoſed, to tranſact and agree, "by authority of the Holy See, with the poſſeſ- "ſors of the church's goods, for whom the Queen "ſhould intercede, and to give them a diſpenſation "for the future injoyment thereof; with reſer- "vation nevertheleſs of ſuch things, wherein, for "their greatneſs and importance, he ſhould think "fit to conſult the Holy See, for its concurrence "and confirmation."

This concluſive power, far from correcting what was defective in the former, was ſtill more ambiguous and uſeleſs. Firſt, for the word TRANSACT, which was in the firſt power, and remained likewiſe in this, it is manifeſt, that the Holy Father did not thereby mean a bare acquieſcence of his legate to a poſſeſſion deemed unjuſt, and that, on this occaſion, a tranſaction imported at leaſt ſome previous reparation to be made to the church. But for fear the term TRANSACT ſhould not be ſufficiently expreſſive, his Sanctity added in this laſt power the term AGREE, which evidently ſhewed in what ſenſe he would have this tranſaction underſtood. Wherefore the bare acquieſcence of the legate was uſeleſs, ſince he thereby exceeded his power, which was to Tranſact and Agree. Secondly, under theſe terms Future Injoyment, lay couched a notorious equivocation, ſince the Future might imply either a perpetual or a temporary injoyment. Thirdly, the legate could grant a diſpenſation for the injoyment of theſe lands but to thoſe for whom the Queen interceded; ſo that the Queen might chuſe whether ſhe would intercede for any perſon: nay, it is very likely ſhe would have ſcrupled it, ſince, as will appear, ſhe herſelf made reſtitution of all ſuch lands as were in her poſſeſſion. Fourthly, all the legate could do on this occaſion, was inſignificant without confirmation from his Holineſs, who could revoke it, ſo that the legate's power was only proviſional. Laſtly, the obligation to conſult the Holy See in matters of importance, was likewiſe a dubious expreſſion, obnoxious to endleſs cavils.

MARY I. AN' 1554.

Pope Julius III died before he was informed of the ſucceſs of this affair. But if we judge of him by the terms of the power granted to his legate, he acted with no ſincerity, and his ſucceſſor flatly refuſed confirming the legate's acquieſcence. It was therefore a manifeſt fraud put upon the poſſeſſors of church-lands, ſince, according to the canon law, they could thereby acquire no juſt title. On the other hand, they could poſſeſs them with a ſafe conſcience, ſince the legate, at the very inſtant he conſented to their injoyment of theſe lands, denounced the judgments of God ready to fall on their heads. It will perhaps be interrogated, how the Engliſh could ſuffer themſelves to be impoſed on by ſo palpable a deluſion? To this may be replied: Firſt, that the King and Queen, being in the ſame ſentiments with the Roman court, aſſiſted the deceit as much as poſſible, and the parliament, corrupted with Spaniſh gold, ſeemed not to ſee what they ſaw. Secondly, very ſeemingly, the legate's powers were ſhewn only to their ſaid Majeſties, who therewith appeared ſatisfied, and the parliament, without examining theſe powers, preſumed the legate ſufficiently authoriſed. I have ſomewhat inlarged on this ſubject, becauſe it is now very material, and poſſibly may be more ſo hereafter. The Engliſh may ſee by this, not only how impoſſible it is the court of Rome ſhould have acted with ſincerity in this affair, but that, tho' a Pope ſhould have the beſt intentions towards the poſſeſſors of the church-lands, his conſent would be inſignificant: his ſucceſſors might always ſay, with ſome foundation, that he had exceeded the limits of his power. However this be, the poſſeſſors were, or ſeemed to be ſatisfied, and the rather becauſe the parliament made a law which, in ſome meaſure, diſpeled the fears of thoſe concerned. This law imported, that whoever ſhould diſturb the ſubjects, in their poſſeſſion of any lands or goods once appertaining to the church, on pretenſe of any eccleſiaſtical authority, ſhould incur a Præmunire.

Act made to renew the old ſtatute againſt heretics. Statutes. Burnet.

The reconciliation thus accompliſhed, and the government become intirely Popiſh, the parliament paſſed an act to revive the Statutes of Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V, againſt heretics (1). The commons were ſo haſty that, had their zeal been indulged, they would have finiſhed at once what the court deſired ſhould be effected gradually. They brought in ſeveral bills, which were rejected by the lords, for fear of alarming the Proteſtants, and driving them to deſpair. But the commons were in a manner indifferent as to what became of their bills, since whether approved or rejected, their zeal for the Queen was conſpicuouſly manifeſt. This was the real aim of their whole procedure.

Afterwards an act was made by way of ſupplement to the ſtatute of treaſons and felonies. It was in Philip's favor this act was renewed, by which, if any perſon aſſerted, that Philip had no right to the title of King of England, during his marriage with the Queen, he was to be ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment, and to forfeit all his goods: moreover, that Prince having conſented to take upon him the guardianſhip of the children he might have by his conſort, and to govern the kingdom for a ſon, 'till he was eighteen, and for a daughter, till fifteen; it was alſo inacted, that conſpiring his death during that time, ſhould be treaſon. It was likewiſe death, by another act, for any to pray, that God would turn the Queen's heart from idolatry, or ſhorten her days.

The court conſults what meaſures were propereſt to be taken againſt the Proteſtants. Burnet.

The ſtatutes againſt heretics were no ſooner revived, than the court took into conſideration how to reduce them. Their number was great, and indiſputably far ſurpaſſing that of their adverſaries, but the latter had for them the government. This party included thoſe to whom all religions were indifferent, and theſe appeared the moſt zealous, becauſe it was the true way to render them acceptable at court. As to the Proteſtants, they could not make any uſe of their numbers, being quite unſupported: beſide, many of them concealed their ſentiments, for fear of loſing both life and fortune. Others, by a principle of conſcience, choſe to ſuffer, rather than reſiſt: ſo that thoſe who would have imployed force againſt the attacks of their enemies, would probably have been but very indifferently ſeconded; and the rather, becauſe Charles V would not have failed aſſiſting Mary, had there been any neceſſity. The Proteſtants therefore, with the utmoſt conſternation, ſaw a ſtorm ready to fall on their heads, without any poſſibility to avoid it.

Reflections on the ſtate of the Reformed.

Pole adviſes to moderate counſels. Burnet.

In the council, held at court on this ſubject, Pole was for gentle methods rather than violence, being of opinion that inſtead of curing, it would only inflame the evil, and at beſt but augment the number of hypocrites. He added, that the beſt means of converting Proteſtants was reforming the eccleſiaſtics, whoſe irregular lives had firſt given birth to hereſy. On the contrary, Gardiner maintained, that rigor alone was capable of working any good effect upon heretics: that in the reign of Henry VIII, it was notorious all ſubmited to the ſtatute of ſix articles, thro' dread of puniſhment. As Gardiner had in many things, complied againſt his conſcience, he could not believe others had more reſolution than himſelf: wherefore he thought the puniſhment of ſome of the moſt obſtinate, would be attended with a blind compliance in all the reſt to whatever was injoined. Hence it appears, he was little concerned to gain peoples hearts, provided his beloved creed found no farther oppoſition. The Queen, who was a moſt bigoted zealot, imbraced his opinion: but to ſhew Pole that his counſels were not wholly neglected, ſhe charged him with reforming the clergy, and left to Gardiner the care of extirpating hereſy.

Gardiner is for rigorous methods, and prevails. Burnet.

Embaſſy ſent to Rome. Godwin.

Towards the cloſe of this year, Mary ſent viſcount Mountague, the biſhop of Ely, and ſir Edward Karne to Rome, with a tender of ſubmiſſion to his holineſs from their Majeſties, and the three ſtates of the realm.

It being then reſolved to exerciſe the utmoſt rigor of the laws againſt Proteſtants, Gardiner, author of that counſel, moſt readily undertook its execution. He it was who in ſpite of all the difficulties which naturally occurred in the Queen's marriage, had finally accompliſhed it. He it was alſo, who, by his intrigues, had found a way to diſpoſe parliaments to favor his miſtreſs's deſigns touching religion, and had effected the work of reſtoring the Romiſh creed and Pontifical authority. He thought therefore nothing more was wanting to complete his glory, than forcing the Proteſtants into the pale of the church, or at leaſt their outward ſubmiſſion to the laws newly inacted; which is the utmoſt boundary of human ability. For this purpoſe, he reſolved to begin with Hooper and Rogers. The firſt had been biſhop of Glouceſter; the other was a divine of great repute among the Reformed. It was he who, with Bradford, had reſcued Bourn from his danger when he preached at St. Paul's. This Action, charitable as it was, met with ſo ſiniſter a conſtruction, that the court took thence occaſion to arreſt Rogers, in order to remove out of the way a man who, from his credit and influence with the people, was conſidered as one of the Proteſtants moſt formidable champions. It was, in the begining of this reign, one of the court's chief artifices to impriſon, on frivolous pretexts, thoſe whom they deſigned to ſacrifice, with intent to detain them 'till laws were made to authoriſe their condemnation. Hooper and Rogers were of this number, and the firſt martyrs of this reign. They were condemned by commiſſioners nominated and appointed by her Majeſty, with the chancellor at their head, and delivered over to the ſecular arm. Hooper was burned at Glouceſter, and Rogers at London (1). Hooper was three quarters of an hour in moſt exquiſite torture, the fire not being well kindled, ſo that his legs and thighs were firſt conſumed, and one of his hands droped off before he expired (2). Theſe executions were followed by thoſe of Saunders and Taylor, two other divines of moſt diſtinguiſhed zeal for their religion. Taylor's execution was remarkable for his being put into a pitch barrel, and for having, before the fire was kindled, a billet, from a hand unknown, thrown at his head, which made it ſtream with blood. Afterwards, as he was repeating the fifty-firſt Pſalm in Engliſh, one of the guards ſtruck him on the mouth, and bid him pray in Latin. He was therefore obliged to be ſilent in his devotions, expecting the moment which was to finiſh all his ſufferings: but while the fire was kindling, one of the guards, either thro' impatience or compaſſion, clave down his ſkull with a halbert, and delivered him from more cruel torments.

Gardiner, finding himſelf miſtaken in his conjectures, and that the puniſhment of theſe four clergymen produced not the effect he expected, transfered to Bonner a commiſſion which could not but procure him a univerſal odium. This was no favor to the Proteſtants; for if Gardiner's zeal was cruel, Bonner's was furious.

Gardiner transfers his commiſſion to Bonner. Burnet.

Mean while, theſe few executions occaſioned a general conſternation. The bigots only triumphed. The reſt who had any ſenſe of humanity could not, without the utmoſt reluctance, behold expoſed to ſuch cruel ſufferings perſons charged with no crime, and ſolely for their opinions in matters of belief. It could not but be obſerved how widely different the

In King Edward's reign he returned to England, and was made prebend of St. Paul's, and reader of the divinity lecture in the ſame cathedral. He left a wife and eleven children. At the ſtake he had it in his power to have ſaved his life by a recantation: but neither hopes nor fears could prevail on him to deſert his religion: on the contrary, he ſaid, He reſigned his life with joy, in teſtimony of the doctrine he had preached. Proteſtants

MARY I. AN' 1555.

Proteſtants behavior had been from that of the Papiſts. In Edward's reign, very few had ſuffered even confinement on account of religion; and in Mary's, no torments were thought too cruel for thoſe Proteſtants who dared to perſevere in their recuſancy. The very biſhops ſeemed aſhamed, for, in a ſolemn aſſembly, they declared they had no hand in theſe barbarities. So the whole odium fell on their Majeſties, and particularly the King, as he was bred in a country where the Inquiſition reigns. Philip hearing thereof, found he ſhould utterly loſe the affection of the Engliſh, if they were ſuffered to continue in this ſentiment; beſide, he was reſolved not to be a tool to the biſhops, who were for clearing themſelves at his expenſe. He therefore ordered his confeſſor Alfonſo to preach before him, who, in preſenſe of the whole court, charged the prelates with thoſe barbarities whereof the people in general complained (1). He even challenged them to produce throughout ſacred writ, one paſſage which allowed Chriſtians to burn men for matters of conſcience. It was not without aſtoniſhment that a Spaniard was heard to exclaim againſt burning heretics, and condemn cruelties ſo common in Spain. The biſhops were ſo amazed, that for ſome weeks their faggots remained unkindled; but about mid-March they again blazed, their right reverend lordſhips rather chuſing to incur the public hatred than not proſecute Proteſtants. In reality, the court was no leſs inclined to cruelty than the biſhops: but each coveted to brand the other with all the blame of the perſecution. Bonner, biſhop of London, conſtantly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a fury unbecoming not only a divine and a Chriſtian, but even a Cannibal. From this inſtant executions on Proteſtants were continued with a barbarity clearly manifeſting that no manner of compulſion was practiſed towards thoſe by whom they were ordered. The biſhops condemned without mercy all who were brought before them; and the civil magiſtrates executed the ſentences even more rigorouſly than the law injoined (2).

Bonner's inhuman fury.

About the end of April, Princeſs Elizabeth was conducted from Woodſtock to Hampton-court, where Gardiner, accompanied by ſeveral privy counſellors, very gravely exhorted her to merit her Majeſty's mercy by ingenuouſly confeſſing her crime: but ſhe poſitively denied having ever juſtly offended the Queen. At length Philip obtained for her ſomewhat more liberty, at a ſeat in the country (3), whither ſhe was permited to retire. As ſhe was very ſenſible how narrowly all her actions were obſerved, ſhe carefully avoided whatever might give the leaſt umbrage or ſuſpicion. During the reſt of this reign, ſhe applied herſelf wholly to her ſtudies, and made a conſiderable progreſs: but ſtill her life was very comfortleſs, as ſhe was conſtrained to diſſemble her ſentiments in religion, to hear maſs, and confeſs frequently, to eſcape the perils whereto ſhe was continually expoſed (4). Herein ſhe was ſomewhat leſs ſcrupulous than her ſiſter Mary had been in Edward's reign: but it may be ſaid for her, that there was a great difference between the characters of Edward and Mary. The fear of death could not oblige Mary to diſſemble her religion, becauſe ſhe was never threatened with it; whereas Elizabeth ſaw death continually before her eyes, on the leaſt advantage againſt her.

MARY I. AN' 1555.

While Queen Mary was thus manifeſting the fervency of her zeal for Popery, ſhe found her conſcience oppreſſed with a load which ſhe could no longer ſupport. This was the poſſeſſion of the abbey-lands adjudged to Henry VIII. Pope Julius III pretended to conſent that the poſſeſſors of the church lands ſhould not be diſturbed. But he plainly ſhewed that nothing was farther from his intentions; for even before the affair of the reconciliation was adjuſted, he publiſhed a bull, excommunicating all who poſſeſſed any church or abbey-lands, as well as the Princes who favored or aſſiſted them. Gardiner had indeed indeavored to calm her Majeſty's diſquiet, by telling her, this bull concerned Germany alone, and not of any validity in England 'till there received and authoriſed. But it was eaſy to ſee, that a defect of formality could not excuſe a practiſe in England, which was by the Sovereign Pontif condemned as a heinous crime in Germany. However this be, Queen Mary, who believed herſelf near the time of her delivery, would not run the hazard of dying excommunicate. She ſent for her miniſters (5), and told them, it was her fixed reſolution to part with the church lands in her poſſeſſion, to be diſpoſed of as his Holineſs ſhould judge proper. At the ſame time ſhe ordered them to inform the legate of her intention, and give him a liſt of all ſuch lands as yet continued in the crown.

The news of Marcellus's death being brought to England, Queen Mary formed the deſign of raiſing Pole to the Pontificate. She even made ſome advances towards it; but, on the twenty-third of May, the cardinals aſſembled in conclave elected cardinal Caraffa, who aſſumed the name of Paul IV. The See had not of a long time been filled with a Pope more haughty, or more ſtrenuous in aſſerting his power. He was no ſooner raiſed to the Papal chair, than he reſolved to carry his authority as high or higher than any of his predeceſſors. The embaſſadors of England (6) arrived in Rome the very day of his election, but were not admited to audience 'till a month after. This delay was owing to Mary's aſſuming the title of Queen of Ireland, which his Holineſs would not admit, pretending that the Roman Pontif only had a right to erect kingdoms. As the embaſſadors had no inſtructions to relax on this article, their audience would have been long defered, had not the Holy Father deviſed this expedient. He privately erected Ireland into a kingdom, and at the ſame time ſent to the embaſſadors to acquaint them, that otherwiſe he would not ſuffer them to give their Queen that title in a public audience. This difficulty being removed, their excellencies were admited to audience, and his Beatitude moſt ceremoniouſly told them, that, in token of his eſteem of the King and Queen of England, he had erected Ireland into a kingdom, by virtue of his power to create new kingdoms, and ſupplant old ones. Afterwards, in private audiences, he warmly preſſed for reſtitution of the church-lands, and told the embaſſadors, that he expected the whole ſhould be reſtored without any exception. He ſaid alſo, he intended to have the payment of St. Peter's pence continued; for which purpoſe, he would ſhortly ſend a collector into England; and that the Engliſh were not to expect St. Peter would open the gates of Heaven to them, ſo long as they uſurped his patrimony on earth. The embaſſadors, not to exaſperate this haughty Pontif, contented themſelves with hearing his diſcourſe ſubmiſſively, but made no particular reply; nor indeed had they any power to meddle in theſe points.

While this paſſed at Rome, the privy-council being informed, that the juſtices of peace, and particularly thoſe of the county of Norfolk, were indulgent to the Proteſtants, ſent inſtructions to them to act with more conformity to the court's intentions. This ſhews the biſhops were not alone guilty of the cruelties exerciſed againſt the Proteſtants, but that the court was equally poſſeſſed with this zealous fury. In theſe inſtructions was one article injoining the juſtices to have ſpies in every pariſh, for giving information of all perſons who were remiſs in their duty in point of religion. This ſo reſembled the Inquiſition, that it was imputed to the counſels of the Spaniards, which rendered them extremely odious; nothing being more contrary to the Engliſh humor and government. Notwithſtanding theſe inſtructions, and the court's rigid injunctions, the violences already commited occaſioned ſuch murmurs, that Bonner himſelf, whether thro' fear, or ſome other motive, moderated his fury ſo far as to diſmiſs without trial perſons brought before him for hereſy. This conduct drew from the King and Queen a ſevere letter to him (1), in which, after notifying their ſurpriſe, they exhorted him not to be remiſs. This was ſufficient to renew the perſecution with more fury than before. Bradford, who had been ſome time under ſentence of death, was burned in July (2). When the King and Queen wrote to Bonner to rekindle his zeal, the Queen believed herſelf on the point of being delivered. The twenty-ninth of May, the courtiers were in a readineſs to convey the joyful tidings of her delivery to different parts of the kingdom (5). In the begining of June, a rumor was every where ſpread, that ſhe was delivered of a Prince. The biſhop of Norwich ſang Te Deum in his cathedral. One prieſt, more officious than the reſt, deſcribed in his ſermon the lineaments of the new-born Prince. But this pretended pregnancy at laſt ended in ſome moles which her Majeſty at different times brought into the world. This was a grievous diſappointment to Mary and the whole court (6). King Philip was no leſs diſmayed. He had eſpouſed this Princeſs purely in hopes of having iſſue by her, and of thereby uniting England with the Spaniſh monarchy. This accident, and perhaps the opinion of phyſicians, that there was no likelihood of children, intirely deſtroying theſe hopes, he grew weary of his wife, who had neither youth nor beauty, and reſolved on a cloſer application to his other affairs. Beſide, he was doubtleſs informed by the Emperor his father, of his intention to reſign to him his Spaniſh dominions. He therefore departed England the fourth of September, and paſſed over to Flanders, leaving the Queen extremely mortified at his coldneſs, of which ſhe was but too ſenſible.

The majority of members began no longer to pay the ſame deference to the court as formerly; whether their penſions were withdrawn after a compliance to almoſt whatever was deſired, or they would not be the inſtruments of reſtoring to the clergy an authority ſo odious to the nation: beſide, moſt people were grown weary of the cruelties exerciſed againſt innocent men. It is no wonder that the good intelligence between Mary and the commons began to decreaſe, ſince the miniſter who had hitherto been imployed to manage that houſe was no longer among the living. I mean Gardiner, who died in the begining of this ſeſſion, in which he had been only twice preſent (1). His laſt illneſs ſeized him on the very day he received news of the death of Ridley and Latimer, which he impatiently expected. He refuſed to ſit down to dinner 'till he had received it, and was without that ſatisfaction 'till four in the afternoon. He then dined with a good appetite, and after dinner was ſeized with a ſuppreſſion of urine, which brought him to his grave in few days. It is ſaid that, during this indiſpoſition, he felt ſome remorſe for his paſſed conduct, and ſometimes ſaid, he had erred with St. Peter, but not mourned with him. He was a man intirely attached to the world, of great wit, and of equal craft and diſſimulation (2). He directed his talents ſolely to the ſupporting and augmenting his own authority. Pope Paul IV promiſed him a cardinal's hat. It is alſo pretended that, to procure the archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, promiſed to Pole, he had ſo ſlandered him to the court of Rome, that the Pope had reſolved to recall and even puniſh him, as a favorer of hereſy, by reaſon he approved not the violent methods practiſed for the converſion of Proteſtants. Gardiner's hope of ſucceeding to the archbiſhoprick, was the reaſon why Cranmer was ſuffered to live; becauſe Gardiner waited 'till Pole was recalled. Tho', in all appearance, his religion was that of the church of Rome, he had conformed to all Henry VIII's innovations. But the hope he had groundleſly conceived, that Henry at length would return to his primitive ſentiments in religion, put him upon ſome practiſes which rendered him ſuſpected, and robbed him of the fruit of his diſſimulation. During the reign of Edward, he diſſembled ſo far as to comply outwardly with the laws concerning religion; but at the ſame time he ſufficiently diſcovered its being not without reluctancy. To this was owing his deprivation, thoſe who then managed the religious affairs being perſuaded that his diſſimulation did more harm than good. Under Mary, he was no longer obliged to wear a maſk: nay, perhaps he affected a zeal more fervent than he really had for the Romiſh creed, the better to recommend him to a bigoted Queen. He thereby acquired her favor, and became her prime miniſter, having artfully gained the Emperor to his intereſt. When he found his credit firmly eſtabliſhed, he took vengeance on his adverſaries with the utmoſt barbarity. They had been contented with keeping him under confinement; but he could only be ſatisfied with burning them alive. Ridley and Latimer, among others, felt the terrible effects of his revenge.

He would not have ſo long defered procuring himſelf the ſatisfaction of cauſing Cranmer to periſh in the flames, had not his own intereſt induced him to ſpare his life for ſome time. It is pretended he was natural ſon of Richard Woodvil, brother to Queen Elizabeth, King Edward IV's conſort, and that this occaſioned his ſo ſudden promotion to the ſee of Wincheſter, in the reign of Henry VIII. Burnet, in his Hiſtory of the Reformation, has evidently made appear that Gardiner was one of the principal authors of Henry's divorce from Catherine of Aragon. This might be preſumed ſhould have rendered him no leſs odious to Queen Mary than was Cranmer: but Gardiner's zeal for the Romiſh religion effaced all. After his death, the chancellorſhip was executed by commiſſion, from the thirteenth of November to the firſt of January following, when Heath, archbiſhop of York, had the ſeals delivered to him.

King Philip's abſenſe, and Gardiner's death prevented not the fires from being re-kindled, towards the cloſe of this year, for the burning of Proteſtants. This demonſtrates Philip and Gardiner not to have been the only authors of theſe inhumanities, but that the ſource of them lay in the Queen's furious bigotry.

It was likewiſe about this time that Charles V reſigned all his Spaniſh dominions to Philip, at two different times. AN' 1556.

The twenty-firſt of March, archbiſhop Cranmer underwent the martyrdom to which he had long been deſtined. He had been declared heretic from April 1554. But this was attended with only a bare excommunication, the power of the judges, who had condemned him, reaching no farther. At length, in September 1555, he was tried at Oxford before two commiſſioners (5), one delegated from his Sanctity, and one from Mary. His accuſation contained: That he had been twice married: that he had entertained a wife ſecretly in the reign of Henry VIII, and openly in that of Edward: that he had publiſhed heretical books; forſaken the communion of the Romiſh church; and denied the real preſenſe of Chriſt in the euchariſt. He denied not any of theſe facts, and was, on ſuch confeſſion, cited to appear before the Pope within eighty days; a moſt prepoſterous citation, ſince he was detained a priſoner. The fourteenth of February, Bonner and Thirleby were ſent to Oxford to degrade him. Bonner executed his commiſſion with his uſual inſolence, and with bitter railleries and invectives againſt Cranmer, during the ceremony: but Thirleby melted into tears. Cranmer was attired in Pontifical robes of coarſe canvas, to render him ridiculous, and then was thereof deveſted, piece by piece, with all the pageantry practiſed in the Romiſh church on ſuch occaſions (1). But what was monſtrouſly fantaſtical, was, his being condemned for non-appearance at Rome, tho' he was all the while a cloſe priſoner.

He abjures. Strype.

Death ſhould of courſe have immediately followed the ſentence of the commiſſioners, and his degradation. But ſo many ſnares were laid to overcome the conſtancy of this prelate, that, thro' infirmity, and the hopes of ſaving his life, he was prevailed on to abjure, and even to ſign his recantation (2). His enemies, one might have thought, ſhould have been ſatisfied with ingaging him in this weakneſs; but his death was what they wanted, and nothing leſs would content them. The Queen, who pretended a merit in pardoning him his private offenſes, and in being moved only by a zeal for religion, ſeeing all her meaſures diſconcerted by his abjuration, threw off the maſk, and ſigned a warrant for burning him, notwithſtanding his recantation. Then it was that Cranmer came to himſelf, and, full of ſhame and confuſion, retracted at the ſtake, and reſolved the hand which had ſigned the fatal abjuration ſhould firſt ſuffer. He held it extended in the flame 'till it fell off (3), and then was obſerved to beat his breaſt with the other. Thus he expired, teſtifying a repentance for the fault he had commited. His heart was found intire in the aſhes, after his whole body was conſumed, which occaſioned diverſe reflections, which are not here very neceſſary. The enemies of the reformation triumphed in this prelate's fall, and the Proteſtants excuſed him as beſt they could (4). Pole was conſecrated archbiſhop of Canterbury the day after his death. It ſeems he had his Congé d'elire with his election, and his bulls from Rome diſpatched before this time, becauſe the order for reſtitution of the temporalities bears date March twenty-one, the day of Cranmer's death (5). It is therefore without foundation that Pole is accuſed of haſtening his death, to take poſſeſſion of his ſee, becauſe there was near a month between the Queen's warrant for burning Cranmer and his execution. Pole needed not Cranmer's being out of the world in order to take poſſeſſion of the archbiſhoprick, vacant from the moment of his predeceſſor's condemnation: and indeed, he was already archbiſhop of Canterbury before Cranmer ſuffered, having been elected in England, and approved by the Pope, as is expreſly ſaid in the order for reſtoring the temporalities, dated the twenty-firſt of March.

The perſecution continued. Fox. Burnet.

The whole reſidue of this year was one continual and moſt violent perſecution of the Reformed. The furious Bonner, who had the charge of puniſhing heretics, not contented to burn them one by one, diſpatched them away to the flames in troops; ſo that, in the year 1556, eighty five periſhed by his barbarity. The very women were not ſpared, and the fury of the perſecutors fell even upon harmleſs infants. In the iſle of Guernſey, a woman far advanced in her pregnancy being ſentenced to the ſtake, and the violence of the fire burſting her womb, a male child fell into the flames, which being ſnatched out by one more compaſſionate than the reſt, was, after a ſhort conſultation, thrown in again, by command of the magiſtrates who aſſiſted at the execution.

Mary I. An' 1556.

While, by theſe violent methods, the Proteſtant religion's utter extirpation was indeavored, the Queen, on the other hand, labored to ſupport that of the church of Rome, by repairing old monaſteries, and founding new ones (6). Perhaps ſhe had more advanced her deſign to reſtore the religious houſes, had not the nobility and gentry taken alarm. It happened, even in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, that ſome of the commons, on hearing a propoſal touching that affair, laid their hands on their ſwords, and loudly ſaid, "They knew how "to defend their properties." Mary, obſerving ſo many obſtacles, and not thinking it proper at that time to puſh the matter, reſolved to wait a more favorable opportunity, and proceed gradually. Mean while, ſhe gave a commiſſion to Bonner, and ſome others, to raze out of the public records whatever had been done, by Henry VIII, againſt the Pope and monks, and particularly the accounts of viſitations of monaſteries, and renunciations of the Papal authority by the monks. This has rendered very defective the church-hiſtory of thoſe days; and yet, notwithſtanding the commiſſioners care, many records of this nature eſcaped their diligence, and are yet extant.

The war ſtill continuing between France and Spain, without the intervention of the Engliſh, Philip was deſirous of either a peace or a truce, to have leiſure to fix himſelf firmly on the throne lately reſigned to him by the Emperor his father. His Queen had mediated for this peace or truce, and obtained, that the two Kings ſhould ſend their embaſſadors between Calais and Ardres, where they had indeed met the twenty-firſt of May, in the preceding year, but without coming to any concluſion. Paul IV's advancement to the Pontifical dignity, rendered the pacification ſtill more difficult. This Pontif was a man of exceſſive pride and haughtineſs, and tho' aged eighty, was forming vaſt projects. He cannot be better compared than with Julius II. He had two nephews, one a cardinal, and the other governor of the Eccleſiaſtical State, and both mortal enemies of the Colonna family, whoſe ruin they had reſolved, and conſequently the King of Spain's, who ſupported it. To effect their deſign, they perſuaded the Pope their uncle, that they had diſcovered a conſpiracy formed againſt him by the Spaniards. In conſequence of this imaginary diſcovery, they opened the packets of the duke of Alva, viceroy of Naples, and therein pretended to find inconteſtable proofs. They impriſoned cardinal Colonna, and arreſted the envoys of Philip and the Queen of England. Then they ſeized Palliano and Nettuno, two towns appertaining to the Colonni.

duced his Holineſs their uncle to declare war againſt Spain, without having either treaſure or forces to ſupport it. He was therefore obliged to have recourſe to the King of France, who was in actual war with Philip. For this purpoſe, he propoſed to him the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples, and offered him his whole power to execute that deſign, provided he would aſſiſt him in the war he had undertaken. This propoſal being laid before the Gallic council, the cardinal of Lorrain ſupported it with all his intereſt. His ſaid eminence had then ſuch influence over the court, that ſcarce any durſt in the leaſt contradict him; tho' it was eaſy to comprehend that a league with the Pope could not bring France much advantage. The cardinal's aim was to procure for his brother, the duke of Guiſe, the command of the army deſigned for Italy.

This league, offenſive and defenſive, was therefore begun at Paris, and ſigned at Rome, whither the cardinals of Lorrain and Tournon had repaired very early in October, 1555. His Beatitude promiſed the inveſtiture of Naples to a ſon of France; and his Gallic Majeſty, on his part, ingaged to ſend thither twelve thouſand foot, five hundred men at arms, and as many light horſe. But not long after, by Queen Mary's mediation, Henry II and Philip concluded a five years truce, ſigned the fifth of February, 1556. The Pontif loudly complained that the French King had abandoned him to the Spaniards vengeance. In effect, the duke of Alva had already approached Rome, and taken ſome places, and among others, Oſtia, which his Sanctity's nephews had neglected to ſtore. In this extremity, the Pontif and his nephews had no other refuge, than to prevail with the King of France to break the truce with Spain. It was with this view that cardinal Caraffa repaired to Paris, as legate à latere, declaring, that he came to labor a pacification between the two crowns. At the ſame time, his Holineſs loaded with praiſes the Queen of England for mediating a truce, and exhorted her not to leave her work imperfect, but imploy her efforts to convert that truce into a firm and laſting peace. Mean time the legate, by his intrigues and magnificent promiſes, finally prevailed with King Henry to break the truce, without alledging other reaſon, than that the Holy Father was oppreſſed by the Spaniards, tho' his Holineſs had firſt declared war againſt Spain.

In January 1557, cardinal Pole viſited both the univerſities. While he was at Cambridge, Bucer and Fagius, two German divines, ſome years ſince deceaſed, were ridiculouſly cited before the commiſſioners to give account of their belief, and on their non-appearance, both were condemned to be burned. This ſentence was followed by a warrant from court to execute it, and the two bodies in their coffins were tied to ſtakes, and conſumed to aſhes. At Oxford, Peter Martyr's wife was dug out of her grave by order of the legate, and buried in a dung-hill, becauſe, having been a nun, ſhe had violated her vow of chaſtity. At firſt a proceſs was intended againſt her as a heretic: but as ſhe had never learned to ſpeak Engliſh, no witneſſes could be produced to ſwear, they had ever heard her utter any hereſy. Had all been thus dug up, who might have been preſumed to die heretics ſince the reformation, thoſe flaming zealots would have had imployment enough. To all appearance, Peter Martyr's being ſuffered to quit the realm was heartily repented: ſince his wife's periſhing remains were thus treated, what muſt he have expected, had himſelf been within the reach of his perſecutors (1)?

The violences hitherto practiſed, as well on the dead as the living, had a quite different effect from what her Majeſty had wiſhed and imagined. The eccleſiaſtics alone perſiſted in their rage; but the magiſtrates began to relax, and ſcrupled to be the inſtruments of theſe barbarities. The council, having thereof information, wrote circular letters to all the towns, to inflame their zeal in the perſecution of heretics: but theſe letters produced no great effect.

The Queen and her miniſters, inraged to hear from all quarters that the number of Proteſtants rather augmented than diminiſhed, did, as ſome have aſſerted, come to a reſolution of erecting in England a court of Inquiſition like that in Spain. To this end, a commiſſion was granted the laſt year, impowering twenty-one commiſſioners to ſit upon trials of hereſy, with a power ſo unlimited, that no other rules were preſcribed than their diſcretion, nor any perſon whatever exempted from their juriſdiction. This was followed by a perſecution, wherein periſhed ſeventy-nine Proteſtants.

While all this was tranſacting in England, the duke of Guiſe arrived in Italy, with the army deſigned for the conqueſt of Naples. He ſtayed ſome time at Rome, where he found nothing ready of what his Holineſs had promiſed. Nevertheleſs, he entered the kingdom of Naples in April, where he performed no great exploits. Soon after, Paul IV recalled him to the relief of Rome, cloſely blocaded by the duke of Alva.

The duke of Guiſe marches into Italy.

On the other hand, Philip, finding the French had broke the truce, reſolved to exert his utmoſt to eſtabliſh his reputation in the begining of his reign. He raiſed for this purpoſe an army fifty thouſand ſtrong, which was to act in Picardy; and, to render himſelf more formidable, tried all ways to gain Mary to his intereſts, notwithſtanding the agreement in their marriage articles, and his oath to give no occaſion of rupture between England and France. His creatures about Mary perpetually inſinuated to her, that ſhe was ill-treated by the King of France, who, not content with giving reception to ſuch Engliſh fugitives as retired into his dominions, had given penſions to ſeveral. Theſe inſinuations began to operate on the Queen: but in order quite to diſguſt her with Henry, a certain artifice was uſed, which ſucceeded according to the deſires of thoſe who contrived it, apparently to do Philip ſervice. Dr. Wotton, the Engliſh embaſſador in France, ſent for one of his nephews to Paris, and gave him proper inſtructions to accompliſh the project. This young gentleman, applying himſelf to one of the King's retinue, deſired a private audience of his Majeſty, ſaying he had a matter of great conſequence to communicate. The King refuſing to ſee him, ordered him to apply to conſtable Montmorency. Wotton, in his conference with the conſtable, told him, he was ſent by the inhabitants of Calais, who were generally Proteſtants, and deſirous to put themſelves under his Gallic Majeſty's protection, provided they might have liberty to profeſs their religion. The conſtable, being very attentive to this propoſition, required how it might be effected: and, liking the project, ordered him to come another day and diſcourſe farther on the buſineſs. But young Wotton, inſtead of returning to the conſtable, croſſed the ſea back into England, and made his report to the Queen and her miniſters of what paſſed at Paris. This convinced Mary that the King of France was no longer to be regarded, ſince, in profound peace, he was forming projects to rob her of Calais by ſurpriſe. The duke of Savoy having, for a month, made a feint to attack ſeveral places in Picardy, fell ſuddenly upon St. Quintin (4), which was in a very indifferent condition, and had only a gariſon of three hundred men. All the conſtable, who commanded the French army, could do, was to detach his nephew, admiral Chatillon, with three thouſand men, to throw himſelf into the town. The admiral ſucceeded in part, having got in the night thro' the quarters of the beſiegers: but, inſtead of three thouſand, only ſeven hundred followed him, the reſt having loſt their way. With this reinforcement he made a gallant defenſe, in hope that the conſtable, tho' much weaker than the enemy, would uſe all poſſible indeavors to relieve him; and indeed nothing was neglected by the conſtable. He was even ſo ſucceſsful as to throw Chatillon's brother Andelot into the place with five hundred men: but in his return, after his ſucceſs, he was attacked by the duke of Savoy, who routed him, killed two thouſand five hundred of his men, and took him priſoner. In this incounter, termed the battle of St. Laurence, (becauſe fought on the tenth of Auguſt, the day dedicated to that ſaint) France loſt a great number of princes and noblemen, killed or made priſoners (5). The conſternation was ſo great, that had the duke of Savoy marched directly to Paris, it was believed nothing could have prevented his entrance: but inſtead of this, he drew back to his lines, and eight days after carried the town by ſtorm, and took the admiral priſoner on the breach. All France exclaimed againſt the Pope, who had occaſioned this rupture: but the blow was given. The King of France's laſt reſourſe was to recall the duke of Guiſe from Italy, where he made no very great progreſs.

The Pope intends to recall Pole. Godwin. Burnet. Strype.

When Pope Paul underſtood that Queen Mary had declared war againſt France, he was highly inſenſed againſt Pole; as if he could have hindered it. In the heat of his fury, he recalled all his legates, including Pole in the number; but Karne, the Engliſh embaſſador, remonſtrated to him, by ſome cardinals, the miſchiefs which from thence might inſue to religion. Finally, after many ſollicitations and remonſtrances, his Holineſs, without revoking the order, promiſed only it ſhould not be notified to Pole, and told the embaſſador, he was inclined to continue the cardinal in his legation, if ſuch was the Queen's requeſt. This was before the battle of St. Laurence. But when news of the loſs of this battle, and the duke of Guiſe's being recalled, were brought him, he was again exceſſively in choler againſt Pole, and determined on ſacrificing him to his vengeance. For this purpoſe he ſent for Peyto, the Queen's confeſſor, to Rome, and, creating him cardinal, put into his hands the bull of Pole's revocation, and appointed him his legate in England. But the Queen, having thereof information, wrote to Peyto, who was on his return, that if he offered to ſet foot in England ſhe would bring him within the Præmunire. This letter induced him to make a full ſtop. Mean while, tho' his Sanctify's brief was not delivered to Pole, he thought fit to abſtain from the functions of legateſhip, being unwilling to give any plauſible pretext of complaint to that haughty Pontif who had long hated him.

Mean time, Henry being recovered from his conſternation by Philip's not improving his advantages, the duke of Guiſe had time to come to his aſſiſtance, and was immediately conſtituted his lieutenant-general. On the other hand, Henry ſollicited the regent Queen of Scotland to break the peace with England, and that Princeſs was as ready to oblige him: but ſhe had a powerful party againſt her, which was for preſerving the peace. Wherefore, as ſhe could not bring the ſtates to the reſolution ſhe deſired, ſhe took another courſe to accompliſh her deſign. She fortified Aymouth, contrary to an expreſs article of the treaty lately concluded with England; and thereby ingaged the Engliſh to oppoſe it with force. This produced indeed a breach between the two nations; and the Scotiſh army under conduct of D'Oyſel, even entered the frontiers of England. But the ſtates, ſtill hoping to repair the breach made in the peace without their conſent, required D'Oyſel, by expreſs order, to return; which he was forced to obey. The regent, ſeeing the low ebb to which her authority was reduced, preſſed the French court to haſten the marriage of the Queen her daughter with the Dauphin, to the end that this Prince, being in poſſeſſion of Scotland, might be more maſter of its forces and counſels. Henry, improving this advice, immediately ſent embaſſadors into Scotland to ſettle with the ſtates the marriage-articles (7).

Philip warns her to take care of Calais; but his advice is neglected. Godwin. Thuanus. Burnet. Hollingſh.

Towards the cloſe of this year, Philip ſent her notice of a deſign the French court was forming upon Calais, and offered her his forces to ſtrengthen the gariſon, which he knew to be weak. This advice, being laid before the council, was immediately ſuſpected to be a mere artifice of Philip, to poſſeſs himſelf of that place under pretenſe of reinforcing its gariſon. This, tho' a bare ſurmiſe, was not abſolutely improbable: yet, as if it had been a moſt evident truth, Mary's council could not be perſuaded that France had any intention to beſiege Calais, tho' it was not provided with a fourth part of the neceſſary troops and ammunition: ſo, it ſeems, they were of opinion that the town's reputation alone was to be its ſecurity. Whatever they thought, the advice was neglected and nothing done for its relief, tho' the governor, William lord Wentworth, was not wanting in his ſollicitations (1).

Siege and loſs of Calais. AN' 1558. Godwin. Thuanus. Burnet. Stow.

Nothing leſs was to be expected from a council compoſed chiefly of eccleſiaſtics, who were only intent on the Proteſtants extirpation. After ſo ſhameful a neglect of providing for the ſafety of Calais, the Queen and her miniſters were in the utmoſt conſternation on the news of its being actually taken (2). The duke of Guiſe beſieged it the firſt of January, and, carrying the fort named Newnam-bridge (3), which commanded the avenues from land, and alſo the Riſbank which commanded the harbor (4), obliged the governor to capitulate on the ſeventh day of the ſiege. After he was maſter of the place, he ordered all the Engliſh to depart, as Edward III had expeled the French two hundred and ten years before. Then he ſat down before Guiſnes, commanded by lord Grey (5), with eleven hundred men: but the gariſon was ſo diſcouraged by the loſs of Calais that, on the firſt attack, they quited the town, and retired into the citadel. Mean while, the Engliſh governor, perceiving the French were fallen to plundering, made a ſally and beat them out of the town; but, deſpairing to keep it, ſet it on fire and retired. Soon after, the enemy cloſely inveſted the citadel, and in a furious aſſault the Engliſh loſt three hundred men. After this, the governor, ſeeing no poſſibility of a longer reſiſtance, ſurrendered himſelf, with all his people, priſoners of war. The caſtle of Hames, ſituated in a ſcarce acceſſible moraſs, might have made ſome reſiſtance; but the gariſon fled, and left it to the French. Thus, in the dead of winter, and in leſs than fifteen days, the Engliſh loſt the whole remnant of their ancient conqueſts in France, by the incapacity of a Queen (whoſe thoughts were wholly ingroſſed by one affair, as if the Proteſtants ruin had alone merited her application) and by the negligence of her council, if we may give ſo favorable a name to their ſtrange conduct. Such was the fruit England reaped from its alliance with Spain, notwithſtanding all Gardiner's care to prevent a mixture of intereſts between the two crowns. The non-performance of this article ſhews how the reſt would have been obſerved, if Philip, had his Queen brought him iſſue, and he could have introduced himſelf, as his childrens guardian, into the government of England.

And of Guiſnes and Hames. Thuanus.

MARY I. AN' 1558.

The loſs of Calais made great noiſe in England. The Proteſtants took occaſion to arraign the government; and the court's partiſans were ſo confounded, that they durſt not open their mouths in juſtification of the miniſtry. Some accuſed them of treaſon; others of incapacity; nay, their moſt zealous adherents could not but own their negligence. The two governors of Calais (6) and Guiſnes had the greateſt ſhare of unhappineſs: beſide forfeiting their reputation, the miniſters, to inſinuate to the people that theſe places were loſt by their fault, ſuffered them to remain priſoners, and no care was taken for their releaſe. But no one had a more lively ſenſe of this loſs than the Queen (7). After Calais was taken, ſhe perfectly knew the value of that fortreſs, which rendered England always formidable to France, becauſe the Engliſh could, in twenty-four hours, pour into that kingdom conſiderable armies: the greatneſs of the loſs has ſince been rendered ſtill more ſenſible. From that time, France, except when diſtracted with inteſtine wars, no more ſhewed for England that regard ſhe was obliged to pay before the reduction of Calais.

Burnet.

Immediately on the taking this important place, Philip ſtrongly preſſed the Queen to make a vigorous effort to recover it, before France had time to repair and fortify it. But it was not poſſible for the miniſters to find means to execute ſuch a material undertaking. On a computation of the neceſſary expenſes for the fleet and army, it was judged dangerous, conſidering the general diſcontent, to load the people with ſo great a burden, even tho' the parliament could be brought to a compliance. This was ſent to Philip in a letter of thanks for his advice and offers. But beſide this reaſon, there was another of great weight, namely, the fears of the miniſtry, the council, and the Queen her ſelf, that the ſiege of Calais would oblige them to interrupt the perſecution: ſo, in the belief that one year more would ſuffice to deſtroy the reformation and the Reformed, they judged it proper to defer the Calais expedition 'till a more convenient ſeaſon.

Propoſal in the houſe of commons cauſes great ſuſpicions. Statutes.

This affair being terminated, the court party brought in a bill to confirm all her Majeſty's letters patent, without farther explanation of their meaning. This was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by one of the members, who urged, that a power ſo unlimited muſt very apparently indanger the realm, ſince thereby it lay purely in the Queen's breaſt to diſpoſe of the crown from the rightful heirs, by a ſingle proclamation. The commons were offended with theſe inſinuations againſt the Queen, and ſent the ſaid member to priſon (1). But tho' Mary ſeemed well pleaſed with this zeal of the commons for her reputation, ſhe clearly ſaw how far they were from any thoughts of excluding Princeſs Elizabeth from the ſucceſſion. It is not known what was the drift of a confirmation ſo general: but, very ſeemingly, the authors had ſome view diſadvantageous to Elizabeth.

In April, this year, the Dauphin finally married Mary, the young Queen of Scots (2). Princeſs Elizabeth in great danger. Burnet.

Princeſs Elizabeth was now in more danger than ever. The Queen ſenſibly declined in her health. She had not been well managed during her imaginary pregnancy, becauſe, having commited herſelf to the care of women who only ſought to flatter her, ſhe had neglected to conſult phyſicians, who might have prevented the conſequences of that accident. From that time ſhe was never well. She was naturally melancholy, and this temperament was corroborated by her many mortifications under the two preceding reigns. Afterwards, King Philip's diſguſt, of which ſhe was but too ſenſible, ſtill augmented her gloomy humor; and the loſs of Calais reduced her to ſuch a ſtate, that it was but very few perſons ſhe could indure in her ſight. The body ſympathiſed with the mind, and ſhe perceived herſelf in a daily decay. In this condition, ſhe was attacked with the ſame reflections, on her ſiſter Elizabeth's account, which had before diſturbed Edward on her's; namely, that, on her deceaſe, what ſhe had with ſo much pains eſtabliſhed, would be infallibly ſubverted. Of this alſo the prelates were ſtrongly perſuaded. They were not ignorant that Elizabeth, whatever care ſhe took to conceal it, was in her heart a Proteſtant, and was even induced to be ſuch from her temporal intereſt. Hence ſome were perpetually inſinuating to the Queen the neceſſity of geting quite rid of her. Gardiner had been of this opinion, and frequently ſaid, it was in vain to lop off the branches while the tree was ſuffered to ſtand. It is amazing that this counſel was not followed! Mary was, even in the ſuperlative degree, a bigot. Sheding human blood never gave her the leaſt remorſe, when religion was the pretext: ſo, in all appearance, ſhe would ſcarce have ſpared a ſiſter, whom ſhe conſidered as ſpurious, had not the Almighty permited King Philip's politics to prevail over the zeal of his bigoted conſort: for at the very juncture I now ſpeak of, when the ſpirit of perſecution rendered men deaf to reaſon, juſtice and humanity, to what can be aſcribed, but to the particular protection of Heaven, the preſervation of this Princeſs, whom ſo many motives called for as a ſacrifice to Papiſm? But the Omnipotent, who ſets boundaries to the ſeas, does alſo, whenever he pleaſes, curb the fury of perſecutors, and reſtrains them from extending their maſſacring hands againſt ſuch as he has preſerved for the peace of his church. However this be, Elizabeth was, contrary to all probability or expectation, preſerved during Mary's whole reign, and particularly in theſe latter times, when ſhe appeared to be moſt in danger.

The King of Sweden demands Princeſs Elizabeth in marriage. Burnet. Strype. She excuſes herſelf.

Some time after prorogation of the parliament, the King of Sweden diſpatched over to Princeſs Elizabeth a gentleman, to notify his deſign of demanding her in marriage, and to requeſt her concurrence (3). The meſſenger deſiring a private audience, ſhe would not conſent, without firſt knowing his buſineſs. Being informed of it, ſhe returned for anſwer, that ſhe poſitively would not receive any ſuch meſſage or propoſal, but by her Majeſty's direction. The meſſenger replied, his royal maſter acted the part of a gallant lover, who would not eſpouſe a Princeſs without being firſt ſure of her conſent, by which he teſtified his eſteem for her; but when ſhe had once allowed his addreſſes, he would then, as a King, demand her by his embaſſadors. But this ſufficed not to make her alter her reſolution. On the contrary, ſhe ſignified to him, that the King of Sweden would greatly oblige her in not thinking of her any more. It might have been preſumed, that this reply ſhould have ſatisfied the Swediſh embaſſadors, then arrived in London, ſince the King their maſter reſolved not to marry Elizabeth without her conſent; nevertheleſs they failed not propoſing to the Queen this match. Hence ariſes a juſt ſuſpicion, that the Swediſh gentleman, who deſired a private audience of the Princeſs, had not received his commiſſion immediately from the King his Sovereign, but from Prince Eric and the other embaſſadors, and that Mary's miniſters had induced them to ſound the Princeſs, in order to draw her into a ſnare. However this be, preſently after, the Queen ordered her to be told, that ſhe was pleaſed with her anſwer to the Swediſh gentleman: that the embaſſadors had, in their King's name, demanded her in marriage, in which ſhe deſired to know her mind. Elizabeth anſwered, ſhe was content with her condition, and that if the Queen would allow her to purſue her own inclination, ſhe proteſted a ſingle life was to her preferable to marriage with the greateſt Potentate in the univerſe. So this affair proceeded no farther.

The loſs of Calais, and the parliament's ſiting had given the Proteſtants ſome reſpite. But towards the cloſe of March, the perſecution was renewed with greater fury than ever. The Queen herſelf, ſtretching her prerogative, iſſued a proclamation, "That whoever had any heretical books, "and did not inſtantly burn them unperuſed, ſhould "be eſteemed rebels, and ſuffer immediate death "by martial law." On the other hand, ſhe expreſly inhibited praying for ſuch as were executed, or even ſaying, "God help them." This occaſioned the author of the History of the Reformation judiciously to remark, that "it was not so much the "conversion, as the destruction of those they called "heretics, that the bishops desired." A convincing proof of this was seen very suddenly. One Benbridge, being tied to the stake, thro' the violence of the flames. cried out, "I recant." Whereupon the sheriff (1) ordered the fire to be immediately extinguished, and the sufferer signed the abjuration dictated to him. But soon after he received orders from court to burn the condemned person, and come himself to London, where he was commited to prison. So excessive was the persecutors fury, that tho' they were on the point of losing their royal supporter, I mean Queen Mary, they were far from discontinuing these severities. About a week before her death, five persons were burned at Canterbury, and in this last year of her reign, thirty-nine Protestants suffered martyrdom in several places. Authors are not agreed concerning the number of those who expired in the flames during Mary's reign. Those who come lowest, reckon two hundred eighty-four; but others affirm, that in the two last years of the persecution, which began in 1555, no fewer than eight hundred lost their lives purely for religion (2).

Number of Protestants burned in this reign. Burnet. Strype. Heylin.

While these tragedies were acting in different parts of England, the Queen, who was deeply affected with the loss of Calais, was willing to make one effort to repair it. Philip had advised to attempt seizing Brest. For this purpose she put to sea a fleet of one hundred and twenty ships (3), commanded by lord Clinton (4), who landed at Conquest, and burned that small town; but the country rising, the English were obliged to hasten on board, with the loss of six hundred of their men (5). The neighborhood being in arms to oppose a second descent, and fresh troops daily arriving in those parts, the English admiral, who was only seven thousand strong, thought it not proper to ingage in any new action, and returned. Such was the benefit Mary reaped from this expensive armament. She was now sensible, that the continuation of the war would procure her no advantage, and readily consented to a negociation then proposed for a peace between France, England, and Spain. Cambray was the place appointed for the congress, which was opened in October (6).

The lower house was so little inclined to grant her request, that she was obliged to send the chancellor and ten other peers, to lay before them the ill state of her affairs, and desire them to expedite the necessary supplies. This sollicitation producing some effect, the commons debated, that and the two following days, upon a subsidy. But the Queen's death put a period to their deliberations.

Mary, demanding a supply of money is put off. Burnet.

She had been some time afflicted with a dropsy which, being much increased the begining of November, carried her off the seventeenth of the same month, in the forty-third year of her age, after a reign of five years, four months, and eleven days.

Her death. Godwin.

Cardinal Pole followed her within sixteen hours. He was a prelate of a moderate and affable disposition, and would gladly, by fair and legal methods, have brought back the English to their ancient creed, but approved not of fire and sword. This gave his enemies room to represent him as somewhat inclined to the Protestant religion, or at least, as of a contexture too tender for those times. Neither Mary, nor Philip, nor the Pope, nor Gardiner, nor those prelates substituted in the place of the ejected Protestant bishops, were persons to be guided by his moderate maxims. Accordingly, Pole was never consulted on religion, tho' in all other affairs the Queen placed in him a singular confidence. Pope Paul IV was his avowed enemy. It was he who, by his calumnies, prevented his ascending the Pontifical throne on the demise of Paul III, tho' he was elected in the conclave. Thence-forwards, believing Pole could not forgive him that injury, he never ceased doing him ill offices: and when he was himself Pope, he often gave him marks of his enmity; it is even pretended that, when he recalled him from his legation to put Peyto in his room, he designed to have inflicted on him some rigorous chastisement, for having been too gentle to the Protestants: but Philip and Mary took him under their protection.

Pole's death and character. Godwin. Burnet.

Mary's excessive bigotry is evident from the history of her reign. To this she joined a temper cruel and vindictive, which she indeavored to confound with zeal for religion; but when it was not possible to unite them, she plainly evidenced that she was inclined to cruelty as well by nature as zeal. She had the misfortune to be incouraged in this disposition by all who approached her. King Philip was naturally morose. Gardiner was one of the most revengeful men breathing. Bonner was a fury; and the other bishops were picked out from among such of the clergy as had least humanity: this was the quality by which alone a man was deemed worthy of the episcopal dignity. The persecution therefore against the Protestants in this reign has no-

(2) According to Fox's account, and Burnet's calculation, two hundred and eighty-four in all were burned. A paper found among lord Burlegh's MSS, makes the number two hundred aud ninety. The same lord Burlegh, in a treatise writ in the year 1583, raises the number of persons destroyed in that reign, by imprisonments, torments, fire, and famine, to be near four hundred. But the author of the preface, to bishop Ridley's book, De Cænâ Domini, who according to Bale (de Scrip. p. 684, 731.) was William Wittingham, affirms, That in the two first years of Mary's persecution, above eight hundred were put to the most cruel deaths for religion. However this be, it is generally acknowledged, That the flames devoured five bishops, twenty-one divines, eight gentlemen, eighty-four artificers, one hundred husbandmen, servants and laborers, twenty-six wives, twenty widows, nine virgins, two boys, and two infants. Sixty-four more were persecuted for their religion; whereof seven were whipped, sixteen perished in prison; and twelve were buried in dunghills. It is observable, that the persecution raged most in Bonner's diocese, and in Kent. For, as Heylin reckons it, in all the province of York, there was but one brought to the stake; and but three in the four Welsh dioceses. In those of Exeter, Wells, Peterborough, and Lincoln, there is mention but of one in each, of two in that of Ely, and of no more than three each at Bristol and Salisbury: in those of Oxford, Glocester, Worcester, and Hereford none at all. And now, not to let such hellish and bloody doings pass without some reflexion, I shall observe with Mr. Collier, That, "to destroy people for points of more speculation, and which have no ill effect on practise and "civil government, seems very remote from the spirit of Christianity. Supposing truth on the persecuted side, yet to burn a "man because he will not belie his conscience, and turn hypocrite, is strangely unaccountable. Men cannot believe what they "please: their understandings are not all of a size. Things stand not in the same light, and strike with the same force on every "body. Beside, if the Roman Catholics believed the Reformed such notorious heretics: if they believed they would be so ill "received in the other world, why did they not use them gentlier in this? Why did they hurry them to eternal destruction be-"fore their time?" We may justly affirm, that such wisdom as this, did not proceed from above, but was earthly, sensual, and devilish. Collier Eccl. thing which ought to ſeem ſtrange. Burnet ſays, Mary had a generous diſpoſition of mind. It were to be wiſhed, he had given us ſome paſſages of her life where this generoſity appeared. For my part, I find but one action to approve in her whole reign. This was her rejecting the Spaniſh embaſſador's project, to make herſelf abſolute at the expenſe of the nation's laws and liberties. Queen Mary's death concealed for ſome time. Camden. Burnet.

QUEEN Mary's death, tho' ſufficiently foreſeen, failed not ſtriking with aſtoniſhment the counſellors and miniſters. They were all of the predominant religion; had adviſed, or at leaſt approved the perſecution under which the Reformed lately groaned, and now, in all likelihood, the Proteſtants were, in their turn, on the point of governing. For ſome hours they therefore concealed the Queen's death, that they might have leiſure to deliberate how to proceed. But as the parliament was ſiting, they had no power to decide any thing concerning the ſucceſſion, eſpecially as it was clearly ſettled by Henry VIII's will, authoriſed by a yet unrepealed act of parliament. Their conſultation therefore ended only in a meſſage to inform the parliament of the Queen's death. This was all could be done on this occaſion. The news was firſt communicated to the houſe of lords, who immediately conſidered the rights of the perſons who might pretend to the crown. Had this affair been left to the deciſion of the civil or common laws, the difficulties would not have been ſmall, ſo much had Henry perplexed it by his divorces, and by contradictory acts of parliament: but in England, the parliament, which includes King, lords, and commons, is the ſupreme legiſlator, and when force does not interpoſe, the validity of its laws are unqueſtionable. Henry VIII obtained an act, impowering him to ſettle the line of ſucceſſion juſt as he pleaſed. He ranged Elizabeth next her ſiſter Mary, tho' both had been declared baſtards. This ſufficed to give Elizabeth a title which the parliament might not conteſt, ſince it was a parliamentary right, as founded on the act to impower Henry to ſettle the ſucceſſion. Beſide, the diſſolution of that Prince's marriage with Ann Boleyn was univerſally known, and the act which, in conſequence of that divorce, declared Elizabeth illegitimate, was the pure effect of that Monarch's caprice, and of the compliance rather than juſtice of the parliament. But, even tho' the peers ſhould have meditated excluding Elizabeth from the ſucceſſion, on what other perſon could they have fixed, without expoſing the realm to great and manifeſt dangers? It will be proper briefly to explain this, as a matter of much importance to the ſequel of this reign.

Reaſons for and againſt Elizabeth and her competitors.

On Mary's deceaſe, three ſeveral Princeſſes could pretend to the crown; viz. Elizabeth the late Queen's ſiſter; Mary Queen of Scotland, grand-daughter to Margaret, Henry VIII's eldeſt ſiſter; and Frances, ducheſs of Suffolk, daughter of Mary, his ſaid late Majeſty's younger ſiſter. Elizabeth ſupported her right on the King her father's will, authoriſed by act of parliament. The Scotiſh Queen could object, that Elizabeth had been declared ſpurious by a yet unrepealed ſtatute: that no baſtard had ever aſcended the Engliſh throne: that the national laws allowed not to baſtards any ſhare in the inheritance of their fathers, and conſequently the ſucceſſion was devolved to the poſterity of Margaret, Henry VII's eldeſt daughter. For the ducheſs of Suffolk, it might be urged that, Elizabeth, being a baſtard, and the Queen of Scotland a foreigner, and not even placed in the order of ſucceſſion by Henry VIII's teſtament, the crown ſhould fall to the poſterity of Mary, Henry VII's ſecond daughter. It is not neceſſary here to ſcrutiniſe theſe ſeveral pretenſions, becauſe, very ſeemingly, the parliament, by whom that affair was decided, did not proceed ſo much upon the laws, as upon policy, and the kingdom's intereſt. The Scotiſh Queen eſpouſed the Dauphin, heir-apparent to the crown of France: in adjudging the crown to her, England would have been in danger of ſubjection to, or dependency on France; this alone ſufficed for her excluſion. The ducheſs of Suffolk could not have been placed on the throne with any color of juſtice, ſince ſhe only derived her right from the will of Henry VIII, which was equally favorable to Elizabeth: beſide, ſuch a choice would infallibly have involved England in a civil war. Probably, for theſe and no other reaſons the peers declared for Elizabeth. It ſeems, however, that a great difficulty was to occur. All England, and particularly the houſe of lords, made profeſſion of the Romiſh religion; and Elizabeth's being cordially a Proteſtant was ſcarcely queſtionable: two particulars however did undoubtedly conſpire to remove this obſtacle. The firſt was, that the prelates and Romiſh lords were perſuaded, perſuaded, that Elizabeth, ſhould ſhe make any ſuch attempt, would find it difficult to change the eſtabliſhed religion: they even believed her of a temper ſo complying, that ſhe would rather conform to Popery, as ſhe had done for ſome years, than hazard occaſioning diſturbances, which might be fatal to herſelf. If Camden's teſtimony is to be intirely credited, Elizabeth made no ſcruple to declare herſelf a Papiſt, during her ſiſter's reign. "Lady Elizabeth, (ſays this hiſtorian) "now guiding herſelf as a ſhip in tempeſtuous "weather, both heard divine ſervice after the Ro- "miſh manner, and was frequently confeſſed; and "at the preſſing inſtances and menaces of cardi- "dinal Pole, thro' fear of death, declared her- "ſelf a Roman Catholic."

Camden, Preface to his annals.

The ſecond reaſon which, ſeemingly, prevented the lords from inſiſting on her excluſion, was, that tho' they all profeſſed the Romiſh creed, they were not however all Romaniſts. Many, and perhaps the majority, had only diſſembled their ſentiments during Mary's reign: but being freed from all danger by her death, they could ſpeak boldly, and oppoſe ſuch as pretended to exclude Elizabeth on account of her religion; this reaſon not being of more force againſt her, than it was againſt Mary on King Edward's deceaſe.

The commons concur with the lords in owning the right of Elizabeth, who is proclaimed. Stow. Hollingſh.

However this be, the houſe of peers declaring for Elizabeth, the commons were ſent for, and acquainted by the chancellor with the Queen's death, and their reſolution; which was readily and unanimouſly imbraced. The ſame day Elizabeth was proclaimed Queen at the uſual places, with acclamations of the people. The Proteſtants glorified the Almighty that he had finally delivered them from perſecution, in placing on the throne a Princeſs who, moſt probably, would be favorable to them. It is true, that among the Papiſts, diverſe conſidered their loſing Mary, and Elizabeth's advancement as mortal wounds to their religion; but others were not ſorry to ſee a ſtop put to thoſe inhumanities, whereby it had been ſo diſhonored. As for thoſe who made not religion the chief object of their thoughts, they were eaſily comforted for the loſs of a Queen under whom England had not greatly flouriſhed, and who had loſt the only place which commanded reſpect from France: they believed to have reaſon to expect better things from the new reign.

She comes to London. Stow. Burnet.

Elizabeth, having notice of what both houſes had determined in her favor, left Hatfield (1) the nineteenth of November, and came to London with a numerous train of lords and ladies (2), and infinite crouds of people, teſtifying their joy by the loudeſt acclamations. She was twenty five years of age, had ſome ſhare of beauty, and in air and mein grand, noble, and majeſtic. But ſhe was ſtill more agreeable to the people, by a certain natural affability, which commanded the eſteem and affection of all who approached her. As ſhe had a plentiful portion of ſenſe and judgment, ſhe knew perfectly how neceſſary her peoples love was to her, ſince it was the ſtrongeſt ſupport of her throne, as will hereafter appear: wherefore, inſtead of quitting this affability in being raiſed from a ſubject to a Queen, ſhe ſtudiouſly increaſed it to ſuch a degree, that ſome have taxed her with over-acting her part, like a too-affected comedian.

ELIZAB. AN' 1558.

Her firſt care, after receiving the compliments on her acceſſion, was to diſpatch embaſſadors to the principal courts of Europe, to give notice of the late change in England (3). Lord Cobham * was ſent to Philip, whom ſhe eſteemed her friend, and who was moreover her ally in the war againſt France, the treaty of Cambray not being yet concluded. Sir Thomas Chaloner was ſent to the Imperial court. Lord Howard of Effingham was joined in commiſſion with Thirleby biſhop of Ely, and Dr. Wotton, plenipotentiaries to negociate a peace. Sir Henry Killigrew went into Germany, to aſſure the Proteſtant Princes of the Queen's affection. Karne, who was ſtill at Rome, where he had been reſident ever ſince the death of Edward VI, had orders to notify to his Beatitude Mary's death, and Elizabeth's acceſſion to the crown (4). The Kings of Sweden and Denmark had the ſame notification.

She forms a council with ſome Proteſtants in it: with whom ſhe conſults how to reſtore the reformation.

Theſe envoys being diſpatched, the Queen formed a council, in which ſhe left thirteen of Mary's counſellors, all zealous Romaniſts, to whom ſhe added eight new ones, equally attached to the reformation (5). With ſome of theſe latter ſhe ſecretly conſulted about means to re-eſtabliſh the reformation in England. But before entering on the reſult of theſe deliberations, ſome mention muſt be made of the King of Spain's new project.

Philip deſires to marry Elizabeth, but is rejected. Camden. Burnet.

When this Prince received the news of his Queen's death, he ſcarce doubted England's being utterly loſt to him; whether, on account of Elizabeth's bent towards Proteſtaniſm, or by her marrying ſome Prince of that perſuaſion, againſt which himſelf had ſo openly declared. He was not even free from apprehenſion, that the King of France, aſſerting the Scotiſh Queen's claim upon England, would ſeize that kingdom, and unite it, as well as Scotland and Ireland, to the Gallic Monarchy. Wherefore, to rid himſelf of theſe diſquiets, and preſerve the advantages of his alliance with England, he ſent inſtructions to count de Feria (lately arrived at London, to pay his compliments to the defunct Queen) to congratulate Elizabeth on her acceſſion, and propoſe his deſign of uniting himſelf with her in matrimony. Elizabeth received the offer with marks of a particular eſteem for his Catholic Majeſty; but objected their affinity as a very ſufficient impediment to this marriage. This objection was

(2) All the biſhops met her at Highgate.

(3) And at the ſame time, ſhe took care of ſecuring all the ports; and the Tower of London; ordered a new commiſſion to be ſent to Thomas Ratcliff earl of Suſſex, lord lieutenant of Ireland, who had kept that mutinous country quiet, only with three hundred and twenty horſe, and eight hundred and ſixty foot; and alſo, that the judges patents ſhould be renewed; new juſtices and ſheriffs appointed in every county; no bills of exchange be ſent beyond ſea; and that preachers ſhould not meddle with controverted points. (4) The haughty Pope told Karne; That England was held in fee of the Apoſtolic See, and Elizabeth could not ſucceed, being illegitimate. That it was great boldneſs in her to aſſume the crown without his conſent; for which reaſon ſhe deſerved no favor at his hands; but if ſhe would renounce her pretenſions, and refer herſelf wholly to him, he would ſhew a fatherly affection to her. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 374.

(5) The Popiſh counſellors, continued in the new council, were Heath archbiſhop of York, William Paulet marquis of Winchester, lord high-treaſurer, Henry Fitz-Alan earl of Arundel, Francis Talbot earl of Shrewſbury, Edward Stanley earl of Derby, William Herbert earl of Pembroke, Edward Fynes baron of Clinton, lord high-admiral, William lord Howard of Effingham, lord chamberlain, ſir Thomas Cheney, ſir William Petre, ſir John Maſon, ſir Richard Sackvil, Dr. Wotton dean of Canterbury. Moſt of theſe had complied with all the changes had been made in religion, backward and forward, ſince the latter end of Henry's reign, and were ſo dextrous at it, that they were ſtill imployed in every new revolution. foreſeen, and immediately replied to by the embaſſador, that his maſter would undertake to procure his Sanctity's diſpenſation. Elizabeth, not judging it convenient to expreſs her little regard of ſuch a diſpenſation, courteouſly diſmiſſed the embaſſador, to have time to conſider of the propoſal. Three great reaſons induced her not to accept Philip's offer. Firſt, her perſuaſion that ſuch marriages were repugnant to divine ſtatutes; and her father's example in a parallel caſe reminded her of her duty. Secondly, nothing was more contrary to her intention of openly profeſſing and reſtoring the Proteſtant religion in England, as eſtabliſhed in the reign of Edward VI. Laſtly, making uſe of a diſpenſation to marry a brother-in-law, would have been a manifeſt acknowledgment of the invalidity of her father's divorce from Catherine of Aragon, and of her own illegitimacy: if Paul IV could grant ſuch a diſpenſation, Julius II might have granted the ſame to Henry VIII, to marry Catherine of Aragon, from whence it neceſſarily followed, that Henry's ſecond marriage with Ann Boleyn was null. But on the other hand, Elizabeth had ſtrong reaſons to preſerve the King of Spain's friendſhip. To him ſhe owed her life, or at leaſt, her not being excluded by her ſiſter from the ſucceſſion. Mary would never have left Elizabeth in a condition of one day aſcending the throne, if the intereſt and ſollicitations of the King her conſort had not ſtrongly oppoſed her zealous fervency for her religion. In the ſecond place, Elizabeth had intelligence, that the King of France was imploying his whole credit at Rome to have her declared illegitimate, in order to procure the Engliſh crown for his daughter-in-law, the Queen of Scotland. Laſtly, England's affairs were in a very indifferent ſituation. The loſs of Calais, Guiſnes and Hames; the crown debts contracted by Henry VIII, and increaſed by Edward VI's guardians; with a treaſury quite exhauſted, gave Elizabeth juſt cauſe to apprehend her being ſcarce able to oppoſe a vigorous attack. To this may be added; ſhe was ingaged in a war with France and Scotland, unſupported by any other alliance than that of Spain, ſo unmindful had Mary been of all affairs wherein religion was not immediately intereſted. Elizabeth's buſineſs was therefore to end theſe two wars with honor: but this was not to be effected without Philip's aſſiſtance, and conſequenly it was not proper to give him any juſt cauſe of complaint, for fear of his deſerting England in the negociation of peace. Theſe reflections created her no ſmall perplexity. She was abſolutely determined on refuſing his Catholic Majeſty's propoſition, but was uneaſy about the manner. The ſcruples of conſcience ſhe alledged freed her not from the importunities of count de Feria, who perſiſted that a diſpenſation from his Beatitude was more than ſufficient for their removal. He likewiſe told her that, as his maſter had made this overture purely from his extraordinary eſteem for her perſon, his diſpleaſure would be the greater if his requeſt was rejected. Finally, being thus preſſed, ſhe found no ſurer or readier way to extricate herſelf out of this difficulty, than by haſtening the execution of her deſign to make a change in religion, not doubting that this once effected, the King of Spain would ceaſe his importunities.

Her reaſons for refuſing of the offer.

She determines to reſtore the reformation.

This reſolution taken, ſhe cauſed to be examined before her cabinet council the proper methods to execute it; the inconveniencies wherewith it might be attended, and the means to prevent them. All obſtacles to this affair were to ariſe either at home, or abroad. At home, from the great number of Catholics, and oppoſition from the prelates and other eccleſiaſtics. Abroad, from the Roman Pontif, who moſt undoubtedly would thunder his cenſures againſt the Queen, and expoſe her realms a prey to the firſt invader. This gave room to apprehend that the Kings of France and Spain would uſe this pretext to attack the Engliſh, as excommunicated heretics, and to ſtir up Scotland, which was wholly under the French court's direction.

Conſultation on that ſubject. Camden.

Burnet. Vol. II. p. 377. Vol. p. 327.

With regard to the domeſtic inconveniencies, it was conſidered, that tho' the kingdom appeared quite Popiſh, it was far from being ſo in reality: that dread of perſecution ceaſing, the greateſt part of the people were manifeſtly inclined to return to the religion which they had been violently conſtrained to relinquiſh under the late reign; but however, it would not be very difficult to have a parliament favorable to her Majeſty's intentions, by having recourſe to means which rarely fail of ſucceſs, when uſed opportunely and with diſcretion: that for this purpoſe, the magiſtrates of counties and towns were to be removed, and their places ſupplied with Proteſtants, who would imploy their credit and authority to have ſuch repreſentatives returned as would forward the intended deſign: that it was abſolutely neceſſary not to leave any zealous Romaniſt in the council, or in any other office which influenced the ſubject: that when the reformation ſhould be once eſtabliſhed by public authority, it would be no difficulty to bridle the church-men by depriving the moſt obſtinate prelates and other eccleſiaſtics, and by removing in the univerſities ſuch maſters and profeſſors as were moſt averſe to the new eſtabliſhment.

Elizab. An' 1558.

As for the obſtacles from abroad, it was conſidered, that the Pope in himſelf was not formidable, and his thunders were thrown away upon thoſe who held them in contempt: that deſpiſing him was the ready way to conquer, provided care was taken to put the kingdom in a poſture of defence: that indeed it was to be feared, the King of France would aſſert the Scotiſh Queen's claim: but that his Catholic Majeſty was too prudent ever to ſuffer ſuch a conſiderable acceſſion to the Gallic monarchy as England and Ireland: that from whatever quarter the miſchief came, whether from France or Spain, Henry and Philip would always be jealous of each other, and the aſſiſtance of one of them might be ſafely relied on: that if the King of France offered peace, it ought to be imbrac'd on any terms, as Scotland would be included in the league; but if he was for continuing the war, all the danger would be his powerful aſſiſting the Scots to invade England: that, therefore, the northern frontiers were to be ſecured, after which, a good fleet would ſo indanger any ſuccors ſent from France, that his Gallic Majeſty would moſt undoubtedly, ſoon grow weary of ſo burdenſom a war: that beſide, it was unlikely that Philip, in the negociation of peace, would abandon England to the King of France's ambition: and finally, that a peace thus concluded with France and Scotland would afford time at leaſt to provide againſt their attacks.

Such was the reſult of this council; after which the Queen ſummoned a parliament to meet the twenty-third of January, as had been in council determined. At the ſame time, doctor Parker was intruſted with the care of reviſing the liturgy of Edward VI, and was ordered to communicate his labors only to ſome choſen perſons. Mean while the Proteſtants, growing impatient and preaching publicly in diverſe places, the Queen took occaſion to publiſh a proclamation, which manifeſtly evidenced her intentions. She allowed the goſpels and epiſtles, with the Lord's-prayer, creed, litany, and ten commandments to be read in Engliſh; but forbid all preaching on controverſial ſubjects, or any change in the Romiſh rites, 'till it ſhould be otherwiſe appointed by parliament. Herein ſhe followed the deceaſed Queen's example.

Affairs of France and Spain. Mezerai. Thuanus. Burnet.

The war between France and Spain was viſibly drawing to a concluſion. Both Kings, equally tired of a war whence neither could expect much advantage, had, during the whole campain, held their armies in a ſtate of inaction, for fear of obſtructing a pacification. At length, conſtable Montmorency, who had been priſoner in the Netherlands ever ſince the battle of St. Quintin, having made ſome overtures of peace to Philip, the principal articles were ſettled; after which, the two Kings ſent their plenipotentiaries to Cercamp, and then to Cambray. The main obſtacle to a peace was the King of France's reſolution to keep Calais, and Philip and Mary's inſiſting on its being reſtored. But Mary dying in the interim, Philip no longer ſupported England's intereſts with the ſame ardor as before, at leaſt ſince he deſpaired of marrying Elizabeth. It was that expectation which induced him to ſtand out ſome time, and delay concluding peace 'till the year inſuing.

Affairs of Scotland.

As Scotland is to furniſh plenty of materials for Elizabeth's hiſtory, a ſomewhat circumſtantial account muſt be given of that kingdom's affairs: without a particular and exact knowledge of what paſſed in Scotland, Elizabeth's conduct and policy is not to be comprehended.

Buchanan.

The dowager Queen of Scotland, mother of the Dauphineſs, obtained the regency of that realm thro' the intereſt of her brothers the duke of Guiſe and cardinal of Lorrain; but was ſupported only by the Proteſtants. The earl of Arran, chief of the Hamilton family, had unwillingly reſigned the regency, tho' his reſignation procured him the duchy of Chaterault in France *, with land to the annual value of twelve thouſand livres. The archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, his natural brother, was inceſſantly blaming his imprudence, and cabaling with the eccleſiaſtics to give the regent diſturbance. In order to fruſtrate the ſchemes of this prelate, ſhe turned to the Reformed, now begining to be conſiderable. This method ſucceeded; but withal ſhe was obliged to connive at the Proteſtants meetings, and this indulgence greatly increaſed their number and credit.

* In Poitou.

Melvil's memoirs.

In this poſture ſtood affairs 'till the rupture between France and Spain. As England eſpouſed the cauſe of Philip II, and the regent of Scotland could not poſſibly induce the Scots to declare war with Mary, ſhe adviſed the King of France to haſten the Dauphin's marriage with the young Queen, and accordingly it was ſolemniſed in April, 1558. This gave a conſiderable turn to the Scotiſh affairs. The clergy, knowing how the court of France ſtood affected to the followers of the new religion, queſtioned not being ſupported if they attempted to force the Proteſtants within the pale of the Romiſh church. On the other hand, the regent, no longer needing the Proteſtants, began to look on them with more indifference. To begin the work, the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, having ſummoned before him a certain aged prieſt †, who had diſcontinued the maſs, ordered him to be burned alive in his archiepiſcopal city, to the exceſſive regret and diſcontent of the inhabitants. This eſſay being made, the biſhops cited a miniſter, named Paul Meffan, with deſign to make him undergo the like puniſhment; but, as they ſaw the people began to be in motion, the trial was defered to another opportunity. Not long after a proceſſion, annually made at Edinburg (2), occaſioned a kind of commotion, which evidenced that the Proteſtants no longer dreaded ſhewing themſelves. The regent was farther convinced, when ſhe was told that Meffan, condemned for non-appearance, was openly protected in the county of Fife. Theſe were as preludes to what was to follow. In fine, ſome gentlemen of Fife and Angus, diſperſing thro' the counties, incouraged the Proteſtants to ſtand up in defenſe of their lives, conſpired againſt on pretenſe of religion; demonſtrating to them, that their numbers in Scotland exceeded that of the Papiſts. This occaſioned a confederacy or aſſociation under the hands and ſeals of the aſſociators, and was the firſt formed in Scotland in defenſe of the new religion. The Proteſtants perceiving themſelves ſtronger ſince this aſſociation, which was called THE CONGREGATION, ſent to the regent a petition, that divine ſervice might be in the vulgar tongue, and the communion given in both kinds. This was ſtrongly oppoſed by the biſhops: but the regent being told, that abſolute refuſal might throw all Scotland into a flame, ſhe indeavored to molify the prelates, by a promiſe of her protection at a more ſeaſonable juncture. Mean time, ſhe permited the Proteſtants to preach and pray as they would, provided this was done without tumults, or public aſſemblies in Edinburg and Leith (3): but the eccleſiaſtics, not reliſhing this politic circumſpection of the regent, aſſembled to conſult on the buſineſs, and reſolved to proſecute the heretics with the extemeſt rigor. The Proteſtants deputed John Areſkin, afterwards earl of Mar, to the aſſembly of prelates, to demand of them, that divine ſervice might be performed in the vulgar tongue: but this was unanimouſly rejected. Such was the ſituation of affairs in Scotland, when Elizabeth aſcended the Engliſh throne, and 'till the end of the year 1558.

The ſee of Canterbury being vacant, this office belonged to the archbiſhop of York; but he, with the other biſhops, refuſed to aſſiſt at the ſolemnity, becauſe Elizabeth by proclamation, and by admiting into her council men who paſſed not for good Catholics, had ſufficiently declared againſt the church of Rome. The parliament meets, and is opened by a ſpeech of Bacon, keeper of the great ſeal. Sir S. D'ewe's Jour. p. 11.

The parliament meeting the twenty-fifth of January (1), ſir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great ſeal (2), opened it with a ſpeech, in which he diſplayed the merits of the new Queen, with bitter reflections on the late miniſtry for the loſs of Calais. He told them, her Majeſty required immediate application to the affairs of religion; that a diſunion in that reſpect was one of the evils which called for the prompteſt redreſs. He exhorted the parliament to proceed between the two extremes of ſuperſtition and irreligion, which might reunite the adherents of both creeds in the ſame public worſhip.

Burnet has, in his hiſtory, ſo amply particulariſed the manner of reſtoring the reformation in England by this parliament, that doubtleſs I may be excuſed from entering on a detail, and the more, as this ſubject relates chiefly to church-hiſtory. I ſhall therefore content myſelf with only pointing to the acts made in this ſeſſion, to ſpare our readers the trouble of conſulting his hiſtory. I ſhall however obſerve, that this author ſeems to have been miſtaken in placing the acts, (moſt of which were made in February and March) after the peace, which was not concluded 'till April. But this is not very material.

Tenths and firſt-fruits reſtored to the crown. Statutes.

At firſt, to try how the parliament ſtood affected, motion was made, in the lower-houſe, for reſtoring to the crown the tenths, firſt-fruits, and impropriations (3). This motion was immediately approved; and the houſe of lords conſented to it, notwithſtanding the biſhops oppoſition (4).

The commons addreſs Elizabeth to marry. Her anſwer.

The fourth of February, the houſe of commons addreſſed the Queen in a very dutiful manner, and repreſented to her, how neceſſary it was for the nation's happineſs, that ſhe ſhould think of marrying. The Queen graciouſly thanked the commons, and told them how much ſhe was pleaſed, that they had neither limited time nor perſon. She added that, by the ceremony of her inauguration, ſhe was married to her people, and her ſubjects were to her inſtead of children: they would not want a ſucceſſor when ſhe died; and for her part, ſhe would be well contented, that the marble ſhould tell poſterity, HERE LYES A QUEEN WHO REIGNED SO LONG, AND LIVED AND DIED A VIRGIN.

Act to recognize the Queen's right to the crown. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 385. Camden. Ann. p. 372.

Some days after, the lords paſſed a bill to recognize Elizabeth for lawful Queen, in virtue of a ſtatute of the thirty-fifth of Henry VIII. Some thought it ſtrange, that the ſentence of Queen Ann Boleyn's divorce, and the ſubſequent act declaring her daughter Elizabeth illegitimate, were not annulled. Camden ſays, this omiſſion was with deſign; and Burnet reports the reaſons which determined the houſe of lords to be ſilent on this point. The firſt was, that the poſſeſſion of the crown purged all defects, according to a received maxim, when Henry VII mounted the throne: but this reaſon had not appeared ſufficient to Mary, who was in the ſame caſe with Elizabeth, and yet had procured a repeal of that act which declared her illegitimate. The ſecond reaſon was, that this act could not be repealed, without caſting ſome diſhonor on the memory of Henry VIII, and it was the Queen's intereſt rather to conceal, than publicly expoſe her father's weakneſs. I own, this reaſon appears to me very unſatisfactory. For why was the reputation of Henry VIII to be ſpared, if it could not be done without indangering the reigning Queen's ſafety? Beſide, it was not expoſing faults which 'till then had been concealed, but faults univerſally known. The third reaſon was, that too narrow a ſcrutiny into this matter would render the Queen's right more uncertain, inſtead of making it leſs diſputable. This, probably, was the prevailing reaſon, tho' to ſuffer the ſentence and act to ſubſiſt ſeems to have been equally dangerous. It was eſtabliſhing a precedent in favor of baſtards, which might have ill conſequences: and who knows but it may ſtill affect future ages? Beſide, this regard for Henry's honor left a perpetual blot on the memory of Elizabeth: at leaſt her enemies, and particularly the Queen of Scotland, were thereby furniſhed with a plauſible pretenſe to wreſt from her the ſcepter, if a favorable opportunity offered. Burnet thinks the conduct of this parliament equally pious and judicious. I allow the firſt; but the continued indeavors to dethrone Elizabeth, wholly founded on the ſentence of her mother's divorce and the ſubſequent act, will not permit me to allow leaving them unrepealed was right judgment.

The act to recognize the Queen's title being paſſed, the parliament turned to the affairs of religion, and made diverſe ſtatutes, which I ſhall but juſt mention.

Acts concerning religion. Camden. Burnet.

The firſt, appointed the public worſhip to be performed in the vulgar tongue (5).

The ſecond reſtored the Queen to her right of ſupremacy in the church of England.

The third renewed and confirmed all the acts made in the reign of Edward VI, concerning religion: and in this many others were included.

The fourth reſtored to the Queen the nomination of biſhops. By this ſtatute likewiſe were confirmed many others, made in the reign of Henry VIII, againſt the Pope. The Queen was impowered to put the exerciſe of her ſupremacy into what hands ſhe ſhould think proper. Moreover, all perſons in public imployments were obliged to ſwear, that "They acknowledged the Queen to be the ſupreme "governor in all caſes, as well eccleſiaſtical as "temporal; that they renounced all foreign juriſ-"diction, and ſhould bear the Queen true alle-"giance." Whoſoever refuſed this oath, was declared incapable of holding any public office. Laſtly, diverſe penalties were inacted againſt any who, by word or writing, tended to ſet forth or advance any foreign power in the kingdom.

The fifth act eſtabliſhed uniformity in divine worſhip (6).

(1) It met the 23d, and was prorogued to the 25th.
